PEOPLE

SCHIERS.

Cr. 6063.

Supreme Court of California.

July 11, 1958.

Dissenting Opinion Aug. 7, 1958.

On petition for hearing.

Prior opinion, 324 P.2d 981.

PER CURIAM.

Hearing denied.

CARTER, TRAYNOR and SCHAUER,
JJ., dissenting.

CARTER, Justice.

I dissent from the order denying a hearing in this case.

Rule on appeal 29(a) declares: "A hearing in the Supreme Court after decision by a District Court of Appeal will be ordered (1) where it appears necessary to secure uniformity of decision or the settlement of important questions of law * *." (Emphasis added.) A hearing of the case should have been granted for both reasons because the prosecution introduced evidence of a lie detector test before the jury.

Officer Belle was the last witness in the prosecution's case in chief. He was asked: "Did you at any time ask him [defendant] about the benzedrine showing up blood on his skin?" Belle related an interview with defendant. During this he said: "On the night of February 12th, we had taken him to the Police Administration Building and gave him a lie detector test and told him that the test indicated that he was lying and asked him if he could explain that, and he said, 'No, there was something wrong with the machine.'

"When we first asked him to take the test, he was agreeable to take it. So Lieutenant [sic] Putty explained the test to him and asked him to pick out a card with a number on it, and when he was asked what the number was, he was to lie about it and the machine indicated he was lying.

"So Mr. Schiers felt that the test was a fair one and agreed to take it. We told him that the test indicated that he was lying, and he said that he couldn't understand it, even though he believed it was accurate when they showed him the experiment. He couldn't understand why it indicated that he was lying when they asked the questions about the murder of his wife." (Emphasis added.)

The trial judge ordered the noon recess at this point. Upon resumption of the trial the judge admonished the jury "not to consider or even recall" Belle's testimony regarding the lie detector. The District Court of Appeal held that the admonition obliterated the error. An admonition may cure minor errors. But to hold that an egregious and shocking attack upon the integrity of an accused is blotted out of a juror's mind by a mere incantation is as fictional as John Doe. People v. Lyons, 47 Cal.2d 311, 303 P.2d 329; People v. Aragon, 154 Cal.App.2d 646, 316 P.2d 370; People v. Wochnick, 98 Cal.App.2d 124, 219 P.2d 70. This error surpasses that in Lyons.

This "error" was deliberately committed at the end of the prosecution's case. Behind it were the prestige of science, the glamour of a modern scientific testing device, with the immense publicity given the "lie detector" in mass communication media. See, People v. Aragon, supra, 154 Cal. App.2d at page 658, 316 P.2d at page 378. No expert testified to the accuracy of the instrument, nor was the jury permitted to draw its own inferences from the questions asked during the test and the reactions of the instrument. The interpreter of the test may have been anybody, although this requires extensive training.<sup>1</sup> In fact, Belle did not testify to the test results; he merely testified that defendant was told it was unfavorable to him, leaving an obvious inference to the jury. A poll of jurors who sat in a case in which lie detector evidence was received (People v. Kenny, 167 Misc. 51, 3 N.Y.S.2d 348) shows they were greatly influenced by the evidence.<sup>2</sup> I, therefore, conclude that the admonition was impotent before such powerful testimony. People v. Aragon, supra, 154 Cal.App.2d 646, 316 P.2d 370; People v. Wochnick, supra, 98 Cal. App.2d 124, 219 P.2d 70.

One would be credulous indeed to believe the prosecutor was surprised by Belle's revelation (see, People v. Aragon, supra, 154 Cal.App.2d 659, 316 P.2d 379). Both knew that such evidence is inadmissible. The theory of separation of powers enjoins the judiciary to restrain the excesses of the executive (Montesquieu, Spirit of Laws, Book 5, ch. 10; Book 6, ch. 6; The Federalist No. 48; see, Griswold, The Fifth Amendment Today, p. 76, which indicates these fears are justified. Contra: Vyshinsky, The Law of the Soviet State, p. 498: "The bonds joining court and prosecutor's office are of the closest possible character and they act united by an indissoluble and organic bond."). By this decision the California judiciary invites repetition of such open debauchery of basic fairness to the discredit of bench and bar. In my opinion it amounts to a denial of due process of law.

This case breaks the uniformity of California decisions holding that an admonition to ignore the prosecution's evidence of lie detector tests is powerless. People v. Aragon, supra; People v. Wochnick, supra. The facts in the Wochnick case are identical with the instant one. These cases appear irreconcilable. People v. Carter, 48 Cal.2d 737, 312 P.2d 665, held that the results of lie detector tests are not judicially recognized as accurate and therefore are not probative. After reversal, Carter was retried and acquitted. People v. Porter, 136 Cal.App.2d 461, 288 P.2d 561, affirmed the refusal of the trial court to permit defendant to take a lie detector test because such evidence had been held inadmissible in California criminal prosecutions. People v. Houser, 85 Cal.App.2d 686, 193 P.2d 937, affirmed a conviction based on such testimony because defendant stipulated to it in writing and expressly waived his privilege against self-incrimination. Twenty-one reported cases from other states have passed upon the admissibility of evidence of various "lie detector" devices to gauge the veracity of an accused. Not one appellate court has approved admission of such evidence. It was admitted as evidence on behalf of a defendant (People v. Kenny, supra, 167 Misc. 51, 3 N.Y.S.2d 348), and was admitted for the sole purpose of proving a confession voluntary in Tyler v. United States, 90 U.S.App.D.C. 2, 193 F.2d 24. In only five of the twenty-one cases was it offered by the prosecution. In the others it was offered by the defense. California now becomes the first jurisdiction to

1. Lack of training increases the incidence of error precipitously. McCormick, Evidence 373 (1954).

2. This is the only such poll found. Defendant was found innocent. To the question: "Was the 'lie detector' testimony, in your opinion, conclusive proof of the innocence or guilt of Kenny?" six answered "yes," four "no." Two jurors did not respond to the poll. Forkosch, "The Lie Detector and the Courts," 16 N.Y.U.L.Q.Rev. 202, 228-229 (1938-1939).

affirm a successful prosecution employing lie detector evidence.

Since the error was prejudicial because of its impact on the jury, the judgment of conviction should be reversed even though other evidence clearly established defendant's guilt. The testimony in issue violated defendant's privilege against self-incrimination (Cal.Const. art. I, § 13) and his right to a fair trial (U.S.Const. Fourteenth Amendment; Cal.Const. art. I, § 13). When constitutional liberties are impaired, article VI, section 4½, is powerless to cure the error. People v. Sarazzawski, 27 Cal. 2d 7, 161 P.2d 934, citing opinion of Sloss, J., in People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 P. 1042.

The privilege against self-incrimination extends to informal proceedings. People v. Simmons, 28 Cal.2d 699, 172 P.2d 18; Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532, 18 S.Ct. 183, 42 L.Ed. 568. Whether forcing a suspect to submit to a lie detector test violates this privilege has not received judicial scrutiny. In People v. Trujillo, 32 Cal.2d 105, 194 P.2d 681, this court held that only testimonial evidence was privileged, relying upon Wigmore, Evidence, section 2263, for this interpretation. Is evidence of a lie detector test testimonial? In Trujillo, the court said testimonial means evidence from one's own lips (32 Cal.2d at page 112, 194 P.2d at page 685). Wigmore, however, contended the privilege existed only in formal proceedings where this form of expression is alone practical. In an out of court situation, other forms of communication must be included, for example, written records. United States v. Wheeler, D.C., 149 F.Supp. 445. Holmes used the term communication, which is broader. Holt v. United States, 218 U.S. 245, 252-253, 31 S.Ct. 2, 54 L.Ed. 1021. Wigmore defined testimonial evidence as " * * * the assertions of human beings regarded as the basis of inference to the propositions asserted by them. * * *" All other evidence is circumstantial. Wigmore, The Science of Judicial Proof (3d ed. 1937), p. 12. This would seem to mean that a fact observable to anyone, such as a person's footprint, his appearance, his handwriting, or his blood type, is circumstantial. But if one must rely on another's assertions to establish a fact it is testimonial. For example, did X shoot Y outside the interrogator's presence? The memory and perception of X are relied upon for a response. This is true when a lie detector is used, although it is not necessary for the accused to make a verbal reply to a question to produce a reaction in the machine. Inbau, Self-Incrimination (1st ed.), pp. 67-68. In essence, although the device records only objective physiological data, the ultimate source of that data is the nervous system of the accused.<sup>3</sup> This was the rationale of the holding in People v. Harper, 115 Cal. App.2d 776, 779, 252 P.2d 950. The machine is a new and artificial method of communicating thought.

But the true question is: Should this evidence be within the scope of the privilege? Certainly it must be excluded until it is generally regarded as accurate. It is not now so regarded. People v. Davis, 343

3. Accord: Wigmore, "Professor Muensterberg and the Psychology of Testimony," 3 Ill.L.Rev. 399, 420; Sell, "Deception Detection and the Law," 11 U. Pitt.L.Rev. 210, citing for same point 28 Ill.B.J. 308. Cases in accord: Henderson v. State, 94 Okl.Cr. 45, 230 P.2d 495, 502, 23 A.L.R.2d 1292; Boeche v. State, 151 Neb. 368, 37 N.W.2d 593, 597. Some writers disagree: McCormick, "Deception Tests and the Law of Evidence," 15 Cal.L.Rev. 484, 520. He analogizes a polygraph, which measures physiological factors, to footprints and other objective evidence. But truth serum tests are inadmissible since the accused's very words are to be used against him. Inbau, "Scientific Evidence in Criminal Cases," 24 J.Crim.L. & Cr., 1140, 1151. But he says diagnoses must be accepted with utmost caution and reservation. "The Lie Detector," 26 B.U.L.Rev. 264. He says the courts are justified in excluding such evidence, op. cit. 271. He agrees with McCormick on truth serum tests. Inbau doubts that the courts will accept the analogy to "physical" evidence and rule lie detector tests are not privileged. Self-Incrimination, p. 67.

Mich. 348, 72 N.W.2d 269, 281; Henderson v. State, 94 Okl.Cr. 45, 230 P.2d 495, 501; Sell, "Deception Detection and the Law," 11 U.Pitt.L.Rev. 210; 39 Cal.L.Rev. 439, 440 (citing Kiracofe, JAG J. 56 (June, 1948)). Contra: Inbau, "The Lie Detector," 26 B.U.L.Rev. 264. But assuming it is 100% accurate evidence of these tests should be held within the privilege because its use violates the policy foundations of the privilege. Inbau, Self-Incrimination, pp. 67-68; Green, "Can Science Legally Get the Confession," 21 A.B.A.J. 808; Silving, "Testing of the Unconscious," 69 Harv.L.Rev. 683; 37 Harv.L.Rev. 1138. These are expounded in Wigmore, Evidence, §§ 2250-51; Griswold, The Fifth Amendment Today; and Chafee, The Blessings of Liberty, pp. 184-209. Briefly they include these policies:

1. To stimulate law enforcement agencies to discover independent evidence to uncover offenders rather than resort to the inquisitorial examination of many persons.

2. To keep individuals free from police investigation and meddling unless there is probable cause to believe one has broken the law. See Butler, J., Sinclair v. United States, 279 U.S. 263, 292, 49 S.Ct. 268, 73 L.Ed. 692.

3. To preclude inquisitions into a person's private life by local "tyrants" for the purpose of "ensnarement." See, also, Despres, "Legal Aspects of Drug-Induced Statements," 14 U.Chi.L.Rev. 600, 607.<sup>4</sup>

4. Dependence upon confession at trials.

5. Assuming the detector becomes 100% accurate and its results are admissible, the jury will become vestigial and the defendant will no longer be a "party" since he cannot make a realistic defense. The real case will be decided not in open court but in the laboratory. See: Silving, "Testing the Unconscious," 69 Harv.L.Rev. 683, 701;

Kaganiec, "Lie-Detector Tests and 'Freedom of the Will' in Germany," 51 Nw. U.L. Rev. 446.

The lie detector is offensive to the traditions of our law. Germany's highest court reversed a conviction obtained with the aid of lie detector evidence. It held that it violated the principal of the Constitution that "Man's dignity is inviolate." Reported by Silving, op. cit. supra, 688. The historical antecedent of this Constitution is remarkably like that which produced the privilege in our own tradition. On April 10, 1958, Pope Pius XII condemned the use of narcoanalysis and lie detectors by police to extract confessions from suspects as illicit. Address to 13th International Congress of Applied Psychology reported by Professor G. Zilboorg, M.D., in America, June 7, 1958, p. 308.

Although Schiers consented to the test in the instant case, he cannot be held to have waived his immunity. Belle testified that the police convinced Schiers of the machine's accuracy. Assuming he was guilty, he did waive the privilege. Assuming he is innocent, he did not. It was observed that the machines are not fully accurate, particularly without expert operation. McCormick, Evidence, p. 373. An innocent man, convinced of the device's accuracy, would anticipate a favorable result, not an involuntary admission of guilt. He cannot be held to have waived his privilege against an untruth. Incriminating evidence obtained by deceit is within the privilege (United States v. Wheeler, D.C., 149 F. Supp. 445; People v. Leyra, 302 N.Y. 353, 98 N.E.2d 553). Of course, no one but Schiers knows if he killed his wife.

The "confession" via the lie detector was so unfairly obtained and presented as to taint the entire proceeding within the test prescribed in Rochin v. People of California, 342 U.S. 165, 72 S.Ct. 205, 96 L.Ed. 183.

4. Inbau, "Scientific Evidence in Criminal Cases," 24 J.Crim.L. & Cr., 1140, reports certain banks give periodic lie detector tests to employees and a background detector test for prospective employees (1144). He also reports a successful inquisition in a dormitory theft case (1146). See, also, McCain v. Sheridan, 160 Cal. App.2d 174, 324 P.2d 923. Loyalty tests and general "criminal examinations" are conceivable in the near future. For a critique, see Orwell, 1984.

Although it was not the usual confession expressed vocally or in writing, it was tantamount to one. Belle in effect told the jury that Schiers' perception and memory caused a physical reaction recorded by the lie detector, and that it indicated Schiers' verbal denial of guilt was a lie. If the jury believed the instrument to be accurate as Belle tacitly implied it was, they must have interpreted it as an acknowledgment of guilt.<sup>5</sup> It made precisely the same impression on the jury as a confession. Defendant, without counsel, was convinced that the detector was an accurate device. There is no evidence that an expert administered the test. There is no statement that the machine indicated Schiers was lying, although Belle's chronicle conveyed to the jury this impression. Belle only said Schiers was told the machine showed he was lying. This is often done to "break down" a suspect to confession. The impact on the jury was that the questions asked during the test, the verbal replies, and the infallible lie detector bared Schiers' consciousness and revealed guilt. An innocent defendant relying on the device would expect it to exculpate him, not condemn him. If Belle was deceitful, the officers did not tell Schiers the true results,<sup>6</sup> or the test was inconclusive, as about 20% of them are. See, Inbau, "The Lie Detector," 26 B.U.L.Rev. 264, 268. "Voluntary" confessions obtained after such tests are admissible. State v. DeHart, 242 Wis. 562, 8 N.W.2d 360; Webb v. State, Tex.Cr.App., 291 S.W.2d 331; Henson v. State, 159 Tex. Cr.R. 647, 266 S.W.2d 864; Commonwealth v. Hipple, 333 Pa. 33, 3 A.2d 353; Tyler v. U. S., 90 U.S.App.D.C. 2, 193 F.2d 24. Contra: People v. Sims, 395 Ill. 69, 69 N.E.2d 336. However, Schiers has always maintained his innocence. Evidence obtained by misrepresentation is constitutionally excludable (United States v. Wheeler, supra, 149 F.Supp. 445. The sum total of fairness and trustworthiness in this sort of evidence, when impressed upon a jury, is on a par with the old shell game.

Further, no expert appeared to testify to the precautions taken to insure the accuracy of the test or to interpret the machine's reactions. The jury did not hear the questions asked Schiers, his answers, or the degree to which the test was conclusive or what inferences could be drawn from the test. The jury was only told that the lie detector found Schiers guilty. Defense counsel, properly fearing the effect on the jury of the reiteration of this evidence, did not cross-examine on this point.

For these reasons a hearing should have been granted and the judgment of the trial court reversed.

The sole question to be decided in this proceeding is the constitutionality of section 170.6 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is set forth in full as an appendix to this opinion. This section, enacted in 1957, provides in substance that no judge of a superior, municipal or justice court shall try any civil action or special proceeding when it is established, in the manner set forth in the section, that he is prejudiced against a party or attorney appearing in the action. It further provides that prejudice may be established by an affidavit that the judge is prejudiced against the party or attorney so that the party or attorney cannot, or believes that he cannot, have a fair and impartial trial before such judge. A party or attorney is not permitted to make more than one such challenge in any one action or special proceeding.

Petitioners are plaintiffs in a malpractice action pending in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County. Upon assignment of the case to Judge A. A. Scott for trial, petitioners moved to disqualify him and filed an affidavit of prejudice pursuant to section 170.6. The motion was heard and denied by Presiding Judge Roy L. Herndon. In this proceeding petitioners seek a writ of mandate to compel the assignment of the case to some judge other than Judge Scott.

In attacking the statute respondents argue that, because it does not require the litigant or his attorney to set forth the reasons or grounds which constitute the basis for the statement in the affidavit that the judge is prejudiced and because there is no provision for a judicial determination of whether the judge is in fact prejudiced, the statute makes an unconstitutional delegation of legislative and judicial powers to litigants and their attorneys and is an unwarranted interference with the powers of the courts.

[1] There is, of course, a presumption in favor of constitutionality, and the invalidity of a legislative act must be clear before it can be declared unconstitutional. Lundberg v. County of Alameda, 46 Cal.2d 644, 652, 298 P.2d 1. Section 170.6 was passed by an overwhelming vote of both houses of the Legislature and approved by the Governor in 1957. The enactment of the statute represented the culmination of many years' effort by the organized bar of this state to obtain legislation which would permit the challenge of a judge for prejudice without an adjudication of disqualification. A statute enacted in 1937, which, as we shall see, differed materially from section 170.6, was held unconstitutional in Austin v. Lambert, 11 Cal.2d 73, 77 P.2d 849, 115 A.L.R. 849. Thereafter four measures similar to section 170.6, except that two of them were applicable to criminal as well as civil cases, were passed by the Legislature but failed to receive executive approval.<sup>1</sup> The history of the section thus shows that the State Bar and the Legislature have long felt that there is a need for such a measure.

[2,3] The Legislature may adopt reasonable rules and regulations regarding the disqualification of judges (Caminetti v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 22 Cal.2d 386, 390, 139 P.2d 930), and it is obvious that prejudice upon the part of a judge may properly be made a ground for disqualification. The declaration in section 170.6 that prejudice against a party or his attorney is the basis of the disqualification constitutes a sufficient legislative designation of the standard to be applied, and, contrary to respondents' contention, it is wholly unnecessary for the Legislature to attempt to list the many conceivable factors which might cause a judge to be prejudiced. It should be noted in this connection that since 1897, section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure has contained a general

1. The measures referred to were passed in 1941 (A.B. 442 [pocket vetoed by Governor Olson]), in 1951 (A.B. 479 [vetoed by Governor Warren and veto sustained]), in 1953 (S.B. 392 [pocket vetoed by Governor Warren]), and in 1955 (S.B. 89 [pocket vetoed by Governor Knight]). The second and third of these were applicable to both civil and criminal cases.

provision for disqualification when it appears that a party cannot have a fair trial by reason of the "prejudice" or "bias" of the judge. Code Civ.Proc. § 170, subd. 4, as added in 1897, now contained in § 170, subd. 5; see People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 403, 412-413, 56 P. 44.

[4] The Legislature, in our opinion, also acted within its power to adopt reasonable regulations when it provided that, for the limited purposes of section 170.6, prejudice may be established by the filing of an affidavit sworn to by a party or his attorney, without judicial determination of the existence of the fact. It is important, of course, not only that the integrity and fairness of the judiciary be maintained, but also that the business of the courts be conducted in such a manner as will avoid suspicion of unfairness. See Berger v. United States, 255 U.S. 22, 35-36, 41 S.Ct. 230, 65 L.Ed. 481; Haslam v. Morrison, Utah, 190 P.2d 520, 523. Prejudice, being a state of mind, is very difficult to prove, and, when a judge asserts that he is unbiased, courts are naturally reluctant to determine that he is prejudiced. In order to insure confidence in the judiciary and avoid the suspicion which might arise from the belief of a litigant that the judge is biased in a case where it may be difficult or impossible for the litigant to persuade a court that his belief is justified, the Legislature could reasonably conclude that a party should have an opportunity to obtain the disqualification of a judge for prejudice, upon a sworn statement, without being required to establish it as a fact to the satisfaction of a judicial body. Cf. People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 403, 413, 56 P. 44.

The possibility that the section may be abused by parties seeking to delay trial or to obtain a favorable judge was a matter to be balanced by the Legislature against the desirability of the objective of the statute. Moreover, section 170.6 contains safeguards designed to minimize such abuses. It permits only one challenge to each side, requires that the party or his attorney show good faith by declaring under oath that the judge is prejudiced, and provides for timely making of the challenge before trial, for strictly limited granting of continuances, and for reassignment as promptly as possible. We cannot properly assume that there will be a wholesale making of false statements under oath, and the fact that some persons may abuse the section is not a ground for holding the provision to be unconstitutional.

Statutes similar to section 170.6 have been sustained in every state where they were considered by the courts, with the exception of Oklahoma. See State ex rel. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. v. Clancy, 30 Mont. 529, 77 P. 312, 315 et seq.; State ex rel. Beach v. Fifth Judicial District Court, 53 Nev. 444, 5 P.2d 535, 537 et seq.; State ex rel. Clover Valley Lumber Co. v. Sixth Judicial District Court, 58 Nev. 456, 83 P.2d 1031, 1034; State ex rel. Hannah v. Armijo, 38 N.M. 73, 28 P.2d 511, 512 et seq.; Moruzzi v. Federal Life & Cas. Co., 42 N.M. 35, 75 P.2d 320, 115 A.L.R. 407; U'Ren v. Bagley, 118 Or. 77, 245 P. 1074, 1075 et seq., 46 A.L.R. 1173; State ex rel. Bushman v. Vandenberg, 203 Or. 326, 280 P.2d 344, 346 et seq.; Murray v. Thomas, 80 Ariz. 378, 298 P.2d 795, 797; Marsin v. Udall, 78 Ariz. 309, 279 P.2d 721, 724; Howell v. State, 77 Fla. 119, 81 So. 287, 288 et seq.; State v. Hoist, 11 Minn. 325, 126 N.W. 1090, 1091; State v. Thompson, 43 S.D. 425, 180 N.W. 73, 74; State ex rel. Nissen v. Superior Court, 122 Wash. 407, 210 P. 674, 675; State ex rel. Dunham v. Superior Court, 106 Wash. 507, 180 P. 481, 482; Murdica v. State, 22 Wyo. 196, 137 P. 574, 575-576.

The Oklahoma case of Diehl v. Crump, 72 Okl. 108, 5 A.L.R. 1272, 179 P. 4, 6, contains a statement, apparently as an alternative ground for invalidating the statute there involved, that it has been held that a law providing for the disqualification of a judge upon the mere filing of an affidavit of prejudice, without a hearing, is unconstitutional as depriving the court of judicial power. The only case cited in support of the statement, however, is Ex parte N.

K. Fairbank Co., D.C.Ala., 194 F. 978, and the Fairbank case was impliedly overruled, without discussion of the question of constitutionality, in Berger v. United States, 255 U.S. 22, 41 S.Ct. 230, 65 L.Ed. 481. See discussion of the Berger and Fairbank cases in Austin v. Lambert, 11 Cal.2d 73, 77-78, 77 P.2d 849, 115 A.L.R. 849.

Our conclusion that section 170.6 is not subject to the objections discussed above does not conflict with Austin v. Lambert, 11 Cal.2d 73, 77 P.2d 849, 115 A.L.R. 849, which, as we have seen held unconstitutional a disqualification statute enacted in 1937. That statute differed materially from section 170.6 in that it provided for a "peremptory challenge" of the judge assigned to hear the case without requiring the person making the challenge to state the ground for his objection or to make a declaration under oath that the ground in fact existed. It was condemned because it placed in the hands of a litigant the power to dislodge "without reason or for an undisclosed reason" an admittedly qualified judge, the opinion stating that this was an unwarranted and unlawful interference with the constitutional and orderly processes of the courts. 11 Cal.2d at page 79, 77 P.2d at page 853. The opinion distinguished statutes from other jurisdictions which contained an affidavit procedure similar to that prescribed by section 170.6; pointing out that they specified prejudice as a ground for disqualification and required a showing in the form of a statement under oath. 11 Cal.2d at pages 76-78, 77 P.2d at pages 851-852.

The prior case of Daigh v. Shaffer, 23 Cal.App.2d 449, 73 P.2d 927, in which no hearing by the Supreme Court was sought, also held the 1937 statute unconstitutional, using some of the reasoning later employed in Austin v. Lambert, 11 Cal.2d 73, 77 P.2d 849, 115 A.L.R. 849, and recognizing that statutes like section 170.6 are distinguish-able. While the opinion contained additional language which was not used in the Austin case, the matters referred to in these statements presented questions of policy for the Legislature and should not have been considered in determining the validity of the statute.

[5, 6] It is urged that section 170.6, because it applies only to a "civil" action or special proceeding, discriminates against parties in criminal cases in violation of federal and state constitutional provisions prohibiting unreasonable classifications. U.S.Const., Fourteenth Amendment; Cal. Const. art. I, §§ 11, 21; art. IV, § 25. The rights of parties in civil and criminal trials are, of course, different in many respects, and it should be noted in this connection that an affidavit procedure to establish prejudice has previously been made available in civil actions on more favorable terms than in criminal cases. Lowrey v. Hogue, 85 Cal. 600, 24 P. 995; Miles v. Justice's Court of Pasadena, 13 Cal.App. 454, 110 P. 349.<sup>2</sup> Wide discretion is vested in the Legislature as to the making of a classification, and every presumption is in favor of validity; the decision of the Legislature as to what constitutes a sufficient distinction to warrant the classification "will not be overthrown by the courts unless it is palpably arbitrary and beyond rational doubt erroneous." State of California, etc. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 48 Cal.2d 365, 371, 310 P.2d 7, 11; Dribin v. Superior Court, 37 Cal.2d 345, 351, 231 P.2d 809, 24 A.L.R.2d 864. In enacting section 170.6, the Legislature could have concluded that, in criminal cases, there would be a greater possibility that the right conferred by the statute would be abused, and it cannot be said that this distinction was insufficient to justify withholding the right as to such cases.

[7] Another claim of discrimination is based upon that portion of section 170.6 which relates to multiple parties. The sec-ground that a fair and impartial trial could not be had due to the prejudice of the justice or of the citizens of the township.

tion, after providing that no party or attorney may make more than one motion thereunder in any one action, declares, "* * * where there may be more than one plaintiff or similar party or more than one defendant or similar party appearing in the action or special proceeding, only one motion for each side may be made in any one action or special proceeding." We do not understand the quoted provision to mean that, where several parties are joined, they are necessarily confined to one motion regardless of how conflicting their interests may be. One motion for "each side" is permitted, and, where co-plaintiffs or co-defendants have substantially adverse interests, it is proper to conclude that there are more than two sides in the case. Such might be the situation, for example, where two drivers whose automobiles collide and injure the plaintiff are joined as defendants.

It is argued that, while a party who is the sole plaintiff or defendant may always disqualify one judge by complying with the statute, a party who is one of several plaintiffs or defendants is placed in a less favorable position. However, this is true only to a limited extent. Initially, a party who is joined with others cannot be in a worse position than a single party, since he has an equal opportunity to disqualify the judge assigned to hear the case. Such a party cannot possibly be placed at a disadvantage unless one of his co-parties has already disqualified a judge in the same action, and then only if his interests are substantially the same as the interests of the one who exercised the challenge. The Legislature could reasonably determine that this limited restriction was justified in order to prevent the undue delays which could otherwise occur, and we hold that section 170.6 does not arbitrarily discriminate against multiple parties.

Let a writ of mandate issue directing respondents to assign the case for trial to a judge other than Judge A. A. Scott.

Appendix

Section 170.6 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"(1) No judge of any superior, municipal or justice court of the State of California shall try any civil action or special proceeding of any kind or character nor hear any matter therein which involves a contested issue of law or fact when it shall be established as hereinafter provided that such judge is prejudiced against any party or attorney or the interests of any party or attorney appearing in such action or proceeding.

"(2) Any party to or any attorney appearing in any such action or proceeding may establish such prejudice by an oral or written motion without notice supported by affidavit that the judge before whom such action or proceeding is pending or to whom it is assigned is prejudiced against any such party or attorney or the interest of such party or attorney so that such party or attorney cannot or believes that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial or hearing before such judge. Where the judge assigned to or who is scheduled to try the cause or hear the matter is known at least 10 days before the date set for trial or hearing, the motion shall be made at least five days before that date. If directed to the trial of a cause where there is a master calendar, the motion shall be made to the judge supervising the master calendar not later than the time the cause is assigned for trial. In no event shall any judge entertain such motion if it be made after the drawing of the name of the first juror, or if there be no jury, after the making of an opening statement by counsel for plaintiff, or if there be no such statement, then after swearing in the first witness or the giving of any evidence or after trial of the cause has otherwise commenced. If the motion is directed to a hearing

(other than the trial of a cause), the motion must be made not later than the commencement of the hearing. In the case of trials or hearings not herein specifically provided for, the procedure herein specified shall be followed as nearly as may be.

"(3) If such motion is duly presented and such affidavit is duly filed, thereupon and without any further act or proof, the judge supervising the master calendar, if any, shall assign some other judge to try the cause or hear the matter. In other cases, the trial of the cause or the hearing of the matter shall be assigned or transferred to another judge of the court in which the trial or matter is pending or, if there is no other judge of the court in which the trial or matter is pending, the chairman of the judicial council shall assign some other judge to try such cause or hear such matter as promptly as possible. Under no circumstances shall a party or attorney be permitted to make more than one such motion in any one action or special proceeding pursuant to this section; and in actions or special proceedings where there may be more than one plaintiff or similar party or more than one defendant or similar party appearing in the action or special proceeding, only one motion for each side may be made in any one action or special proceeding.

"(4) Unless required for the convenience of the court or unless good cause is shown, a continuance of the trial or hearing shall not be granted by reason of the making of a motion under this section. If a continuance is granted, the cause or matter shall be continued from day to day or for other limited periods upon the trial or other calendar and shall be reassigned or transferred for trial or hearing as promptly as possible.

"(5) Any affidavit filed pursuant to this section shall be in substantially the following form:

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Aug. 13, 1958.

Mandate proceeding to compel real estate commissioner to set aside order suspending a real estate broker's and a real estate salesman's licenses. The Superior Court, County of Monterey, Stanley Lawson, J., rendered judgment for the petitioners, and respondent appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Dooling, J., held that where real estate broker and salesman procured binding contract for sale of property, to satisfaction of vendor, but thereafter purchaser, who nevertheless stood ready, willing and able to perform, stated he did not wish property and he did not care what broker and salesman did with it so long as he could recoup his downpayment, subsequent sale was made on behalf of purchaser and not on behalf of original vendor, and real estate broker and salesman were under no duty to account to original vendor for the proceeds of the second sale which exceeded the original purchase price.

Judgment affirmed.

In mandate proceeding to compel real estate commissioner to set aside order suspending a broker's and a salesman's licenses, suspended because, after they procured a contract for purchase of such property, purchaser stated that he did not want it and they then sold it to another, for a higher price, paying vendor what he was entitled under the original contract, evidence sustained trial court's finding that commissioner's finding that original purchaser had been unable to complete the purchase of the property was untrue but that he was ready, willing, and able to perform if required to do so.

Where real estate broker and salesman procured binding contract for sale of property, to satisfaction of vendor, but thereafter purchaser, who nevertheless stood ready, willing and able to perform, stated he did not wish property and he did not care what broker and salesman did with it so long as he could recoup his down payment, subsequent sale was made on behalf of purchaser and not on behalf of original vendor, and real estate broker and salesman were under no duty to account to original vendor for the proceeds of the second sale which exceeded the original purchase price.

DOOLING, Justice.

[1] This is an appeal by the Real Estate Commissioner from a judgment in mandate compelling him to set aside his orders suspending the broker's license of respondent McPherson for 30 days and the salesman's license of respondent Hawkins for 90 days. Since the Real Estate Commissioner is a State officer exercising statutory powers his determination in a disciplinary proceeding is subject to a trial de novo before the superior court, in which the court is entitled to exercise its independent judgment on the evidence. Code Civ.Proc. § 1094.5 (c); Moran v. State Board of Medical Examiners, 32 Cal.2d 301, 308, 196 P.2d 20. The trial court found that in the real estate transactions in question respondents were guilty of no conduct justifying the disciplinary action taken against them and the only question presented before us is whether there is sufficient evidence in the record to support the trial court's findings.

Respondent Hawkins was a licensed real estate salesman working for respondent McPherson, a licensed real estate broker. Acting for one Brewer, respondent Hawkins procured from Gee a written contract to purchase real property owned by Brewer for $17,700. Gee made a deposit of $300. Gee's contract of purchase was made conditional upon his selling a home that Gee owned in Los Altos. Hawkins testified that before the sale had been consummated Gee telephoned to Hawkins' wife and told her that he didn't like the house and wanted to get rid of it. He wanted to get his money back out of it. Hawkins talked to Gee the next day and told Gee that he would try to resell the property for him but that he would have to make a commission. Gee replied: "I don't care what you do as long as I get my $300 back." Hawkins then told Brewer that he was going to try to sell the property again for Gee. Brewer told Hawkins that he didn't care, he had a deal with Gee and didn't care what they did with the property. Hawkins procured purchasers from Gee who paid $18,500. The transaction was handled through a title company with a deed delivered by Brewer to Gee and a deed from Gee to the second purchasers. Gee put no further money into the transaction and received back his $300 deposit. Brewer received the amount to which he was entitled under his contract with Gee and Hawkins and McPherson received their commission on the sale from Brewer to Gee and the net difference in the two selling prices, less taxes and other expenses. Brewer testified that Hawkins had told him that he was reselling the property again. "I told him I didn't care how many times he sold it, as far as I was concerned I had sold it to Mr. Gee." Brewer further testified that he was not interested in the resale price or what commission was received on the second sale, that he had no complaint against anyone and was well satisfied.

[2] The critical finding of the Real Estate Commissioner reads: "By reason of their failure to inform said seller [Brewer] that the purchaser, Fred B. Gee, was unable to complete the purchase of said property, and by reason of their failure to inform said seller * * * that they had received another offer in the amount of $18,500, respondents, and each of them, fraudulently and unlawfully obtained, in addition to their commission of $885.00 paid to them by said seller, a secret and undisclosed profit of $639.98, to the loss and detriment of said seller."

The trial court found that this finding of the Commissioner and the supporting findings on which it was based are not true.

There is ample evidence to support the trial court's findings in these particulars. Hawkins testified that Gee never told him that he would not go through with the purchase and that Gee stated that if Hawkins did not succeed in reselling the property for him he would go ahead and buy it. There is the further testimony that Hawkins told Brewer that Gee wanted him to resell the property and that Brewer replied that he did not care. Brewer told Hawkins that he was satisfied to have this done at the time and he testified at the hearing that he was still satisfied.

[3] If, as the trial court found, it was not true that Gee was unable to complete the purchase the first finding of fraudulent conduct above quoted falls. The second finding of the Commissioner is necessarily dependent on the first one for the following reasons: Having negotiated a binding contract of sale to Gee for his client Brewer with which Brewer was satisfied and which he had accepted respondent Hawkins had completed the services to Brewer which he had undertaken to perform. So long as Gee was able to fulfill his contract Gee in turn was legally entitled to resell the property for his own account and to employ respondent Hawkins to make such a sale for him. This according to the findings of the trial court is what was in fact done.

[4] While a real estate salesman owes to his client the highest degree of good faith once he has secured a binding and enforceable contract with a purchaser his services to his client have been performed. No case has been cited to us holding that under such circumstances the broker breaches any duty to the first client by then undertaking in good faith to make a second sale of the same property for the purchaser.

While the evidence may have been sufficient to support the Commissioner's finding that Gee was unable to complete the purchase it equally supports the finding of the trial court that Gee was ready, able and willing to perform. The trial court was entitled to exercise its independent judgment on the effect and weight of the evidence since this was a trial de novo. Appellant cites Greif v. Dullea, 66 Cal. App.2d 986, 153 P.2d 581; Thompson v. City of Long Beach, 41 Cal.2d 235, 259 P.2d 649; and Marcucci v. Board of Equalization, 138 Cal.App.2d 605, 292 P.2d 264, to the effect that the trial court is not authorized to determine the truth or veracity of the witnesses. The first two cases dealt with local agencies and the third with a State board exercising constitutional power. Such agencies exercise judicial power which, under the decisions, is denied to a State-wide agency exercising only statutory power as here. The distinction is clearly pointed out with a citation of supporting cases in 3 Witkin, California Procedure, page 2489.

County Counsel, Los Angeles, for ap-

FOURT, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment on the verdict of a jury in favor of the plaintiff for damages and injuries suffered in an accident allegedly resulting from a defective street.

On June 24, 1955, Harold Atenese was driving the plaintiff's automobile westerly on Imperial Highway near the intersection of Imperial Highway and Luitweiler Avenue in the unincorporated territory of the County of Los Angeles. The plaintiff was riding in her automobile at the time. Imperial Highway, where the accident occurred, was being reconstructed by a construction company under a contract let by the County of Los Angeles. The work consisted, in part, of the removal of the pavement from the surface of Imperial Highway, commencing about fifty feet east of Luitweiler Avenue. During the late afternoon of the day of the accident, when it was still daylight, the plaintiff's car was traveling westerly, and the front wheels thereof struck the first drop-off between the old pavement and the gravel surface where the pavement had been removed, and then struck a "chuck hole," and the car skidded and overturned. The drop-off was at the crest of a hill such that westbound drivers could not see the drop-off or the excavated roadway until they were almost upon it.

There was evidence that a water line under Imperial Highway, at the place of the accident, had been leaking for months, and that before the contractors had started excavating and repaving, there was a hole caused by the leaking water which extended from the edge of the asphalt into the paved portion of the roadway. The hole began two feet north of the asphalt and extended from one foot to one and one-half feet into the asphalt and was six to eighteen inches in depth and up to two to two and one-half feet wide. It was wet and stayed that way until June 27, 1955. After the paving was removed the hole remained but got larger. The county inspector saw the "damp spot." There was also testimony that the condition was reported to the Los Angeles County Health Department and to "someone in a County Road Department car" long before the construction work started.

The excavated roadway consisted of "washboards" and loose gravel. The roadway was heavily traveled and the traffic tended to loosen the rock and create holes and ruts which required the contractor's smoothing and grading the surface every few days to prevent it from being hazardous. Two days before the accident the contractor's employees went out on strike and no work was being performed at the time of the accident. There was testimony of a long-existing six-inch hole three yards west of the drop-off. There was also evidence that during the twelve days prior to the accident, cars on the roadway struck something on the road so hard that "it * * * jarred the house" and "occurred pretty near 24 hours a day," and of the hubcaps being forced off of the cars by reason of these impacts.

During the period of time between the commencement of the construction work and the accident there had been placed and maintained two advance warning signs and a barricade to warn drivers of the construction work. The first sign was of a type designated by the State Department of Public Works as a "W35R" wherein the word "Slow" is written in reflectorized letters on a yellow background, and was mounted on a post to the side of the highway about 300 feet from the termination of the pavement, and is in the category of the ordinary "warning signs" commonly placed on highways. The planning manual of instructions issued by the Department of Public Works, Division of Highways, states with reference to this particular type of sign, "This sign must be sparingly used to prevent ineffectiveness."

A second sign of a type designated as "P. R.," consisting of the words, "Construction Zone—Drive Carefully," in six inch high black letters on a yellow background about 84 inches by 60 inches, was mounted between two posts about 100 feet from the termination of the pavement. The manual heretofore referred to, states in part with reference to this sign, "Use the P. R. sign in pairs to bracket the individual sections of a project where traffic is affected by construction work. Several pairs may be needed on one construction project * * *," and are to be located "on the right 100 feet to 800 feet in advance of construction activities." This sign is in the category of "Construction Type Signs" and, as the manual indicates, "on major highways, particularly where speeds are high, larger signs may be required," and "[d]ue to unusual conditions encountered on construction projects, the position may be varied to obtain maximum effectiveness."

A third sign, apparently not of the type described or set forth in the "Uniform Sign Chart" of the Department of Public Works, had, most of the time prior to the accident, been located in the center of the highway about 50 feet from the end of the pavement. This sign consisted of the word "Slow" in block letters a foot high, mounted on a barricade and equipped with an orange flasher. On one occasion the sign was placed on the shoulder of the highway, but appellant states in its brief that, " * * * at the time of the accident, this sign was apparently lying in the grass at the side of the road."

The job site was inspected regularly by a county inspector, and although the appellant states in its brief that the inspector " * * * testified that all warning signs were in place on the morning of the day of the accident," we find that the following is the testimony of the inspector:

"Q. Did you see it there on the 23rd? A. I visited the project on the 23rd, Mr. Sprague, to examine the signs, and I do not recall that it had been moved.

"Q. Do you have a recollection of visiting there and seeing the signs on the 24th, or would it help your recollection if you were allowed to read your deposition on that subject? A. I have a record here of the time of day of my visit on the 24th at 10:15, and the purpose of my visit to Imperial and Luitweiler on June 24th was to examine the condition of the roadway, the signs, barricades, lights in place.

"Q. Is it your recollection that you saw the signs there, based upon the notation in your record? A. Well, as I say, I visited the project for that purpose. I have no record in here that anything was amiss.

"Q. Is the absence of any such record upon which you base your statement that the signs, and particularly the flasher light sign was in the center of Imperial Highway on the 24th of June? A. I think I would have noted anything amiss if I had noticed it."

Before the trial the plaintiff received $3,500 from the co-defendants (among them the construction company), and gave them a covenant not to sue and filed a dismissal as to said defendants.

The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $15,000, from which the $3,500 above referred to was deducted. This appeal followed.

Appellant contends that there was no evidence to support a finding that there was notice to the Board of Supervisors, or other person employed by the county authorized to remedy the dangerous or defective condition; that the driver of the car was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and his negligence was imputed to the plaintiff; that the dismissal as to the co-defendants of appellant constituted a release as to the appellant; that the jury was erroneously instructed, and that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions.

[1] It is conceded that the Public Liability Act, section 53051 of the Government Code, is the sole basis for imposing liability in this case.

In our opinion it was a question of fact whether the county inspector had notice of the condition at the place of the accident and if he did have knowledge, such knowledge is chargeable to the county. See, Murphy v. County of Lake, 106 Cal.App. 2d 61, 234 P.2d 712; Balkwill v. City of Stockton, 50 Cal.App.2d 661, 123 P.2d 596; Newman v. County of San Mateo, 121 Cal. App.2d 825, 264 P.2d 594; Allen v. City of Los Angeles, 43 Cal.App.2d 65, 110 P.2d 75; Ackers v. City of Los Angeles, 40 Cal. App.2d 50, 104 P.2d 399; Bridges v. County of Los Angeles, 131 Cal.App.2d 151, 280 P.2d 76.

While we are cognizant of the ruling in Electrical Products Corp. v. County of Tulare, 116 Cal.App.2d 147, 253 P.2d 111, we do not consider it to be determinative of the present controversy, in which a different factual situation is before the court.

Appellant insists that the legislature has placed the responsibility for establishing uniform types of warning signs in the State Department of Public Works, and cites section 465.7, Vehicle Code, which in part reads:

"The State Department of Public Works shall determine and publicize the specifications for uniform types of warning signs, lights and devices to be placed upon a highway by any person, firm or corporation engaged in performing work which interferes or endangers the safe movement of traffic upon such highway."

Further, appellant states that the State having occupied the field, so to speak, the county would not be authorized to vary the requirements. Section 465(b) of the Vehicle Code provides, in part, as follows: "Local authorities * * * may place and maintain or cause to be placed and maintained, such appropriate signs, signals or other traffic control devices as * * * may be necessary properly to * * * warn or guide traffic."

It apparently is admitted in this case that the number three sign which was "lying in the grass at the side of the road," was not of the type specified by the State Department of Public Works.

[2] Appellant next asserts that the driver of the plaintiff's car was negligent as a matter of law. The basis of the assertion is that the driver failed to obey the signs erected and therefore he did not exercise ordinary care. The County inspector testified, "I guess for the most part the traveling public observed the signs, slowed down to 40 to 50." The traffic was heavy over the particular road; it was a 55 mile per hour zone, and prior to seeing the third sign the driver was traveling at about 50 to 55 miles per hour. He decreased his speed to 40 to 45 miles per hour. Whether his failure to see the signs, if he did not see them, was negligence under the circumstances and whether such was the proximate cause of the damages, were issues of fact for the jury to determine. Rath v. Bankston, 101 Cal.App. 274, 281, 281 P. 1081; Pittam v. City of Riverside, 128 Cal.App. 57, 16 P.2d 768; Owen v. City of Los Angeles, 82 Cal.App. 2d 933, 187 P.2d 860.

[3] The court upon its own motion gave the following instruction:

"I have read to you certain provisions of the Vehicle Code of this State. You are instructed that you are to consider a violation of all or any of these statutory provisions in relation to the conduct of the driver of the automobile owned by the plaintiff and in which she was riding at the time of the accident in question in determining whether or not said driver was negligent and if such negligence, if you find he was negligent, was a proximate cause of the accident and resulting injuries suffered by plaintiff. These instructions are to be construed in the light of all other instructions in this case.

"Therefore you may consider whether the warning signals were so placed and of such size and nature that a reasonably prudent and observant driver would have seen them, or should have seen them in the exercise of due care at the particular place and time of the accident in question, and whether, taking into consideration all of the facts and circumstances the said driver was driving at a speed greater than was reasonable and prudent, and if you find that in the exercise of due care a reasonably prudent and cautious driver would have looked and seen said warning signals and would have reduced the speed of the car he was driving and brought it under such control that the accident would have not happened, regardless of the condition in, on or about the roadway at the time, then you would be justified in finding the said driver was negligent. The determination of the weight or effect of the evidence is the exclusive province of the jury, and if you determine from all the facts and circumstances that the weight of evidence does not preponderate or have more convincing force to establish the affirmative defense of contributory negligence, then you would be justified in finding that the driver of plaintiff's car was not guilty of contributory negligence.

"But such finding last referred to, standing alone, would not support a verdict for plaintiff, unless you also find that the defendant County of Los Angeles is liable under the provisions of the Public Liability Act as covered in other instructions."

In effect, the court's instruction stated to the jury: (1) that the jury was to consider a violation of all or any of the statutory provisions in determining if the driver was negligent and, if so, if his negligence was a proximate cause of the accident; (2) that the jury was to consider whether, under all of the facts and circumstances of the case, the plaintiff's driver acted as a reasonable and prudent driver in doing what he did; and (3) that if he did not, the jury would be justified in finding he was negligent.

Appellant insists that the instruction was erroneous as given by the court, and that it should have given an instruction based upon B.A.J.I. 149.1. We believe that the instruction as given by the court was proper, and that the instruction requested by the appellant based on B.A.J.I. 149.1 would have been confusing to the jury in that it contains language in effect stating that "the evidence must support a finding that the violation resulted from causes or things beyond the control of the person charged with the violation."

[4] We think that there is no merit to the claim of the appellant that the dismissal for a consideration of certain co-defendants constitutes a release of the appellant. See, Kincheloe v. Retail Credit Co., Inc., 4 Cal.2d 21, 46 P.2d 971; Holtz v. United Plumbing & Heating Co., 49 Cal. 2d 501, 319 P.2d 617; Lewis v. Johnson, 12 Cal.2d 558, 86 P.2d 99; Gerald v. San Francisco Unified School District, 121 Cal. App.2d 761, 264 P.2d 90.

It is uncontradicted that the plaintiff gave certain of the defendants a covenant not to sue at a time when the statute of limitations had run on plaintiff's cause of action, for which she received $3,500, and directed the dismissal of the action as to those particular defendants. There was no thought of abandoning the action against the county. The parties who engaged in and made such an agreement were entitled to do so, but any dismissal as to the defendants paying the $3,500, operating as a bar to proceeding against the county was completely contrary to the intent of the parties.

[5] A complete reading of all of the instructions given by the court considered with the evidence convinces us that the jury was properly instructed. Appellant insists that the basis of liability must exist because of section 53051 of the Government Code, and therefore the giving of instructions respecting general negligence was clearly erroneous. Suffice it to say that the claimed negligence of the driver was before the jury because of the contentions of the appellant, and instructions on the subject were necessary for the jury properly to evaluate the conduct of the driver. Under the circumstances, the instructions as to principal and agent were proper. And as the respondent has set forth in her brief:

"The instruction regarding the inability of the County to abdicate its duty to exercise proper supervision over the work of third persons improving its streets was necessary to advise the jury that, where the requirements of the Public Liability Act were otherwise met, the County could not escape liability for a dangerous or defective condition simply because someone else created it or, in violation of its contract with the County, allowed it to remain or failed to warn thereof. Waldorf v. [City of] Alhambra, 6 Cal.App.2d 522 [45 P.2d 207]. Mulder v. City of Los Angeles, 110 Cal.App. 663 [294 P. 485].

"Since full instructions were given on the requirements for plaintiff to prove a case under the Public Liability Act, and thus no prejudicial error could result, any error which existed would not constitute ground for reversal. Silva v. Fresno County, 63 Cal.App.2d 253 [146 P.2d 520]."

[6, 7] As to the assertion that a violation of the penal provisions of the Vehicle Code is negligence per se, the correct rule is stated in Satterlee v. Orange Glenn School Dist., 29 Cal.2d 581, at page 590, 177 P.2d 279, at page 284:

"In the application of this rule each violation of a statutory requirement must be considered in connection with the surrounding circumstances. Ordinarily, the excuse relied upon by the violator presents a question of fact for the jury's determination. As stated in Scalf v. Eicher, supra, 11 Cal.App.2d [44] at page 54, 53 P.2d [368] at page 373: 'Whether or not a violation of a statute or ordinance proximately contributed to an accident and whether the violation was excusable or justifiable are questions of fact except in a case where * * * the court is impelled to say that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his injury.'" (Citing cases.)"

[8] The court also instructed as to the life expectancy of the plaintiff, but omitted the qualifying conditions about normal health. As said in Newman v. Campbell, 23 Cal.App.2d 639, at page 641, 73 P.2d 1265, at page 1266:

"If the appellant desired an instruction explaining in more detail the weight to be given the elements fixing her life expectancy * * * such an instruction should have been offered. This was not done, and in the circumstances appellant has no ground for complaint."

[9] Appellant's last contention is that the jury should have been instructed that it is presumed that official duty has been regularly performed. Code Civ.Proc. § 1963, subd. 15. Under the circumstances of this case we are of the opinion that it was not error to omit such an instruction.

We have considered the remaining assertions and contentions of appellant not herein particularly pointed out, but we deem it unnecessary to comment further thereupon.

We find no prejudicial error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

DOOLING, Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment for defendant in an action based on allegations charging abuse of process in the garnishment of his accrued wages owed to him by his employer. The action in which the attachments issued resulted in a judgment against appellant.

The gist of the present action is stated in paragraph VII of the Complaint: "That defendant, with full knowledge that plaintiff was entitled to have his wages exempted from attachment under Section 690.11 of the Code of Civil Procedure * * * and with knowledge that further attachments of his wages would result in his discharge by his employer, did * * * maliciously and wilfully and with the intent to vex, harass and injure plaintiff and to deprive him of his said wages and * * * to cause said Bethlehem Steel Corporation to discharge plaintiff * * * and to cause and compel plaintiff in order to prevent his discharge to use said wages * * *" to the satisfaction of his indebtedness to defendant cause and direct the garnishments to be levied upon his claims for wages.

The claim of abuse of process is twofold: 1. that defendant caused the attachments to be levied knowing that plaintiff was entitled to an exemption under Code of Civil Procedure section 690.11; and 2. that defendant knowing that further attachments would cause his discharge levied such attachments wilfully and maliciously to compel plaintiff to apply the exempt wages to the payment of his debt to avoid being discharged.

[1] On the second ground the trial court found that defendant did not know that the attachment of plaintiff's wages would result in his discharge and did not intend to cause him to be discharged. The court further found that while plaintiff's employment was terminated on March 12, 1954, this was because of lack of work and not because of the attachment of his wages. While there was a conflict in the evidence these findings are all supported by substantial direct evidence.

[2] Section 690.11, Code of Civil Procedure, exempts absolutely one-half of a defendant's wages earned within 30 days. As to the other one-half it provides an exemption "if necessary for the use of the debtor's family." The evidence shows and the court found that three levies under writ of attachment were made by defendant: on February 18, February 24, and March 4, 1954. On the levy of February 18 plaintiff claimed only the one-half exemption and the sheriff immediately released such one-half. On the February 24 levy plaintiff claimed a total exemption which claim was contested by defendant, the court granting the total exemption after a hearing on March 12, 1954. Following this order the claim of total exemption on the March 4 levy was not contested by defendant.

The recital of these facts demonstrates the futility of appellant's position on appeal. The action was on a promissory note and it is not questioned that resort to the remedy of attachment was proper. The absolute exemption of one-half plaintiff's wages on the first levy was automatically granted and that part of his wages immediately released. As to the other one-half he had asserted no claim of exemption when the second levy was made and before defendant received notice of such claim the third levy had already been directed and the trial court found that the notice of such claim was received by defendant "after the issuance of instructions" for the third levy "and too late for said instructions to be recalled." There is no showing in the evidence that defendant knew before the court's order of March 12 that plaintiff's claim of total exemption was valid. No further levies were made after that date.

[3] There is no showing that defendant acted other than in good faith in pursuing his admitted right of attachment or took any further steps after appellant's right to exemption was established. The findings negative the bad motive or ulterior purpose which is essential to the action where the process is regularly issued and employed. Crews v. Mayo, 165 Cal. 493, 495, 132 P. 1032; Pimentel v. Houk, 101 Cal.App.2d 884, 226 P.2d 739.

Appellant, appearing in pro. per., attempts to reargue conflicts in the evidence which have been resolved against him by the trial court. He also complains that the trial court refused to permit him to introduce some evidence on damages. He suffered no prejudice in this since the judgment went against him on the merits. Nor did he suffer prejudice by the court's refusal to permit him to "read some law" since under the facts found the law could not have helped him.

Julius H. Selinger, San Rafael, for appellants.

Gardiner, Riede & Elliott, San Rafael, for respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

In an action for declaratory relief and for a money judgment brought by the assignee of several creditors against numerous defendants, the trial court determined that the three partners of Gran-Wood Company were personally liable for certain goods and services furnished by plaintiff's assignors. From the judgment so holding the three partners appeal.

The record discloses that in November of 1951 there existed a partnership known as the Gran-Wood Company, engaged in the purchase, development and sale of vacant and improved real estate. This company had three partners, H. B. Granlee, John F. Woodson and Julius H. Selin-ger. At that time there also existed another partnership known as Gaither & Boe, engaged in the contracting business. This partnership had two partners—Floyd Gaither and Carl S. Boe—both licensed contractors.

On November 12, 1951, Gran-Wood entered into a contract with Gaither & Boe. One of the basic questions involved on this appeal is whether such contract created a partnership, or whether Gaither & Boe simply became independent contractors under it. The trial court came to the conclusion that it created a partnership.

Under the terms of this contract Gran-Wood employed Gaither & Boe for the construction of all homes and other structures to be erected upon lands to be acquired by Gran-Wood. Gaither & Boe agreed not to engage in any other contracting work for any other person. In the event that other construction jobs were offered to Gaither & Boe they had to be first submitted to Gran-Wood for approval as to price, time and location, and, if approved, were then to be subject to all the terms of this contract. Gaither & Boe agreed that they would make a firm bid on all construction jobs, and that such bid would be actual cost plus 5%. If the job was completed at a cost less than the firm bid, the cost to Gran-Wood was to be reduced accordingly, and, if the cost exceeded the firm bid, Gran-Wood was to pay Gaither & Boe the amount of such excess up to 5% of the firm bid. The prevailing customs and usages of the contracting business and related trades as to modes of financing and payments on the installment plan were to be applicable to all transactions under the contract. Title to all lands involved, before, during, and after construction, and until the property was sold, was to remain in Gran-Wood or its nominees. Gran-Wood undertook to use its best efforts, skill and judgment in the selection of land to be developed, and agreed that land acquired by it under the agreement should be carried on its books at its actual cost of acquisition and development. Profits of the venture were to be divided as follows:

"(a) Of the first $40,000.00 of net profits made per annum by Gran-Wood Company, Gaither & Boe shall be credited with 50% thereof.

"(b) If and when net profits of Gran-Wood Company shall exceed $40,000.00 and shall be between $40,000.00 and $50,000.-00 Gaither & Boe shall be credited on the books of Gran-Wood Company with $20,000.00 per annum plus 10% of any excess over $40,000.00.

"(c) If and when the aggregate net profits of Gran-Wood Company shall amount to $50,000.00 or more per annum, Gaither & Boe shall, in lieu of formulas (a) and (b) of this paragraph, be credited on the books of Gran-Wood Company with 40% of such net profits."

It was also provided that in addition to sharing in the profits arising out of the construction of dwellings, Gaither & Boe were to share, according to a fixed formula, in the net profits derived from the resale of any land acquired by Gran-Wood and sold by it as undeveloped property.

Granlee and Woodson, two of the partners in Gran-Wood, who were realtors, were to have the exclusive rights to sell for a 3% commission the various properties involved at prices fixed by Gran-Wood and approved by Gaither & Boe.

It was expressly provided that resale prices and selection of vacant or improved property, the terms of sale and financing of such property, and the determination as to the type, cost and suitability of each structure were to be determined by mutual consent. This was to be equally true of all other matters of policy directly affecting the character of the development involved. The contract also provided for a settlement of accounts between the parties as each unit was sold and when the profits therefor became ascertainable with due regard being given to the expiration of lien periods on each project.

The contract contained this provision: "Neither of the contracting parties herein shall be liable to any third person, firm, or corporation for the debt, default or undertaking, contract or tort of the other contracting party, but shall be answerable only for its own acts or omissions."

The contract was to remain in effect for three years, unless either party gave written notice of termination to the other, which each was empowered to do.

In January of 1952, under this contract, Gaither & Boe commenced construction of five houses, on which the firm bid was $13,000 each. About March of 1952 the partners in Gran-Wood learned that the construction was defective in that the foundations and retaining walls were not adequate. Construction was stopped until remedial measures could be taken. The city of San Rafael condemned the structures as unsafe. Following this, and within the time provided by law, a number of subcontractors and materialmen filed mechanics' liens against the property, claiming that both Gaither & Boe and Gran-Wood were personally liable for the amounts involved. Gran-Wood denied any such liability.

Several of the lien claimants assigned their claims to Samuel W. Gardiner, an attorney, and the plaintiff in this action. There then ensued some correspondence between Gardiner and Selinger, also an attorney, and a partner in Gran-Wood. This correspondence ultimately resulted in what the participants called a "deal." The second major disagreement of the parties is whether this "deal" constituted a novation or was a mere executory accord. The trial court held that it was not a novation.

Under the terms of this "deal," as disclosed by the correspondence, Gran-Wood, while disclaiming any personal liability for the debts here involved, offered, and Gardiner on behalf of his clients accepted, a proposition under which Gran-Wood agreed to proceed with salvage operations and completion of three of the five buildings involved, and to demolish the two that could not be salvaged. The mechanics' lien claimants agreed to waive their claim of personal liability against Gran-Wood and its partners and to withdraw or release their liens on the five structures. When the three buildings were completed and sold, there was to be a pro rata distribution among the creditors involved.

Pursuant to this agreement, Gran-Wood resumed operations with a new contractor. One of the three buildings was partially completed and sold in an unfinished state. The foundation work was never completed on any of the other buildings because Gran-Wood discovered that the cost would be in an amount that Gran-Wood was unwilling to pay.

Subsequently, Floyd Gaither and Carl Boe were adjudicated to be bankrupts. These two persons, while defendants in the present action in the court below, are not parties to this appeal, since they have not appealed from the judgment.

The trial court found that the lien claims of plaintiff's assignors had become valueless prior to the filing of the present action because the property was of less value than the deeds of trust of Hunter Investment Company, which deeds of trust were prior in right to the lien claims.

The trial court also found that the appellants did not perform the proposals agreed upon in the second contract, and further found that this second agreement was intended as a means of paying the existing claims, and that the proposals contained therein were intended to be prospective in nature and operative at a future time because the parties did not intend that appellants were to be instantly discharged from liability. All the waivers, releases and discharges contained in the agreement were found to have been intended by the parties to be contingent upon actual performance by the appellants of their obligations under the agreement. The court thereupon concluded that the first contract was a partnership contract between Gai-ther, Boe, Granlee, Woodson and Selinger; that respondent's assignors supplied goods and services under that contract to the partnership, and that the acts of Gaither & Boe were performed as partners and under the partnership agreement. The correspondence between Gardiner and Selinger and the resulting agreement did not constitute a novation. Gardiner was held entitled to a judgment on behalf of his clients and against Granlee, Woodson and Selinger upon a quantum meruit in the sum of $5,205.70. Those three persons appeal.

Appellants challenge the conclusion of law that the first contract created a partnership, claiming that there is no evidence and no findings to the effect that this contract created a partnership. The record shows that the parties submitted to the trial court certain issues prior to the main trial. This was a pre-trial proceeding before the pre-trial procedure as we now know it was authorized by the rules. But even before pre-trial counsel could, of course, stipulate to the trial of certain issues to be tried separately from the other issues. That was the legal effect of what was here done.

After these separate issues had been submitted to the trial court, and before the main trial, the court entered a minute order which stated that "two questions were submitted to the Court for its pre-trial decision," and then stated the first question and its answer as follows:

"1. Whether the agreement attached as Exhibit A to the complaint in the above entitled cause constituted a partnership agreement under which H. B. Granlee, John F. Woodson and Julius H. Selinger became co-partners with Floyd Gaither and Carl S. Boe or whether said Gaither and Boe became independent contractors under said agreement and whether the members of Gran-Wood Company under said agreement became liable to the creditors of Gaither and Boe.

"This Court has for all practical purposes settled said question in the matter of Hunter Investment Company v. Gran-

Wood, tried in the above entitled Court commencing on January 24, 1956, in which action the identical agreement was before this Court.

"In lieu of a written opinion herein the Court makes reference to the comments of the Court upon the decision in said action contained in the notes of the shorthand reporter."

The minute order then recites that the second question submitted to it was whether the second contract was a novation or executory accord, and answered that question as follows:

"The Court is of the opinion that said correspondence termed by counsel herein as a 'deal' amounts to no more than an accord without satisfaction and without extinction of the obligations theretofore existing and did not approximate the dignity of a Novation.

"The Court inclines to the view that the original obligations remain in force."

[1] No extrinsic evidence was offered at the pre-trial hearing on these issues, the two contracts being submitted to the court for its interpretation as a matter of law. The court's pre-trial determination amounted to a holding that the contracts were not ambiguous or uncertain, and that their interpretation was a matter of law. Whether a contract is ambiguous or uncertain is a question of law, and if it is held not to be ambiguous or uncertain the interpretation of the contract becomes a question of law. This is elementary. (See discussion and collection of cases, 12 Cal. Jur.2d p. 324, § 119.)

So far as the first contract is concerned, the court determined that it created a partnership between the contracting parties. Certainly the agreement is not ambiguous or uncertain on this point. The terms of the agreement demonstrate without ambiguity that this is what the parties intended. The provisions for sharing profits, and giving each party an equal voice on all major policy matters can have no other meaning.

The case of Constans v. Ross, 106 Cal. App.2d 381, 235 P.2d 113, is directly in point, and very similar as to its facts to the instant one. There, two realtors and a contractor entered into a contract whereby the realtors were to secure suitable building locations and the contractor was to erect residences thereon. The realtors were to make arrangements for financing, and provide the plans and specifications. A formula for the division of profits was set forth in the agreement. Materialmen sued both the realtors and the contractor, and secured a judgment against them. This was affirmed. The court held that under the terms of the agreement the realtors were partners of the contractor, and, as such, liable for the debts contracted by the partnership, and stated (106 Cal.App. 2d at page 386, 235 P.2d at page 116): "The question of the existence of a partnership depends primarily upon the intention of the parties ascertained from the terms of the agreement and from the surrounding circumstances. [Citations.] Ordinarily the existence of a partnership is evidenced by the right of the respective parties to participate in the profits and losses and in the management of the business. [Citations.] In ascertaining the intention of the parties, where they have entered into a written agreement, such intention should be determined chiefly from the terms of the writing. [Citation.] While the question of whether a partnership exists is to be determined from the nature of the relation agreed upon rather than the name which the parties have given to it, some weight must be given to the language of the parties themselves. [Citations.] It is the intention as evidenced by the terms of the agreement, and not the subjective or undisclosed intention of the parties, that controls."

The court then referred to the pertinent provisions of the contract, and summarized the evidence as to the conduct of the parties in carrying out its terms, and then pointed out that the apportionment of duties between the partners was not indicative of a non-partnership intent and that the fact profits and losses were not equally shared did not compel a conclusion that no partnership existed, and then concluded (106 Cal.App.2d at page 389, 235 P.2d at page 118): "Considering the terms of the agreement here involved and the conduct and activities of the parties thereto in carrying on the business, the conclusion is impelled that a partnership existed. The agreement discloses an association for the purpose of carrying on a business and dividing the profits. And the agreement for division of profits implies an agreement also to bear the losses."

Appellants correctly point out that in the Constans case the contract was not interpreted solely from its terms but oral evidence of the surrounding circumstances were presented to and considered by the trial court, and then urge that in the instant case "our complaint is that no evidence was permitted to be offered." (App.Rep. Br. p. 8.)

The record does not show that appellants, either at the pre-trial hearing or at the main trial made any offer of any such evidence. But at the oral argument, and in a brief filed after oral argument, appellants, while conceding that no such offer at any time was made, argue that at the pre-trial hearing the court ruled without such evidence that the contract created a partnership, that this was in effect a summary judgment on the issues decided, and made the offer of any such evidence at the trial futile.

[2] These arguments are fallacious. The contending parties, prior to the main trial, submitted two issues to the court. These issues were presented by simply submitting the documents involved. If appellants desired to submit any extrinsic evidence that was the time to have done so. This they did not do. This so-called pre-trial hearing, was nothing more than the submission, by agreement, to the trial court of certain issues to be separately decided. Assuming that appellants have extrinsic evidence relevant to the issue, and the nature of such evidence has not been divulged, the time to have offered it was when the issue of interpretation was before the court.

[3] In the second place, the minute order made after the pre-trial hearing was only interlocutory and was not a final order. If at the time of the main trial appellants desired to offer extrinsic evidence on the issue, they could have asked the judge to change his ruling that such question was one of law, and could and should have made an offer to produce such evidence. This, appellants did not do. It is too late to object now.

[4] A third reason why no error could possibly have occurred in reference to this matter, is that the trial court properly held that the first contract, without ambiguity and as a matter of law, created a partnership. Extrinsic evidence was not admissible, therefore, to interpret it. The terms of the contract in this respect are clear and unequivocal.

[5] Appellants place some reliance on the provision that neither contracting party was to be liable for the debt, default, undertaking, contract or tort of the other. Whatever effect such provision may have had as between the partners themselves, it can have no effect on the partner's liability to third persons. As stated in San Joaquin Light & Power Corp. v. Costaloupes, 96 Cal.App. 322, 334, 274 P. 84, 89: "The courts will not countenance contrivances for giving persons the whole of the advantage of a partnership, without subjecting them to the liabilities, and an agreement which attempts to carry out a joint venture for the mutual profit of the adventurers and evade their responsibility for losses may be enforced and construed as creating a partnership."

[6] The next argument of appellants is that all of respondent's assignors extended credit exclusively to the contractors, Gaither & Boe, at a time when they did not know of Gran-Wood's relationship to the transaction, and therefore even if Gaither & Boe, as partners, were agents of Gran-Wood, the agents alone are liable. An attempt is made to bring this case within the rule of Rigney v. De La Salle Institute, 10 Cal.App.2d 492, 52 P.2d 579. There the plaintiffs, as here, were materialmen and subcontractors who had furnished the contractor with labor and material used in the construction of certain buildings for the defendant. The appellate court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs, pointing out that the evidence demonstrated that the plaintiffs had extended the credits solely and exclusively to the contractor, who was defendant's agent. After completion of the building the plaintiffs executed and delivered final lien waivers to the contractor, thus accepting his exclusive credit for the payment of the debts, and releasing the property from all liability. The court quite properly held that under such a state of facts it would be improper to hold the owner personally responsible, stating (10 Cal. App.2d at page 499, 52 P.2d at page 582): "The authorities amply bear out the conclusion that where exclusive credit is extended to the agent, regardless of any agreement by the parties, the rule of liability of an undisclosed principal is inapplicable, and the parties stand in the same relation as if the principal had at all times been disclosed. [Citations.]" (See also Hayward's v. Nelson, 143 Cal.App.2d 807, 299 P.2d 1013.)

The rule of these cases is not here applicable for the simple reason that there is no showing in the record to show that respondent's assignors extended the credits exclusively to Gaither & Boe. If appellants desired to raise that defense to escape the normal rules of agency, they should have produced, or offered to produce, evidence on the issue. This they did not do.

Certainly, in the absence of any such evidence, the mere fact that respondent's assignors did not know of the Gran-Wood, Gaither & Boe, contract when they furnished labor and materials does not preclude them from now holding the partners of Gran-Wood. If this were the law then all the rules relating to the liability of an undisclosed principal would be meaningless. As this court stated in Luce v. Sutton, 115

Cal.App.2d 428, 433, 252 P.2d 352, 355: "It is a settled rule of the law of agency that a principal is responsible to third persons for the ordinary contracts and obligations of his agent with third persons made in the course of the business of the agency and within the scope of the agent's powers as such, although made in the name of the agent and not purporting to be other than his own personal obligation or contract." Geary St. Park & Ocean R. Co. v. Rolph, 189 Cal. 59, 64, 207 P. 539, 541. "A creditor may sue an undisclosed principal when found although he may not have known of the existence of such principal at the time the debt was incurred." Hulsmann v. Ireland, 205 Cal. 345, 352, 270 P. 948, 951."

In Wahyou v. Kiernan, 145 Cal.App.2d 443, 445, 302 P.2d 638, 639, the court announced the same elementary rule, and then stated: "Again, here * * * there was no intervening circumstance such as was present in Rigney v. De La Salle Institute, 10 Cal.App.2d 492, 52 P.2d 579, which would warrant a conclusion by this court that credit had been extended exclusively to Hemley, and it is only by such a circumstance that the defendant can escape liability under the general rule previously set forth."

If this is the rule as to undisclosed principals, and it clearly is, it certainly applies to an undisclosed partner. If a case is necessary to support such an obvious rule it is to be found in Schwaegler Co. v. Marchesotti, 88 Cal.App.2d 738, 199 P.2d 331, where the court laid down the rule by quoting from Bissell v. King, 91 Cal.App. 420, 267 P. 356, as follows (at page 743 of 88 Cal.App.2d, at page 334 of 199 P.2d):

"* * * Thus, in cases of secret partnership and dormant partners, a creditor is entitled to recover from all the partners when discovered, though the debt was not originally charged to all [citation], and even though one partner holds himself out as the sole owner, the ostensible partner is the agent of the dormant one, and the latter is bound by his representations."

"And in Section 500 of the text of Rowley on Partnership, last cited, it is said:

"* * * As a rule, he [the dormant or undisclosed partner] is liable to the firm creditors to the same extent as if he were known to the creditor at the time the credit was obtained, under the doctrine that an undisclosed principal is liable for the acts of his agent. * * * If the dormant partner be completely so, and not known as such to the firm creditor, he will be liable to the firm creditor for indebtedness incurred by the firm to the creditor during the dormant partner's connection with the firm, * * *." (See, generally, Lindner v. Friednash, Cal.App., 325 P.2d 612.)

[7, 8] Thus, the trial court was correct in concluding that the contract created a partnership between Gran-Wood and Gaither & Boe, and in holding that this rendered appellants liable for the goods and services furnished to Gaither & Boe and used in the construction of the partnership buildings. We do not find it necessary to determine whether the trial court was correct in simply concluding that a partnership existed, and in not making a finding to that effect, because this court, if such finding were necessary, could and would make it under the power conferred by section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure. If we were to exercise such power such finding would, for reasons already stated, be in precise accord with the conclusion of law of the trial court.

The second main attack of appellants is on the findings to the effect that the second agreement did not constitute a novation. Appellants urge that appellants' assignors, at best, had a doubtful right to enforce personal liability against Gran-Wood, and that the substitute agreement constituted a compromise of that right. They urge, therefore, that the second agreement was a novation under the rule announced in Bennett v. Bennett, 219 Cal. 153, 25 P.2d 426. That case held that a compromise of a disputed and doubtful claim is enforceable as a novation. Appellants rely on language of Gardiner contained in one of the letters constituting the contract to the effect that "We now understand that we have a definite deal as between ourselves, and that it is only contingent upon obtaining that approval from Hunter," which was admittedly later obtained, and claim such language demonstrates that the second agreement replaced the first.

In the instant case, the second agreement was not performed. Had it been, it would have constituted an accord and satisfaction, and respondent could claim no rights under the first contract. In such event it would have become a substitute for that contract. Appellants would have us believe that the respondent's assignors intended to give up all existing rights against Gran-Wood in return for the mere promise of Gran-Wood to perform the second contract. The right against Gran-Wood being asserted by respondent's assignors was not a highly doubtful right, as appellants assert, but was a clear and obvious right. The mere fact that appellants refused to recognize it did not make it a doubtful right. To contend that respondent's assignors intended to surrender, completely, that right in return for the mere promise of Gran-Wood to perform the second agreement is contrary to ordinary business practice.

Interestingly enough, such contention is also contrary to the position taken by appellants in their answer to the complaint in which they denied that the second agreement "was or is a substituted agreement or a compromise agreement," alleging that there was no previous agreement at all for which the second could be a substitute or compromise.

Under the law the second agreement was clearly an executory accord and not a novation. A novation is defined in section 1530 of the Civil Code as the "substitution of a new obligation for an existing one." Section 1531 provides how it is made. It requires that the substitution be with the intent to extinguish the old obligation. An accord, on the other hand, is "an agreement to accept, in extinction of an obligation, something different from or less than that to which the person agreeing to accept is entitled." Civ.Code, § 1521. The next sections provide that an accord does not extinguish the obligation until it is executed. Acceptance of such performance by the creditor is the satisfaction of the accord.

[9] Under these sections, which codify general law on the subject, a novation extinguishes one obligation by accepting for it another, that is, the creditor agrees to accept the second promise for his existing claim. But this is not true of an accord. Here it is not the new promise that is accepted in lieu of the existing claim, but the performance of that new promise. In 1 Cal. Jur.2d p. 276, § 34, the applicable principles supported by many authorities are stated as follows:

"Acceptance by the creditor of the consideration of an accord extinguishes the obligation, and constitutes the satisfaction. However, the obligation is not extinguished until the accord is fully executed, even though the parties to the accord are bound to execute it. In other words, an accord may be binding on the parties, but it does not discharge the obligation it is made to satisfy until it is executed. * * *

"It is an elementary principle that an accord without satisfaction is not a bar, nor does it constitute a defense. In other words, if a second contract is but an accord, then the original obligation remains in force until the new one is performed." (See also discussion and cases cited 1 Am.Jur. p. 216, § 3.)

[10] In the instant case there is no evidence that respondent, on behalf of his clients, agreed to accept Gran-Wood's promise to complete three of the five structures as satisfaction of the pre-existing debts. Certainly, the presumption is against any such conclusion. The most reasonable and sensible interpretation of the correspondence is that the creditors were willing to accept performance of the agreement to finish three of the five houses in satisfaction of their existing claims, but extinguishment of those claims was conditional upon performance of the second promise. The correspondence in question between Gardiner and Selinger was a practical attempt at a practical solution by which creditors would get back some or all of their money, and Gran-Wood would be relieved of personal liability by salvaging the three buildings, which Gran-Wood obviously thought could be profitably done. But Gran-Wood found it to be unprofitable, and did not perform. Obviously, the whole agreement was prospective. What respondent's assignors wanted was performance of the second agreement. This they did not get. Thus, the original obligation was not extinguished and may be enforced. (See United States Gypsum Co. v. Snyder-Ashe Co., 139 Cal. App. 731, 34 P.2d 767.)

[11-13] It is next urged that because respondent and his assignors were not parties to the contract between Gran-Wood and Gaither & Boe they cannot secure a construction of that contract in a declaratory relief action, because not persons "interested" in such contract. The point is without merit. The respondent's assignors were creditors of Gaither & Boe, and also creditors of Gran-Wood, if the contract between these two created a partnership. Certainly respondent's assignors had an interest, an important interest, in having it declared that the contract in question created a partnership. It seems clear that a person who has rights flowing from a contract has an "interest" in that contract, and should, in the discretion of the trial court,<sup>1</sup> be able to maintain an action to secure a declaration of the character and extent of those rights when an actual controversy exists. Wollenberg v. Tonningsen, 8 Cal.App.2d 722, 48 P.2d 738.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Merritt Hardman FOSTER, Petitioner and Appellant,
v.

F. Britton McCONNELL, as Insurance Commissioner of the State of California, et al., Respondents.

No. 18041.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Aug. 12, 1958.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 11, 1958.

Hearing Denied Oct. 10, 1958.

Proceeding on petition for writ of mandate to compel Insurance Commissioner to restore restricted license. The Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, Harry J. Neubarth, J., entered order denying writ and petitioner appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Bray, J., held that petitioner was not entitled to a trial de novo, and there was substantial evidence to support findings of Commissioner that petitioner knew, that even with appointment of petitioner as agent for specific company after license had been suspended, he could not solicit new business and that petitioner misrepresented policies.

1. Licenses ⇨38

Rule that, in proceeding to revoke or suspend licenses, licensee is entitled to a trial de novo in Superior Court does not apply where application for license is denied or where licensee is seeking restoration of a revoked license, and in those cases scope of review is to determine whether administrative agency abused its discretion which means that court's power is limited to determining sufficiency of evidence to support administrative findings. West's Ann. Insurance Code, §§ 1690, 1690.3.

2. Insurance ⇨12

Petitioner seeking to compel Insurance Commissioner to restore restricted insurance license was not entitled to a trial de novo in the Superior Court. West's Ann. Insurance Code, §§ 1690, 1690.3.

3. Mandamus ⇨168(4)

In proceeding on petition for writ of mandate to compel Insurance Commissioner to restore restricted license, evidence sustained finding that petitioner knew, after his license had been revoked, that even with his appointment as agent for specific insurance company, he could not negotiate new business.

4. Mandamus ⇨168(4)

In proceeding on petition for writ of mandate to compel Insurance Commissioner to restore petitioner's restricted license, evidence supported finding that petitioner had misrepresented policies which he had sold.

5. Insurance ⇨12

Where Insurance Commissioner brought proceeding to revoke restricted insurance license of petitioner on grounds, among others, that petitioner had misrepresented policies which he had sold, and petitioner denied making statements which other persons claimed he made, there was merely a conflict in evidence which hearing officer and Commissioner had duty to resolve.

6. Insurance ⇨12

In proceedings to revoke insurance license on ground of misrepresentation of policies by holder, fact of misrepresentation is important and not whether applicant for insurance relied on such misrepresentation.

7. Licenses ⇨38

Administrative proceedings for revocation of license are not quasi-criminal and are not governed by rules of criminal evidence or procedure so it is not necessary that accusations and representations be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

8. Insurance ⇨12

Insurance Commissioner had authority to revoke insurance license on ground of misrepresentation, notwithstanding fact that misrepresentations were made on U. S. Army installation. West's Ann. Insurance Code, § 1639.

9. Constitutional Law ⚡240(2)
Statutes ⚡72

Mere fact that California might require higher standards of its insurance licensees in soliciting business on U. S. Army installation in California than another state requires of its licensees operating at same installation does not violate the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution or the uniform operation clause of the California Constitution. U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. 14, § 1; West's Ann.Const. art. 1, § 11.

Allan L. Sapiro, Arthur N. Ziegler, San Francisco, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., Harold B. Haas, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

BRAY, Justice.

Appellant's petition to the superior court for a writ of mandate to compel respondent Insurance Commissioner to restore his restricted insurance licenses was denied. He appeals.

Questions Presented.

1. Was appellant entitled to a trial de novo in the trial court?

2. Is there substantial evidence to support the findings of the commissioner?

3. Did the commissioner have jurisdiction to discipline appellant for misrepresentations made at Fort Ord, a government reservation?

4. Was there a violation of the United States Constitution or the California Constitution?

Record.

Appellant had been licensed as a fire and casualty agent, life and disability agent, and fire and casualty broker. For violations of the Insurance Code all licenses were suspended for two months (from December 14, 1951, to February 13, 1952). At the end of the suspension period and pursuant to section 1690, Insurance Code, the Department of Insurance issued appellant restricted agent's licenses only. On April 24, 1952, an accusation was filed against appellant charging (1) that during the suspensory period appellant transacted more than 100 policies of insurance with Western Pioneer Insurance Company without a license so to do, and (2) that on certain dates at Fort Ord military reservation appellant knowingly made untrue representations specifically set out in the accusation to three named soldiers respectively to induce each to purchase a life insurance policy from appellant. The hearing officer found all charges to be true and recommended the revoking of appellant's licenses. The commissioner thereafter adopted the findings and decision of the hearing officer and revoked the licenses. The trial court, upon the hearing of the petition for writ of mandate, found "That substantial evidence in the light of the full record supports the findings of respondent complained of * * *; that said findings afforded ample support to the order of the said respondent, and said order was properly issued * * *" and denied the petition for writ of mandate.

1. Trial De Novo.

[1,2] Appellant contends that Nardoni v. McConnell, 1957, 48 Cal.2d 500, 310 P.2d 644, required the court to reweigh the evidence and exercise its independent judgment in the proceedings on the writ rather than do, as the court did, merely determine if the commissioner's findings were supported by the evidence. (See also 2 Cal. Jur.2d 384-385.) In the Nardoni case and in the ones referred to in the above reference to 2 Cal. Jur.2d, the courts were dealing only with proceedings brought to suspend or revoke licenses. It has been held such rule applies only to such proceedings. McDonough v. Goodcell, 1939, 13 Cal.2d 741, 753, 91 P.2d 1035, 123 A.L.R. 1205; McDonough v. Garrison, 1945, 68 Cal.App.2d 318, 336, 156 P.2d 983. It does not apply where an application for a license is denied by the commissioner (McDonough v. Garrison, supra, 68 Cal.App.2d 318, 156 P.2d 983), nor where the licensee is seeking the restoration of a revoked license.

Housman v. Board of Medical Examiners, 1948, 84 Cal.App.2d 308, 312, 190 P.2d 653, 192 P.2d 45. In those cases the scope of review is to determine whether the administrative agency abused its discretion which means that the court's power is limited to determining the sufficiency of the evidence to support the administrative findings. McDonough v. Garrison, supra, 68 Cal.App. 2d at page 337, 156 P.2d at page 993. There are two provisions in the Insurance Code which seem to indicate that the Legislature intended such discretion as alluded to above to repose in the commissioner in dealing with restricted licenses. Section 1690, Insurance Code, provides that the commissioner may issue a restricted license where, as here, he finds that a licensee has been found to have violated any provision of the code which would justify the suspension or revocation of his license. Section 1690.3 provides that a restricted license "does not confer any property right in the privileges to be exercised thereunder, and the holder of a restricted license does not have the right to renewal of such license. * * * The commissioner may, with or without hearing, revoke a restricted license whether the holder has violated any provision of this code or restriction or condition of the license or not." Thus, the granting of a restricted license and its revocation is entirely within the discretion of the commissioner. Hence, when he has revoked such a license the only inquiry the court may make is whether he has abused his discretion and such an inquiry does not require a trial de novo. It calls only for a determination of whether there is substantial evidence to support the commissioner's determination.

2. The Evidence.

[3] The evidence as to the transaction with the Western Pioneer Insurance Company follows: Upon his suspension appellant was informed that he could exercise no rights or privileges under his licenses. He was also instructed in writing that he was permitted to handle only renewals and reinstatements of policies which were entirely issued prior to his suspension and of which he was the producer of record; also there could be no gap in coverage. During the period of his suspension appellant was informed by the general manager of Pioneer Underwriters that they were cancelling as of now all of his substandard automobile insurance risks. Appellant went to the Western Pioneer Insurance Company, bringing with him all of his records and correspondence, dealing with over 100 policies. He told Voss, the manager, of his suspension and asked him to find out from the Department of Insurance whether the company could accept the cancelled business. Voss called the commissioner's office. He assumed that the person whom he was calling was familiar with appellant's case and would know that appellant was not licensed as an agent for Western. Voss was told that the company could accept the business but could not pay appellant a commission. Voss then sent a regular form of appointment of appellant as an agent for Western to the department. It was approved and returned. Appellant admitted that during the suspension period he wrote two new Western policies, also some 15 or 20 of the policies he turned over to Western were policies which had expired on other companies during the suspension period; also there was a group of 28 policies which were new policies for which applications had been sent to other companies prior to his suspension, rejected by them, returned to appellant, and accepted by Western during the suspension. Appellant had no contact with the department during this period. He thought that the appointment obtained for him by Western was all he needed. He had Western communicate with the department because he felt that the company had "cleaner hands" than he. The letter of instructions given him by the department at the time of suspension recommended that he get another broker. He approached two or three but they did not want to become involved with a man under suspension. He does not claim that his acts were not in violation but that the appointment sent him by the commissioner on Western's application amounts in effect to an estoppel. He relies on Snyder v. Redding Motors, 1955, 131 Cal.App.2d 416, 280 P.2d 811, which, however, is not in point. There an insurance company was held liable for a judgment and costs of defense suffered by an automobile owner who had applied to the company for automobile insurance and the company neither rejected the application nor issued the insurance. Obviously there is no resemblance between the facts of that case and ours. Voss in communicating with the department did not make a full disclosure of the situation, as he was only interested in determining whether appellant would be entitled to commissions. He did not state that appellant was turning over new business although he knew that "renewal" (which was all appellant was entitled to turn over) did not apply to new policies. Appellant read all of the documents pertaining to his suspension. The evidence supports the conclusion that he knew that even with the appointment he could not negotiate new business. The finding against him on this branch of the case is well supported.

[4-6] As to the alleged misrepresentations we see no reason to completely detail the evidence for the reason that the testimony of the soldiers amply supports a finding that appellant misrepresented the policies that he sold them, that he did so knowing the representations to be untrue and that he made them for the purpose of selling the policies. Appellant denied making the statements which the soldiers claimed he made. This, of course, merely constituted a conflict which the hearing officer and the commissioner had the duty to resolve and which they resolved against appellant. Additionally, appellant contends that he cannot be held liable for any misrepresentations because he relied upon and used a demonstrator sheet and material supplied by the insurance company, citing Graham v. Ellmore, 1933, 135 Cal.App. 129, 26 P.2d 696, to support his contention. He also contends that certain statements on the company's literature to the effect that the figures showing returns on the policies, etc., are merely illustrative and not guarantees, coupled with the ruling in Podlasky v. Price, 1948, 87 Cal.App.2d 151, 160, 196 P.2d 608, 614, to the effect that a disclaimer of responsibility for errors and omissions contained at the bottom of a prospectus would "excuse an innocent misrepresentation or misstatement of fact" precluded any finding of misrepresentation by him. However, the evidence shows that appellant represented the policies (1) to be a savings plan, (2) that the insured could withdraw sums from the policy at any time after the payments were received by the company, and (3) that on cancellation the insured could recover all sums paid, and as to one of the insured accumulated interest would be paid. Thus appellant was doing more than presenting the insurance company's representations. As to the statement at the bottom of the demonstrator sheet, the case cited by appellant, Podlasky v. Price, supra, 87 Cal.App.2d 151, 160, 196 P.2d 608, 614, states that such a statement "would not justify a false representation knowingly made." Moreover, it is the fact of misrepresentation that is important here, and not whether the applicant for insurance relied upon such representation. Collins v. Caminetti, 1944, 24 Cal. 2d 766, 772, 151 P.2d 105, 154 A.L.R. 1141.

[7] Appellant's contention that the accusations and misrepresentations must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt is unfounded. Administrative proceedings for the revocation of a license are not quasi-criminal and are not governed by rules of criminal evidence or procedure. Webster v. Board of Dental Examiners, 1941, 17 Cal.2d 534, 537-539, 110 P.2d 992; Marlo v. State Board of Medical Examiners, 1952, 112 Cal.App.2d 276, 282, 246 P.2d 69.

3. Fort Ord.

Appellant's misrepresentations were all made at Fort Ord. He had a permit from the post commander to sell insurance there. It had not been revoked. The Army has regulations as to the procedure and policy to be followed in soliciting commercial life insurance on any installations. Appellant contends that in the cession to the United States of Fort Ord, California did not reserve the power to regulate insurance agents and that the United States has exclusive jurisdiction there and that the commissioner has no jurisdiction to regulate the conduct of an insurance agent there.

[8] We deem it unnecessary to discuss respondent's contention that, for various reasons, the United States had not assumed jurisdiction of the regulation of California insurance agents at Fort Ord in matters of this kind for, assuming that its jurisdiction at Fort Ord is exclusive, nevertheless the commissioner had the power to revoke appellant's licenses for acts at Fort Ord violative of the California Insurance Code. The purpose of the provisions of the Insurance Code is as stated in section 1639, "to protect the public by requiring and maintaining professional standards of conduct on the part of all insurance agents and insurance brokers acting as such within this State." We are not concerned here with the question of the state making regulations concerning the selling of insurance on government reservations. We are concerned with the protection of the public from one holding a state insurance agent's license and who, regardless of whether his acts occur within or without the state, demonstrates that he does not maintain professional standards in his conduct of the insurance business. The situation is very similar to that concerning attorneys.

In Geibel v. State Bar, 1938, 11 Cal.2d 412, 79 P.2d 1073, it was held that an attorney could be disciplined for conduct in the federal courts. It was stated there: "If an attorney admitted to practice in the courts of this state commits acts in reference to federal court litigation which reflect on his integrity and fitness to enjoy the rights and privileges of an attorney in the state courts, proceedings may be taken against him in the state court." 11 Cal.2d at page 415, 79 P.2d at page 1074. A similar case is State ex rel. Hardin v. Grover, 1907, 47 Wash. 39, 91 P. 564, where it is stated that "any court, the bar of which the delinquent is a member, has jurisdiction to disbar for unprofessional conduct, when and whenever committed * * *". In re Lamb, 1905, 105 App.Div. 462, 94 N.Y.S. 331, also held that the state court could disbar an attorney for unprofessional conduct in judicial proceedings in the federal courts.

In re Porep, 1941, 60 Nev. 393, 111 P.2d 533, and People ex rel. Colorado Bar Ass'n v. Lindsey, 1929, 86 Colo. 458, 283 P. 539, the attorneys were disciplined for acts outside the jurisdictions even where the acts seemingly were lawful where done. In the Porep case, Nevada disciplined one of its attorneys for advertising in a San Francisco newspaper even though a California Bar committee had previously determined that the conduct did not justify disciplinary action. And in the Lindsey case it was held that a juvenile court judge could be disbarred there for violation of Colorado statutes making it unlawful for a judge to act as an attorney or counsel where the judge acted as counsel in a probate proceeding in New York.

Matter of Application of Shepard, 1917, 35 Cal.App. 492, 170 P. 442, and Selling v. Radford, 1916, 243 U.S. 46, 37 S.Ct. 377, 61 L.Ed. 585, are not applicable because the jurisdiction where the conduct took place had already adjudged the conduct to be unlawful before the disciplinary proceedings in the other jurisdiction took place.

In his argument on this subject appellant states: "A state may not punish one for doing in exclusively federal territory what by the law of the United States was lawful * * *" He thereby implies that it is lawful for an agent selling insurance on government property to misrepresent the terms of a policy to a prospective buyer—a proposition that is absurd on its face.

4. The Constitutions.

[9] Appellant contends that the action of the commissioner constituted a violation of the equal protection clause of the United States Constitution (Fourteenth Amendment, § 1) and of the uniform operation clause of the California Constitution (art. I, § 11). Thus he contends that a California licensee might have his license revoked for misrepresentations at Fort Ord where a licensee of another state doing business there and making the same misrepresentations might not have his license revoked. The mere fact that California requires higher standards of its licensees wherever they act than another state does of its licensees does not violate either of the constitutional provisions. See In re Porep, supra, 111 P.2d 533, and People ex rel. Colorado Bar Ass'n v. Lindsey, supra, 283 P. 539, disbarring attorneys for acts in states other than the licensing state which in those states would not be grounds for disbarring attorneys licensed there.

The judgment is affirmed.

The PEOPLE of the State of California,
Plaintiff and Respondent,

v.

Albert Delmer JONES, Defendant and

Cr. 1188.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Aug. 22, 1958.

Hearing Denied Oct. 15, 1958.

Defendant was convicted of offense of having escaped from state prison in violation of West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 4530. The Superior Court of San Bernardino County, Jesse W. Curtis, Jr., J., rendered judgment and sentence, and defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Mussell, J., held that one incarcerated in state prison by virtue of a commitment valid on its face was lawfully in custody and that his departure from prison to another state without permission from prison officials constituted an escape within meaning of statute.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Escape ⇐6

Where plea of not guilty by reason of insanity was entered to charge of armed robbery and jury found that defendant was sane at time robbery occurred and defendant was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in state prison, he was lawfully confined in prison and contention that he had entered plea of not guilty by reason of insanity in belief that he was to receive an additional trial on plea of not guilty, which was not, in fact, entered, constituted no defense to charge of having escaped from prison. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 4530.

2. Criminal Law ⇐1166(1)

Where only invalidity of conviction and sentence to state prison for armed robbery, asserted as a defense to charge of having escaped from prison, was based on defendant's statement that he had entered plea of not guilty by reason of insanity to robbery charge in belief that he would have an additional trial on plea of not guilty and that he had not been tried on issue of guilt, refusal to order that defendant be furnished with complete transcript of proceedings at robbery trial was not reversible error, since defense counsel at escape trial could readily ascertain truth or falsity of defendant's statement with respect to robbery trial without such transcript. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 4530.

3. Escape ⇐4

Unlawful departure of a prisoner from limits of his custody constitutes "escape" within meaning of statute prescribing punishment for an escape or attempt to escape from state prison. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 4530.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Escape".

4. Escape ⇐4

One incarcerated in state prison by virtue of a commitment valid on its face was lawfully in custody and his departure from prison to another state without permission from prison officials constituted "escape" within meaning of statute prescribing punishment therefor. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 4530.

Thorne & Bailin and Harold A. Bailin, Upland, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., and Edward M. Belasco, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

MUSSELL, Justice.

Appellant was charged with having escaped from the State Prison at Chino in violation of the provisions of section 4530 of the Penal Code. He entered a plea of not guilty and waived his right to be tried before a jury. Trial was then held before the court and appellant was found guilty of the offense charged in the information. He was sentenced to the State's prison for the term prescribed by law and appeals from the judgment.

On June 21, 1957, appellant, who was a prisoner confined in the California Institution for Men at Chino, failed to report to the prison dormitory for the prisoner count made at 7:20 a. m. The prison authorities then conducted a search throughout the institution and surrounding grounds but were unable to locate the appellant. He had left the institution without obtaining permission from the prison officials and was later apprehended in Oregon and returned to San Bernardino county.

In a statement made to the county agent who went to Oregon to return him to San Bernardino, he, the appellant, admitted that on June 21, 1957, he left the mess hall and went into a field, where he lay until darkness fell; that he then walked to Los Angeles, where he obtained food and clothing and a temporary job, later going to Oregon. Appellant made no effort at the trial to refute these facts but contended that his incarceration at the state prison at the time of his escape was not based upon a legal, valid conviction. However, the certified commitment papers covering appellant's incarceration at the prison were admitted into evidence without objection and show that an information filed in Glenn county charged appellant with having committed the crime of robbery with a deadly weapon and that appellant pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity; that a trial before a jury was held and appellant was represented by counsel; that the jury found that appellant was sane on the day and at the time the robbery occurred and he was sentenced to imprisonment in the State's prison. The commitment papers also contained the statement prepared for the Department of Corrections by the trial judge and district attorney, which statement recites the following history of the crime:

"* * * On January 21, 1957, defendant was without funds and was on his way from Ashland, Oregon, to Hayward, California. He had thirty cents in his pocket and stopped at a cafe and bought a cup of coffee and a couple of doughnuts. He then went across the street to a service station and had his car filled with gasoline. He then took a gun which he had in his possession and told the service station attendant to open the cash register and give him the money. The service station attendant did so, giving the defendant around $35.00. After the defendant left in his car, the service station attendant called the Sheriff's Office and reported the crime. The defendant was apprehended by the Sheriff of Glenn County, who gave pursuit to the defendant's car, at Maxwell which is located approximately twenty miles south of Willows.

"Defendant pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity. He was examined by R. B. Teller, M. D. and Daniel Lieberman, M. D., Court appointed psychiatrists. Upon a jury trial on February 20, 1957, of the defendant's sanity, he was found by the Jury to be sane. Because of the nature of the offense, armed robbery, defendant was not eligible for probation and on March 1, 1957, defendant was sentenced by the Court to the State Prison at San Quentin for the term prescribed by law."

The record shows that appellant did not move for a new trial or appeal from the judgment of conviction in Glenn county or maintain any proceedings to establish that his trial there was improper or invalid. The judgment in that county became final and resulted in appellant's being confined in lawful custody of the Department of Corrections at one of its institutions.

In People v. Ganger, 97 Cal.App.2d 11, 13, 217 P.2d 41, 42, it is said that if a defendant has reason to believe that his imprisonment is illegal he must apply for his release and not take it upon himself to terminate his incarceration by escaping. Citing Whitaker v. Commonwealth, 188 Ky. 95, 221 S.W. 215, 216, 10 A.L.R. 145, 146, as stating that " * * * whatever his legal rights, defendant had his legal remedy; that he was not justified in leaving the jail of his own volition, and his departure from lawful custody before his discharge by process of law was an escape."

In People v. Scherbing, 93 Cal.App.2d 736, 743, 209 P.2d 796, 800, the court said:

"There are cases holding that one unlawfully confined who escapes from such confinement, where the confinement is without color of authority, does not violate a statute making it unlawful to 'escape' from prison. People v. Clark, 69 Cal.App. 520, 231 P. 590; People v. Ah Teung, 92 Cal. 421, 28 P. 577, 15 L.R.A. 190. These cases, however, deal with situations where a person has been confined either without any authority at all or where the judgment was void on its face. But where the imprisonment is made under authority of law and the process is simply irregular in form, or the statute under which he is confined is unconstitutional, the escape is unlawful. People v. Ah Teung, 92 Cal. 421, 28 P. 577, 15 L.R.A. 190; People v. Howard, 120 Cal.App. 45, 8 P.2d 176; People v. Belknap, 137 Cal.App. 366, 30 P.2d 576; People v. Crider, 76 Cal.App. 101, 244 P. 113; People v. McPheeley, 92 Cal.App.2d [589], 207 P.2d 651. This is likewise the general rule in other states. Kelley v. Meyers, 124 Or. 322, 263 P. 903, 56 A.L.R. 661; People ex rel. Haines v. Hunt, 229 App.Div. 419, 242 N.Y.S. 105; People ex rel. Scrum v. Hunt [Sup.], 230 App.Div. 801, 244 N.Y.S. 790. It is also the view adopted by the federal courts. Aderhold v. Soileau, 5 Cir., 67 F.2d 259; Giese v. United States, 79 U.S. App.D.C. 126, 143 F.2d 633; United States v. Jerome, 2 Cir., 130 F.2d 514, reversed on other grounds 318 U.S. 101, 63 S.Ct. 483, 87 L.Ed. 640; Bayless v. United States, 9 Cir., 141 F. 2d 578, certiorari denied 322 U.S. 748, 64 S.Ct. 1157, 88 L.Ed. 1580. Many cases are collected and commented upon in annotations in 56 A.L.R. 666 and 163 A.L.R. 1137. These cases make sense. To allow prisoners to use force to escape and then to permit the defense that they were unlawfully confined, would create chaos in a prison. In a democracy the right of self-help is seldom permitted. Resort to the courts is the normal and traditional method of correcting an unlawful confinement. While some argument can be made that an inmate has a lawful right to escape where his confinement is completely unlawful, because the constitutional right of freedom has been infringed, no one has a lawful right to possess a knife or other dangerous weapon while confined in a prison."

[1] We conclude that appellant was lawfully confined in the State's prison at Chino and that he cannot now maintain as a defense to the escape charge that the trial court erred in striking his testimony to the effect that in the superior court of Glenn county he had pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity to the charge of robbery in the belief that he was to receive an additional trial on a plea of not guilty, a plea which was not entered in the said court.

[2] Appellant argues that he was denied the right to present important evidence in support of his claim of innocence in that the trial judge did not instruct or order the Glenn county officials to furnish him with a transcript of the proceedings in the robbery case. There is no merit to this contention. The only claimed invalidity of the judgment in that case was based on the statement of defendant that he thought he would have an additional trial on a plea of not guilty. Appellant's motion to obtain an order for a transcript was supported by the affidavit of his counsel, in which counsel stated that appellant had advised him that he had not entered a plea of guilty and that he was not tried on the issue of guilt. It is apparent that the truth or falsity of appellant's statement could have been readily ascertained by defendant's counsel without the preparation of the complete transcript. Under these circumstances there was no reversible error in refusing to order a complete transcript of the proceedings at the robbery trial.

Section 4530 of the Penal Code provides that "Every prisoner confined in a state prison who escapes or attempts to escape therefrom, is punishable by imprisonment in a state prison for a term of not less than one year; said second term of imprisonment to commence from the time he would otherwise have been discharged from said prison. No additional probational report shall be required with respect to such offense."

[3] In People v. Quijada, 53 Cal.App. 39, 41, 199 P. 854, it is said that "The term 'escape' is not defined in the Code, but a definition as clear and concise as any found in the authorities is, 'the unlawful departure of a prisoner from the limits of his custody.'"

[4] In the instant case appellant was incarcerated in prison by virtue of a commitment valid on its face. He was therefore lawfully in custody and his departure therefrom to the state of Oregon constituted escape within the meaning of section 4530 of the Penal Code.

MUSSELL, Justice.

Appellants were charged with violation of section 459 of the Penal Code (burglary in the second degree) in that on or about January 3, 1958, they entered the building of Chuck's Used Furniture Store, located at 404 East Main Street in the city of Visalia, with intent to commit theft. Trial was had before a jury which found each appellant guilty as charged in the information. Probation was denied as to each appellant and they were sentenced to imprisonment in the State's prison for the term prescribed by law. They appeal from the judgments of conviction, claiming that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and judgments.

At about 11:00 p. m. on January 3, 1958, Oliver Hinkle, proprietor of the Santa Fe Liquor Store, 406 East Main Street in Visalia, while in his store heard "a loud noise, a crash of breaking glass." He stepped out of the door of his store and saw two men turning away from a broken window in Chuck's Used Furniture Store next door. The men were at a distance of not more than 15 feet from Mr. Hinkle and he called "hold it" to them. They stopped and looked around and he recognized the appellants, who had been patrons of his store. Each had a rifle in his hands and after looking at Hinkle, they ran from the scene.

Charles Larsen, proprietor of Chuck's Used Furniture Store, was called to the store and found that a plate glass window had been broken and that two rifles which had been on display in the window were gone. Larsen also observed a 12 inch crescent wrench wrapped in a handkerchief and lying partly in and partly out of the window. At about 11:00 p. m. on the same night appellants returned to the Hacienda Cafe in Visalia, where they had been earlier in the evening, and appellant Navarette asked Mr. Gutierrez, the proprietor of the cafe, if he was interested in buying a gun.

Prior to the trial it was stipulated that appellants and Mr. Hinkle should be given polygraph examinations by an expert supplied by the California State Bureau of Criminal Identification and that this expert might testify in court as to his findings and opinion. Mr. Joseph McVarish, the expert supplied in this connection, testified that in his opinion Mr. Hinkle was honest in his answers to the questions asked and that the responses of appellants were not truthful. Both defendants denied the burglary.

[1-3] The crime of burglary is committed when any person enters any shop, warehouse or store with intent to commit grand or petit larceny. Pen.Code, sec. 459; People v. Morlock, 46 Cal.2d 141, 146, 292 P.2d 897. The fact that burglary was committed is not controverted and the evidence is amply sufficient to show that fact. The commission of the burglary herein was not witnessed. However, it is well settled that a finding of guilty may be based on circumstantial evidence (People v. Goodall, 104 Cal.App.2d 242, 247, 231 P.2d 119; People v. Dickerson, 131 Cal. App.2d 49, 53, 279 P.2d 991), and the evidence herein amply supports the verdict of the jury finding appellants guilty as charged in the information.

[4] The record shows that the judgments herein were rendered on Friday, February 28, 1958, and that the notice of appeal of each appellant was filed with the clerk of the superior court in Tulare county on Tuesday, March 11, 1958. Rule 31 of the Rules on appeal provides in part that "In the cases provided by law, an appeal may be taken by filing a written notice of appeal with the clerk of the superior court within 10 days after the rendition of the judgment or the making of the order, * * *" This time limitation has been held to be jurisdictional and in the event of a failure to file a timely notice of appeal, the appeal must be dismissed. *People v. There is no showing in the instant case of a convincing or of any excuse for the delay in filing the necessary notices of appeal and the appeals must, therefore, be dismissed. *People v. District Court of Appeal, Second District,

Aug. 26, 1958.

Suit to establish and enforce constructive trust. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Robert E. Roberts, J., entered a decree requiring defendant to convey property to plaintiff, and defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Nourse, J. pro tem., held that if, as alleged, plaintiff had conveyed property to decedent without consideration and with understanding that the property should in fact remain that of plaintiff and if, as alleged, defendant had taken record title to property from decedent with knowledge of agreement between plaintiff and decedent, defendant had become constructive trustee, and held that it would be immaterial whether he had induced decedent to breach trust through undue influence or whether she had breached it of her own volition.

1. Appeal and Error ☞854(2)

Where complaint alleged cause of action and findings supported cause, trial court's judgment, being in fact correct, would have to be affirmed, even if trial court had reached its decision on erroneous theory.

2. Trusts ☞95

If, as alleged, plaintiff had conveyed property to decedent without consideration and with understanding that the property should in fact remain that of plaintiff and if, as alleged, defendant had taken record title to property from decedent with knowledge of agreement between plaintiff and decedent, defendant became a constructive trustee, and it would be immaterial whether he had induced decedent to breach trust through undue influence or whether she had breached it of her own volition.

3. Specific Performance ☞106(1)

Decree requiring defendant to convey certain real property to plaintiff would affect only the parties, and personal representative of defendant's deceased grantor (who had allegedly held property in trust for plaintiff) was not an indispensable party.

4. Action ☞37

That complaint was entitled, and that proceeding was referred to, as one to quiet title would not preclude granting relief to plaintiff, even though she asserted no title in herself but only an equitable right, where constructive trust was alleged and proved.

5. Trusts $\Rightarrow$ 374

Trustee's grantee was entitled to possession under his deed until trustee's death, and where there was no evidence of an agreement by beneficiary of trust to pay taxes upon property, trial court was justified in not requiring beneficiary to pay taxes as condition precedent to recovering title from trustee's grantee, who had had possession of property from time of trustee's death without paying rent.

Shepherd & Shepherd, Los Angeles, for appellant.

Brandon & Marnell, Huntington Park, for respondent.

NOURSE, Justice pro tem.

Defendant appeals from a decree by the terms of which he is ordered to convey certain real property to the plaintiff.

[1] The complaint and the findings of fact are, to say the least, inartificially drawn, but we have reached the conclusion that by the complaint, facts are alleged which spell out a cause of action and that by the findings, facts are found, which support that cause of action; and, that therefore, even though it may be that the trial court reached its decision on an erroneous theory, its judgment, being in fact correct, must be affirmed. Sears v. Rule, 27 Cal. 2d 131, 140, 163 P.2d 443; Bank of America National Trust & Savings Ass'n v. Vanini, 140 Cal.App.2d 120, 127, 295 P.2d 102.

The following facts may be gleaned from the complaint, although not clearly alleged therein: Plaintiff was a sister of one Anna Hilburn, hereinafter called "Anna," and a relationship of trust and confidence existed between them; in 1933 Anna deeded the real property in question to plaintiff and plaintiff in consideration of the deed undertook to provide care, comfort and sustenance for Anna during her life; in 1952 plaintiff conveyed the property to Anna without consideration; Anna agreed that the property would be kept by her and the title would be vested in plaintiff at Anna's death and that Anna would hold the record title to the property during her lifetime in order that she might have a feeling of security but that the property should in fact remain that of the plaintiff; defendant had actual knowledge of this agreement between the plaintiff and the decedent and, despite this knowledge, induced Anna to convey the property to him without consideration. These facts spell out a constructive trust under which defendant held title for the benefit of the plaintiff. Sherman v. Sandell, 106 Cal. 373, 374-375, 39 P. 797; Taylor v. Morris, 163 Cal. 717, 722-723, 127 P. 66; Stobie v. Stobie, 116 Cal.App.2d 360, 366-368, 253 P.2d 765; Civil Code, § 2243.

[2] Each of the facts which we have heretofore set forth as being alleged in the complaint was found by the trial court to be true and the evidence supports these findings. The trial court further found that Anna was induced to convey the property to the defendant through undue influence imposed upon her by him but we need not here determine whether or not such findings are supported by the evidence; for, as the evidence supports the court's finding of the trust upon which Anna held the property and its finding that defendant took record title to the property with knowledge of that trust he became a constructive trustee and it is immaterial whether he induced Anna to breach her trust through undue influence or she breached it of her own volition.

[3] Appellant contends that Anna's personal representative was an indispensable party and that the court erred in refusing defendant's request that a representative of her estate be made a party to the action. This contention cannot be sustained.

The decree here entered does not affect and could not bind Anna's heirs or her estate. It affects only the parties to this action. A personal representative of Anna was not an indispensable party. Bank of California, Nat. Ass'n v. Superior Court, 16 Cal.2d 516, 520-526, 106 P.2d 879.

[4] Appellant further asserts that the action is one to quiet title and that plaintiff, by her complaint, has asserted no title in herself but only an equitable right and that therefore an action to quiet title did not lie. It is true that the complaint is entitled and throughout the proceedings was referred to as one to quiet title but that is not conclusive for plaintiff's action was, in fact, not one to quiet title but one to establish and enforce a constructive trust and that is the decree rendered.

[5] It was stipulated at the trial that defendant paid the taxes on the property in question for the years 1952 to 1956, both inclusive. Defendant complains that the decree did not compel the plaintiff to do equity by reimbursing him in the amount of these taxes. Defendant was entitled, under his deed from Anna, to possession of the property until Anna's death and it was only upon his then asserting title adverse to plaintiff that he breached the trust under which he held possession. There was no evidence that plaintiff had agreed to pay the taxes upon the property during the time the record title stood in the name of Anna and defendant was obligated to pay the taxes upon the property from the time he, under his deed, became entitled to possession, until the time of Anna's death. Defendant was in possession of the property in question from the time of Anna's death in August 1955 and did not offer to account for the rental value of the property. The total of the taxes that he paid during the period after plaintiff became entitled to possession amounted to less than $100 and the court was justified in not requiring the plaintiff, as a condition of the decree, to pay the taxes but to assume that they were offset by the defendant's use of the property during that period. There were no equities in defendant's favor.

The judgment is affirmed.

Nichols, Williams, Morgan & Digardi, Jesse Nichols, Anthony R. Brookman, Oakland, Phillip M. Millsbaugh, Richmond, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice.

Defendant Laila Standow appeals from the judgment against her based upon the collision of an automobile of which she was a co-owner with a parked automobile while her automobile was being driven by her 17-year old son Tommy. The case was tried without a jury and the judgment against appellant is based upon the findings of the court that at the time of the accident the automobile was being driven by her minor son with her implied consent and permission and that she had knowledge that he was an incompetent driver and had no license to drive.

The sole ground urged on appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to support these findings. The evidence shows that appellant and her son were both attending a trade school. The son finished his classes from one-half to one hour before the mother and each morning when they arrived at the school the mother gave the keys of the car to her son. Mother and son both testified that the mother had on several occasions forbidden the son to drive the automobile and that the only purpose of her giving him the keys was to permit him to open the car door and sit in the car while he was free from classes.

Appellant concedes in her closing brief "that the trial court could and did disbelieve the testimony of appellant and her son," but she argues that "disbelief of such testimony would not furnish or supply affirmative evidence to the contrary."

[1,2] This argument assumes that from the mother's habitual practice of giving the car keys to her son the trial court could not reasonably infer her implied consent to his driving the automobile. It is well settled that a trial judge or jury may disbelieve direct evidence and rely on circumstantial evidence to support a finding. Gray v. Southern Pacific Co., 23 Cal.2d 632, 641, 145 P.2d 561; Scott v. Burke, 39 Cal.2d 388, 398, 247 P.2d 313; Bohn v. Watson, 130 Cal.App.2d 24, 34, 278 P.2d 454; Halstead v. Paul, 129 Cal.App.2d 339, 341, 277 P.2d 43; Alonso v. Hills, 95 Cal.App.2d 778, 786, 214 P.2d 50; State of California v. Day, 76 Cal.App.2d 536, 548, 173 P.2d 399. It is also well established that even where conflicting inferences may with equal reason be drawn from the evidence the choice of which inference to draw rests in the judgment of the trier of the fact. Hamilton v. Pacific Electric Co., 12 Cal.2d 598, 603, 86 P.2d 829; Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 426, 213 P. 42, 26 A.L.R. 123; Fry v. Sheedy, 143 Cal.App. 2d 615, 620, 300 P.2d 242; Halstead v. Paul, supra, 129 Cal.App.2d 339, 341, 277 P.2d 43; Spolter v. Four-Wheel Brake Service Co., 99 Cal.App.2d 690, 693-694, 222 P.2d 307.

[3] The admitted fact that appellant daily entrusted to her son the keys to the automobile thus putting it in his power to drive the car at will is, in our judgment, sufficient to support the inference drawn by the trial court that she impliedly consented to his doing so. (Cf. Casey v. Fortune, 78 Cal.App.2d 922, 179 P.2d 99, where a similar inference was drawn from the fact that the appellant left the car keys where they were accessible to the minor, knowing that on one or two previous occasions he had driven the automobile.) Here appellant gave the keys repeatedly to her son with knowledge, according to her own testimony, that he had repeatedly indicated to her that he was anxious to drive.

[4] Appellant also argues that there is no evidence to support the finding that she knew that her son was an incompetent and unlicensed driver. She herself testified that he had no driver's license and she further testified that she did not know that he had ever driven an automobile (he testified that he had driven a friend's car a couple of times in the State of Washington) and that he had requested her to permit him to learn to drive but that she had refused.

The evidence is sufficient to support the findings attacked and the findings support the judgment against appellant. 7 Cal.Jur. 2d, Automobiles, § 322, p. 195.

From a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Walter R. Evans, J., in favor of the employer the defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Patrosso, J. pro tem., held that where employer's voluntary plan approved by the director provided that an employee's right to disability benefits would cease upon his resignation or discharge, the former employees were not covered by, and were not entitled to benefits under, the voluntary plan, but that the plan operated to cast upon the PATROSSO, Justice pro tem.

Defendant, the Director of the Department of Employment of the State of California, appeals from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action for refund of assessments made by the defendant against the plaintiff for unemployment compensation benefits paid by the appellant to eleven former employees of the plaintiff.

The facts are undisputed and the question presented is purely one of law which may be thus stated: Were the former employees of the plaintiff in question covered by and entitled to benefits under the plaintiff's voluntary plan providing unemployment compensation disability benefits for its employees by reason of disability sustained by them at a time following their discharge or resignation from plaintiff's employ?

At the time of their discharge or resignation each of these employees was entitled to and received from the plaintiff an amount representing accrued vacation pay and/or service pay.<sup>1</sup> Following such resignation or discharge but during a period of time commencing with the day after the day of such discharge or resignation and continuing for the number of days for which his vacation pay or service pay, alone or in combination, was paid, each of such former employees incurred disability within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Code.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 3251-3271 of the Unemployment Insurance Code, hereinafter referred to as the Code, the plaintiff, with the approval of the Director of the Department of Employment, adopted a voluntary plan for the payment of disability benefits to its employees. This plan as it existed during the period with which we are here concerned contained, among other things, the following provisions:

"D. Disability Benefits: Any employee while covered under this plan who becomes disabled by any physical or mental illness or injury, except as hereinafter excluded, so as to prevent him from performing his regular or customary work, shall be paid benefits for the period of such disability by this plan as set forth in the following schedule, subject to limitations and provisions hereinafter stated:"

"G. Individual Termination: The participation of any employee under this plan shall terminate: * * * 2. Any employee who ceases to be employed because of a leave of absence or layoff, without pay

1. Under the personnel regulations of the plaintiff, upon termination of employment an employee with one or more years of service who has not taken the vacation due him on his last anniversary date is entitled to pay for his vacation. The employee is also entitled to vacation earned from his last anniversary date to his last day worked at the rate of  $\frac{1}{6}$  of a week's pay for each calendar month of service. In addition he is entitled to a service allowance at the rate of  $\frac{1}{6}$ th of a week's pay for each four months of service.

which extends for a period of two weeks or more; of [sic] because of resignation, dismissal, being pensioned or retired, shall cease to be covered by this plan at the end of such two weeks or upon termination of the employer-employee relationship by reason of resignation, dismissal, being pensioned or retired.”<sup>2</sup>

[1] The provision last above quoted would seem to make unmistakably clear that an employee's right to disability benefits under the plaintiff's voluntary plan ceases upon his resignation or discharge. Indeed, it would be difficult to select language which would more clearly express this thought. Appellant, however, asserts that it does not mean what it plainly says. The argument in support of this contention is as follows: Vacation and service pay constitute “wages” (Jones v. California Employment Stabilization Commission, 1953, 120 Cal.App.2d 770, 262 P.2d 91); section 1252 of the Code provides that “An individual is ‘unemployed’ in any week during which he performs no services and with respect to which no wages are payable to him”; section 1251 provides that unemployment compensation benefits are payable to “unemployed individuals” and one receiving wages is not unemployed and hence not entitled to unemployment benefits. Bradshaw v. California Employment Stabilization Commission, 1956, 46 Cal.2d 608, 610-612, 297 P. 2d 970. Thus it necessarily follows, so says the appellant in effect, that one who is not “unemployed” because he is receiving “wages” must be employed by someone, namely: the one from whom he has received “wages” (vacation pay and service pay) during the period in question.

This argument is tersely but effectively answered by the brief memorandum opinion of the trial judge in announcing his decision herein with which we are in full accord:

“In this case as was indicated in the conference between the court and the attorneys for the parties herein on June 3rd, the court finds no quarrel with the authorities cited by both counsel and the propositions for which those authorities stand. However, in spite of the fact that it is now definitely established that the ‘vacation pay’ and ‘service pay’ referred to in the stipulation of facts herein is wages insofar as unemployment benefits are concerned, such a fact is of no consequence and has no bearing on the question before the court at this time.

“The voluntary plan of the plaintiff which was approved by the defendant and accepted by the employees is clear and concise, and without ambiguity in that the right to disability benefits thereunder terminates with the termination of the employer-employee relationship, which termination was the date of dismissal or resignation of the said employees.

“Under the plaintiff's voluntary plan which terminates the right to disability benefits upon resignation or dismissal, the State, in paying such benefits, is merely paying something it is obligated for under the statute, and which has not been provided for by the employer and for which the employer is not liable by reason of the provisions of said voluntary plan.”

[2-4] The voluntary plan established by plaintiff and accepted by its employees was, as stated, approved by the director. Presumably it conformed to the conditions prescribed as prerequisite to the approval of such a plan by section 3254 of the Code, including among other things that “The rights afforded to the covered employees are cause of a leave of absence or layoff, without pay which extends for a period of two weeks or more; or because of resignation, dismissal, being pensioned or retired, shall cease to be covered by this plan at the end of such two weeks or immediately upon his resignation, dismissal, being pensioned or retired.”

2. This was the language of this provision as it read during the period from and after January 1, 1954. From January 1, 1952, to December 31, 1953, it read as follows:

greater than those provided for in Chapters 2 and 3 of this part." We must assume that the plaintiff's employees, in considering whether to accept the voluntary plan, weighed the relative benefits afforded thereby as against those available to them under the statute, and concluded that the plaintiff's plan was the most advantageous to them. There is no reason why the employees in accepting the plan could not relinquish some benefits under the statute in order to obtain benefits conferred by the plan which they considered of greater value and more advantageous than those available under the statute. We find nothing in the Code which suggests that, with the approval of the director, such a voluntary plan may not provide, as does the one here, that the employee's right to benefits thereunder shall cease upon resignation or discharge. Nor need we pause to consider whether the director could have refused to approve the plan because it contained this provision for, having received his approval, it became not only a binding contract between the plaintiff and its employees but it operated to cast upon the State Disability Fund liability for benefits to which an employee might be entitled under the statute upon his ceasing to be covered by the voluntary plan. Unempl. Ins.Code, § 3263.

[5] The only other provision contained in the plan to which appellant refers in support of its contention is that found in the paragraph entitled "Limitations" and which reads as follows:

"Benefits for any day of disability for which the employee receives wages shall be paid in an amount not to exceed the benefits provided in paragraph D1 which, together with any wages received by the employee, do not exceed  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 70% of his weekly wage immediately prior to the commencement of his disability."

Appellant asserts that this provision demonstrates that payment of disability insurance benefits under the plan was contemplated for any day of disability for which the employee receives "wages." This may readily be conceded but it does not operate to establish, as appellants suggest, that one who has resigned or been discharged continues to be an "employee" entitled to benefits under the plan in view of the provision previously quoted which expressly provides that the right to benefits thereunder shall cease upon resignation or discharge. Moreover, the provision last above quoted does not undertake to define eligibility to benefits but rather to prescribe a limitation upon the amount of the benefits payable in accordance with section 2656 of the Code.

The judgment is affirmed.

Robert Sikes, Los Angeles, for appellant.
Mason, Kinley & Wallace, William Kinley, Long Beach, for respondent.

WHITE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff L. A. Jones, as guardian of the Estate of Roderic Allan Stellar, an incompetent, instituted this action against defendant Murray H. Roberts, as executor of the Estate of Robert W. Stellar, deceased, for moneys allegedly due to the incompetent as a third party beneficiary under the terms of a property settlement agreement between the decedent Robert W. Stellar during his lifetime, and Marjorie Stellar, the parents of the incompetent.

The complaint contained two causes of action, the second of which was dismissed by stipulation at the pretrial hearing. The remaining first cause of action alleged that in connection with a property settlement agreement dated December 26, 1951, the aforesaid parents of the incompetent contracted that the father, Robert W. Stellar, would support the incompetent son and furnish him with certain hospital and institutional care. The answer denied generally the allegations of the complaint other than the execution and validity of the property settlement agreement.

The record reflects that the incompetent son is presently confined in the State Hospital at Camarillo, California, suffering from a mental disorder known as schizophrenia. That this affliction will make it impossible for the incompetent son to support and maintain himself and will require his hospitalization and medical care for the duration of his life; that his life expectancy is conceded to be forty-two years.

The terms of the aforesaid property settlement agreement insofar as here pertinent are as follows:

"* * *; Husband further agrees to pay all nurses, doctors, institutional and hospital expenses reasonably necessary in the treatment and care of said minor child (Roderic Allan Stellar) (parenthesis added) until he attains the age of twenty-one years. After the said minor attains the age of twenty-one years, should it be necessary to incur doctor, nurse, hospital or institutional expenses in order to treat and care for said child, Husband shall pay the first $300 per month on account of said expense and any overage shall be borne by the parties jointly."

Following execution of this agreement and subsequent divorce of the parents of the incompetent, his father remarried. The latter died on April 15, 1954, leaving as his heirs and legatees his widow Shirley Stellar, a son Charles A. Stellar, his incompetent son Roderic Allan Stellar, his posthumous daughter Deborah Stellar, and his brother Arnold T. Stellar. The estate of the deceased father Robert W. Stellar is solvent and financially able to pay the claim which is the subject of this litigation, having gross assets of approximately $350,000 and distributable assets of between Ninety and One Hundred Twenty Thousand Dollars.

Following trial before the court, sitting without a jury, findings were made, and insofar as necessary for the disposition of this appeal, are as follows:

"XIII. That the necessary expenses to provide the said Roderic Allan Stellar, the incompetent herein, with doctors, nursing care, institutional or hospital care, to treat and care for said incompetent, is the sum of Three Thousand Twenty Dollars ($3,020) annually. That said sum is made up of the following items of expense: $1,800.00 annually for hospitalization in Camarillo State Hospital; $250 annually for clothing; $250 annually for medical examinations; $360 annually for expenses and fees of a trustee to administer the trust funds of said incompetent; and the sum of $360 annually for the increased costs of hospitalizing said incompetent during his forty-two year life expectancy. (Emphasis added.)

"XIV. That the cost of hospitalizing said incompetent in the Camarillo State Hospital has increased by the sum of $16 per month since January 1, 1955, and that further increases in the cost of hospitalizing said incompetent during his life expectancy of forty-two years are reasonably certain to occur.

* * * * *

"XXI. That to provide Roderic Allan Stellar, the incompetent herein, with the funds necessary for his care in the sum of \$3,020 annually, as found in Finding No. XIII herein, for a period of forty-two years, the life expectancy of said incompetent, will require the sum of \$69,670.80 drawing interest at the rate of  $3\frac{1}{4}\%$  per annum."

Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, directing that defendant Executor pay to plaintiff guardian the sum of $69,670.80 to be held in trust by plaintiff guardian for the use of the incompetent.

The judgment further provided, "That in the event the said Roderic Allan Stellar shall, prior to the expiration of his estimated forty-two years of life expectancy, die or be restored to capacity, then the corpus of said trust funds remaining in the hands of the trustee shall at that time forthwith be distributed in the same manner and to the same persons and in the same respective proportions as shall be made in the decree of final distribution in the Estate of Robert W. Stellar, Deceased, * * * now pending in this court." This appeal is prosecuted by defendant executor from the judgment.

As indicated by the findings, the court estimated that the amount necessary to provide the incompetent with medical and institutional care is the sum of \$3,020 annually. Using this figure as a basis, extended over a period of forty-two years, the agreed life expectancy of the incompetent, the court concluded that the sum of \$69,670.80 earning  $3\frac{1}{4}\%$  interest would be required. The annual figure of \$3,020 was calculated by the court as follows:

(1) The sum of $1800 annually for hospitalization and care in the State Hospital at Camarillo;

(2) $250 annually for clothing;

(3) $250 annually for medical examinations;

(4) $360 annually for expenses and fees of a trustee to administer the trust funds in the judgment;

(5) $360 annually for increased costs of hospitalizing the incompetent in the future.

Appellant concedes the validity of the first item of $1800 for hospitalization and care at the State Hospital, but challenges the remaining four annual figures, contending that the findings thereon are without evidentiary support.

[1] As a prelude to his argument, appellant asserts that, "* * * this is a simple legal action to recover moneys due on a contract. Accordingly, the trial court may not, in this case, sit as an equity judge would in a domestic relations matter and set certain figures for support or care which in his opinion were equitable. The trial court here may only award the plaintiff such moneys as the plaintiff had, by a preponderance of the evidence, shown he was entitled to under the strict provisions of the contract."

With this contention we cannot agree. This case involves the power of the court under Section 953 of the Probate Code to make a decree requiring the sequestration of property as security for a claim not due or contingent. That such a proceeding is an action in equity and that the equity side of the court may be invoked to protect the owners of contingent claims which will mature after the period within which distribution in the estate may take place, was the holding in Dabney v. Dabney, 9 Cal. App.2d 665, 673, 51 P.2d 108; Vallelunga v. Gomes, 102 Cal.App.2d 374, 382, 227 P.2d 550.

[2] We are satisfied that appellant's attack upon the finding that $250 annually was a necessary additional clothing expense under the property settlement agreement cannot be sustained. At the outset it should be noted that neither the incompetent or his guardian has a vested right in the total amount of the judgment entered herein. The respondent guardian has the right to expend from that fund the sums of money, not exceeding $300 monthly in accordance with the property settlement agreement, that are necessary for the maintenance and support of the incompetent. It is also noteworthy that according to the judgment herein, should the incompetent recover to the extent that he could return to a normal life in society, thereby no longer requiring medical care or hospitalization, or should the incompetent die, the unexpended remainder of the fund set aside by the trial court and in the possession of the trustee would then be distributed by the probate court in accordance with the decree of distribution made by that court.

[3] While the discretion of the trial court in a proceeding such as the one now engaging our attention must not be arbitrary or capricious and must be exercised within reason, it is equally true that an appellate tribunal may not substitute its judgment for that of the court below unless it clearly appears that a case has been made reasonably justifying the conclusion that the questioned finding indicates a lack of ordinary good judgment, and that no reasonable inferences can be drawn from the evidence to support the finding and the judgment predicated thereon. We are satisfied that the finding now under consideration cannot be thus strictured. There was evidence that the only clothing furnished to the incompetent by the state hospital was the "bare necessities", or "a ward uniform" consisting of "blue denims and an old shirt". In addition to the testimony of respondent guardian wherein he estimated that the cost of providing the incompetent with clothing would be approximately $100 annually there is in the record testimony by Mrs. Marjorie H. Stellar, mother of the incompetent, that she visited the latter on numerous occasions. That the only clothing furnished the incompetent by the State Hospital was "bare necessities" as aforesaid. That suits, dress shirts, slacks, ties, shoes and slippers had to be furnished to the incompetent from sources other than the hospital. She further testified that the hospital's medical staff felt that having "dress-up" clothing was good for the incompetent's morale and was part of his therapy and that she, herself, had expended the sum of $130 for clothing for the incompetent approximately two months prior to the time of the hearing of this matter in the trial court. Appellant does not contend that the allowance made by the trial court for clothing for the incompetent son was not within contemplation of the Property Settlement Agreement, but only that there is no evidence in the record to support the amount of such allowance. When the estimate of respondent guardian is added to the money expended by the incompetent's mother, and the reasons given for such expenditures, we cannot say that the figure arrived at by the trial court exceeded the bounds of reason, and was devoid of any substantial evidence to support it (In re Estate of Cornaz, 8 Cal.2d 347, 355, 65 P.2d 784; Robertson v. Nichols, 92 Cal.App.2d 201, 207, 206 P.2d 898).

[4] The next item under attack by appellant is the allowance of $250 annually for medical examinations to be made by a psychiatric expert not affiliated with the Camarillo State Hospital. We are persuaded that the contention of appellant must be sustained. We are not directed to any evidence in the record which supports a finding that an annual independent psychiatric examination of the incompetent is necessary or reasonably indicated. At the trial it was stipulated that Dr. John B. Doyle would testify to the facts and opinions contained in his letter to Robert Sikes, attorney for appellant under date of June 12, 1956, and which letter was admitted into evidence. This independent examination cost $250. The addendum to Dr. Doyle's letter contains some six pages of the medical record of the incompetent at the State Hospital, and also states that the latter is receiving complete medical and psychiatric care at the hospital. That the incompetent has been under the care of Doctors Nash, Talbot and Jussman (the latter being Senior Clinical Psychologist). That the incompetent has been receiving electro-shock therapy, music therapy, and applications of thorazine, all approved methods for treating the ailment of the incompetent. There is no evidence that the facilities provided at the State Hospital are inadequate or that the incompetent, while at the State Hospital, is not at all times receiving the care and attention of able and competent physicians and psychiatrists. Respondent urges that the trial court was empowered to determine that it was for the best interests not only of the incompetent but also the heirs and legatees to have an annual opinion and other advice of an independent medical expert to determine the exact mental condition of the incompetent, "in order that the funds set aside by the trial court in this proceeding for his medical care and support could, as soon as possible, be made available for distribution to the heirs and legatees of the decedent." We see no valid reason why this determination could not be made on the medical records kept of the periodical examinations made and the prognosis arrived at by the medical and psychiatric staff of the State Hospital. Respondent advances the further argument that "the trial court might also take judicial notice that at some time during the next forty-two years the incompetent might recover sufficiently to enable him to be discharged from Camarillo State Hospital or to be hospitalized in an independent institution but would still require medical attention and care which would not be furnished by some state agency." However, in that event it is manifest that respondent guardian could then resort to the $1,800 allowed for maintenance of the incompetent at the State Hospital, which payment to the hospital would cease when and if the incompetent was discharged therefrom. There being a complete absence of any showing of the necessity for outside and independent psychiatric examinations each year, it necessarily follows that the allowance therefor was erroneous.

In considering the equities involved in this proceeding, regard must be had for the terms of the Property Settlement Agreement, the value of the estate and the interests of the widow, the infant daughter of decedent, the other son, as well as the incompetent. In the estate of the latter there is at present some \$7,200 to which will be added  $\frac{7}{8}$  of his deceased father's estate.

[5] A serious question is presented by appellant's contention that the court erred in sequestering the sum of \$360 annually for the expenses and fees of a trustee to administer the trust funds of the incompetent over a life expectancy period of forty-two years, totaling \$8,196.48. Appellant concedes that respondent guardian is entitled to his reasonable fees and expenses from the estate, under the provisions of Probate Code, Section 1556, but urges that such compensation must come from the funds of the incompetent's estate (consisting of \$7,200 and  $\frac{7}{8}$  of the estate of his deceased father), but not out of the assets of the decedent's estate being administered by appellant executor. The latter argues that in the present proceeding the court is not appointing a trustee to handle this particular claim of the incompetent under Section 953.1 of the Probate Code because the incompetent already had an estate and there was a guardian-trustee acting for the ward. That the court in the instant proceeding is merely determining the amount to be delivered to this guardian-trustee on the incompetent's claim against the estate of his father. That respondent guardian should look to his ward's estate generally and in its entirety and this would include the guardian's fees for handling the total trust estate inclusive of the judgment rendered in the case at bar.

Appellant earnestly contends that his argument finds support in the language of Probate Code, Section 953, upon which respondent bases this action and which he contends authorizes only the setting aside from the decedent's estate "* * * such part of the same as the holder (of the contingent claim) would be entitled to if the claim were due". (Emphasis added.) That since if the incompetent's claim were due he would not be entitled to any additional allowance for the fees or expenses of his guardian to administer it, the same reasoning applies to a contingent claim, payable in installments or on the happening of a stated event.

From the judgment entered herein it is at once apparent that the court proceeded under the provisions of Section 953.1 of the Probate Code which authorizes the court to appoint a trustee to whom the funds sequestered from the estate shall be paid, and who shall make the payments therefrom as authorized by the court. We are persuaded that the court having appointed a trustee was authorized, under Section 953.1 to set aside a sufficient sum of money from which the probate court could at a future time make its order to compensate the trustee upon a proper showing, for his services rendered to the trust estate (Probate Code, Section 1122). Had the court proceeded under Section 953 rather than 953.1 it would have been necessary to have set aside from the assets of the decedent father's estate a sum of money in cash to cover the medical care, hospitalization, etc., required by the incompetent for a period of forty-two years, which was the latter's life expectancy. This cash fund would have been delivered to the county treasurer subject to the continuing jurisdiction of the trial court sitting as a court in equity, to order the monthly payments as required (Vallelunga v. Gomes, supra, 102 Cal.App.2d at page 379, 227 P.2d at page 553). Had that procedure been followed in the trial court, the sum of $75,000 in cash would have been deposited with the court designated depository to provide the bare essentials of hospitalization and medical care for the incompetent at the rate of $1,800 annually for a period of forty-two years. The procedure adopted by the court under Section 953.1 of the Probate Code has saved to the estate and the heirs and legatees approximately $6,000.

Appellant strongly urges that there is no provision whatsoever in the property settlement agreement for any obligation on the part of decedent father for trustee's fees nor is there a trust set up therein. That it is a mere contract partially for the benefit of a third party, the incompetent son. The answer to this contention is that insofar as the provisions of the property settlement agreement with which we are here confronted are concerned, the primary purpose thereof was to provide funds for the medical treatment and care of the incompetent son, and for which purposes the aforesaid agreement provided the decedent father would pay the first $300 per month required. Had the court followed appellant's contentions, a situation could well arise wherein funds allocated to pay for hospitalization and medical care would be depleted because of the allowance therefrom of compensation for the trustee and attorneys' fees, etc. It must be remembered that when decedent entered into the property settlement agreement he was, at the time, aware of the mental and physical condition of his incompetent son. He was aware of the cost of medically treating and hospitalizing him. With knowledge of these factors in mind, the decedent agreed to provide up to $300 monthly for that purpose. It must also be assumed that, fortified with independent legal advice, he realized that in the event of his death, a fund must necessarily be established out of his estate to be administered by a trustee, to the end that such fund would be utilized to carry out the terms of his aforesaid agreement, and that the expenses of maintaining that fund and administering it would become a part of that cost and expense. Since the monthly sum awarded by the court for the support, care and maintenance of the incompetent does not exceed in totality the amount of $300, we cannot say that the court, sitting in equity, was without authority, under the terms of the property settlement agreement, to set aside an amount out of which fees for the trustee could later be awarded by the Probate Court without diminishing the amount of money necessary for the maintenance and care of the incompetent son of decedent.

[6,7] Finally, appellant insists that the finding of the court, " * * * that further increases in the cost of hospitalizing said incompetent during his life expectancy of forty-two years are reasonably certain to occur", and setting aside $360 additional per year for such increased hospitalization costs, is not supported by any substantial evidence. Appellant contends that setting aside the aforesaid sum to cover the anticipated increased cost of hospitalization and care during the ensuing forty-two years of life expectancy of the incompetent amounts to mere conjecture and speculation unsupported by substantial evidentiary facts. With this contention we cannot agree. There was evidence before the court that the cost of maintaining this incompetent in the State Hospital at Camarillo has increased at the rate of $16 per month since January 1, 1955, and the court was entitled to take judicial notice of the economic condition of the country, that the cost of living is steadily increasing while the purchasing power of the dollar is steadily decreasing. In determining a matter such as this, no method could be devised that would be free of difficulties. The court was attempting to make the incompetent secure through a fund adequate for his maintenance, hospitalization and medical care, in accordance with the provisions of the property settlement agreement, and for a life expectancy of forty-two years. While of course, the future is hidden from judicial view, we cannot say that there is anything grossly inequitable, or at all inequitable about the order impounding the sum of $360 annually for the increased cost of hospitalizing the incompetent, in the light of the foregoing increase of care and hospitalization of $16 per month between January 1, 1955 and the date of trial; the existing economic conditions and the prognosis for the future based on the experience of the past.

Both appellant and respondent concede a mathematical error in the computation of the court which if the judgment as rendered were affirmed would reduce the amount thereof by the sum of $910.72. However, since the cause must be remanded for further proceedings, the error in question can be corrected.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded with directions to the court below to enter a new and different judgment for plaintiff in accordance with the views herein expressed. The parties will bear their respective costs on appeal.

fund for payments required to be made into fund by public contractor under collective bargaining agreement requiring employer to make payments of specified sums for each hour of work by each union employee. West's Ann.Gov.Code, §§ 4200-4208, 4204.

Trustees of union health and welfare fund into which public contractor, who gave required bond, had to make payments under collective bargaining contract were assignees under equitable assignment of rights and claims of union members, and had right to sue surety on bond to collect payments contractor had failed to make into such fund. ### 1. The pertinent provisions of the Trust Fund are as follows:

Article II:

"Section 1.

"(a) There is hereby created the Carpenters Health and Welfare Trust for Southern California, which shall consist of all contributions made into the Fund and all interest, income, and other returns thereon of any kind whatsoever, together with the policies and all property and assets of the Fund.

"(b) Such amounts are held in trust for the purpose of paying, either from principal or income or both, for the benefit of the employees, their families and dependents, for medical or hospital care, or insurance to provide any of the foregoing, or life insurance, or non-occupational disability and sickness insurance, or accident insurance.

"Section 2. The Fund shall have its principal office in the County of Los Angeles, State of California.

"Section 3. Anderson, McPharlin & Connors, Los Angeles, for respondent.

FOURT, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment which ordered the dismissal of the action as against the respondent surety company after sustaining of a demurrer to the amended complaint without leave to amend.

There appears to be no serious dispute as to the facts of the case. Appellants constitute the board of trustees of the Carpenters Health and Welfare Trust for Southern California (sometimes hereinafter referred to as the "Trust Fund"), which Trust Fund was established pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement (sometimes hereinafter referred to as the "Master Labor Agreement").<sup>1</sup>

"Section 4. Neither the Employers, any signatory association, any employer, the Unions, any signatory union, any employee, any beneficiary of the Health and Welfare Plan nor any other person shall have any right, title or interest in the Fund other than as specifically provided in this agreement, and no part of the Fund shall revert to the Employers, any signatory association, or any employer. Neither the Fund nor any contributions to the Fund shall be in any manner liable for or subject to the debts, contracts or liabilities of the Employers, any signatory association, any employer, the Unions, any signatory union, any employee, or any beneficiary. No part of the Fund, nor any benefits payable in accordance with the Health and Welfare Plan shall be subject in any manner to anticipation, alienation, sale, transfer, assignment, pledge, encumbrance or charge by any person; provided, however, that the Board of Trustees may establish a procedure whereby any employee may direct that benefits due him to be paid to an institution in which he is hospitalized in consideration for medical or hospital services rendered or to be rendered."

Section 1(a) of Article IV:

"The Fund shall be administered by a Board of Trustees which shall consist

The Master Labor Agreement was executed in 1954 by and between the Associated General Contractors of America, Southern California Chapter, the Building Contractors of California, Inc., the Excavating and Grading Contractors Association, Inc., and the Home Builders Institute, Inc., on behalf of their respective contractor-employer members engaged in construction work in eleven Southern California Counties, and the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, on behalf of the carpenter-employees of said contractor-employer members. The Master Labor Agreement contains provisions relating to the wages, hours and working conditions of the carpenter-employees of said members in the Southern California area.

Article XXI of the Master Labor Agreement provides as follows:

"The parties agree to establish a joint Health and Welfare Trust Agreement between the Contractors and the Carpenters. Effective September 1, 1954, the Contractors shall make payments to the Health and Welfare Fund of 5¢ per hour worked per employee under this Agreement. Effective May 1, 1955, payments to the Health and Welfare Fund by the Contractor shall be increased 5¢ per hour. The establishment of the Joint Trust Fund and other terms and conditions of the Health and Welfare Plan shall be completed by a joint committee. Benefits to workmen shall commence not later than six months from September 1, 1954. This provision shall remain in full force and effect and not subject for re-opening through April 30, 1957."

The Trust Fund was established by the same parties as those who negotiated the Master Labor Agreement.

About August 27, 1954, Hudson Construction Company (sometimes herein referred to as the "Contractor") executed a collective bargaining agreement with the Building and Construction Trades Councils of ten (10) trustees. Five (5) trustees shall be appointed by the Unions (known as Union Trustees) and five (5) trustees shall be appointed by the Employers (known as Employer Trustees)."

Article V:

"Section 1. The Board of Trustees shall have power to administer the Fund and to administer and maintain the Plan in effect.

"Section 2. The Board of Trustees shall collect and receive all contributions due to the Fund, and shall promptly deposit such contributions in a special trust fund account or accounts established in a reputable bank or banks located in such locality as determined by the Board of Trustees.

"Section 3. The Board of Trustees shall have power to demand and enforce the prompt payment of contributions to the Fund, and the payments due to delinquencies as provided in Section 3 of Article III. If any individual employer defaults in the making of such contributions or payments and if the Board consults legal counsel with respect thereto, or files any suit or claim with respect thereto, there shall be added to the obligation of the employer who is in default, reasonable attorneys' fees, court costs, and all other reasonable expenses incurred by the Board in connection with such suit or claim.

"Section 4. The Board of Trustees shall collect and receive any and all dividends, interest, returns of premiums or other credits or benefits due from any insurer or otherwise, which the Fund is entitled to receive and shall deposit the same in the Fund or credit the same to the Fund, and all such deposits and credits shall become part of the Fund and shall be used for the purposes stated in this agreement.

"Section 5. The Board of Trustees shall promptly use the monies available in the Fund first to provide the benefits specified in the Plan. The Board shall have power to enter into contracts and procure insurance policies necessary to place into effect and maintain the Plan, to terminate, modify or renew any such contracts or policies subject to the provisions of this agreement and the collective bargaining agreements, and to exercise and claim all rights and benefits granted to the Board or the Fund by any such contracts or policies. Any such contract or policy may be executed in the name of the Fund, and any such policy may be produced in such name." of the eleven Southern California counties (sometimes herein referred to as the "Agreement"), which provided, in effect, that the Contractor would be bound by the Master Labor Agreement.

During the effective period of the Agreement, the Contractor employed construction carpenters on four construction projects of various school districts in Los Angeles county. The Contractor, pursuant to the provisions of Government Code sections 4200-4208, provided the school districts with four separate bonds (though not identical), each applicable to one of the four construction contracts.<sup>2</sup>

[1] It was claimed that the Contractor failed to make certain of the payments to the Welfare Fund. An action was filed by the Trustees of the Trust Fund against the Contractor and the surety company to collect the amounts due. The amended complaint incorporated, as exhibits, the bonds in question, the Agreement between the Contractor and the Council, the Master Labor Agreement and the Agreement and Declaration of Trust.

The surety company filed a demurrer which was sustained without leave to amend, and this appeal followed from the judgment which was thereafter entered.

Indemnity Insurance Company of North America filed a cross-appeal because the court refused to grant it attorney's fees as costs. In view of our decision on the plaintiffs' appeal, little, if anything, need be said with reference to the cross-appeal.

The issue is whether, under the provisions of the Government Code, the surety is liable to the appellants for the unpaid Health and Welfare contributions which the Contractor agreed to make to the Fund.

2. Government Code, § 4204:

"To be approved, the contractor's bond shall provide that if the person or his subcontractors, fail to pay for any materials, provisions, provender or other supplies, or teams, used in, upon, for or about the performance of the work contracted to be done, or for any work or labor thereon of any kind, or for

Counsel in this matter have been of the utmost assistance to the Court through the filing of their complete and comprehensive briefs.

The payment of the contributions to the Health and Welfare Fund is obviously in payment for labor. It would seem to be apparent that if the agreement between the Contractor and the Union provided that the Contractor pay the carpenter five or ten cents per hour above the prevailing wage rate, and the carpenter had, by contract with the Union, agreed to contribute that sum to the Health and Welfare Fund, the surety would have been obligated to make good any default in Contractor's payments of the extra five or ten cents per hour. The surety asserts, in substance, that when the amounts are paid directly to the Fund, then a different rule must prevail. We are of the opinion that under the circumstances no such fine legal distinction can be drawn.

The theory or philosophy of health and welfare plans is commendable. As stated in a United States Senate Committee report, "The existence of welfare and pension programs is a tribute to the free enterprise system. They constitute an important underpinning of our economic security, broadening and supplementing the various governmental programs." Under the plan, the Contractor, by contributing a fixed amount per hour of work to a trust fund, administered by representatives of labor and industry, can provide benefits for employees greater than could be purchased by the individual for the same amount of money. Also, the worker who, by the nature of his craft, is required to shift from one employer to another can pool his credits with the Fund and thereby secure continued protection. It was appropriately amounts due under the Unemployment Insurance Act with respect to such work or labor, that the surety or sureties will pay for the same, in an amount not exceeding the sum specified in the bond, and also, in case suit is brought upon the bond, a reasonable attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court."

said in Coos Bay Lumber Company v. Local 7-116, International Woodworkers of America, (C.I.O.), 1955, 203 Or. 342, 279 P. 2d 508, at page 512, 280 P.2d 412:

" * * * Since such plans are mandatory subjects for collective bargaining, a union has authority to obtain a wage increase for its members in the form of an employer-paid insurance plan. It follows therefore, that it also has the power to obtain a wage increase to be applied for the purchase of insurance as the union directs. Both situations involve substantially the same thing: a wage increase which takes the form of group insurance. As compared with the situation where a collective bargaining agreement provides for a so-called employer-paid plan, a contract between an employer and a union, such as the one before us, only indicates more specifically what such a group insurance plan really is when it provides that it is to be financed by a wage increase. Therefore, the distinction between employer-paid and employee-paid plans is at best one of form, not of substance, and the rights of the parties are the same in the two situations. International Woodworkers of America, Local 6-64, C.I.O. v. McCloud River Lumber Co., D.C., 119 F.Supp. 475, 486, in interpreting the provisions of a health and welfare insurance program substantially the same as the one before us, said:

" 'To this Court, the difference between "a wage increase intended as the method of financing the health and welfare plan" and "a wage increase to pay for a Health and Welfare Program for the employees' seems like the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee!'" "

In United States, for Benefit and on Behalf of Sherman v. Carter, 1957, 353 U.S. 210, 77 S.Ct. 793, 1 L.Ed.2d 776, the Supreme Court had occasion to interpret the Miller Act, 40 U.S.C.A. § 270a et seq., a federal law, designed to protect those supplying labor for the construction of federal buildings. The agreement involved in the Carter case was a collective bargaining agreement and provided for the payment of seven and one-half cents an hour to trustees of the Health and Welfare Fund, the trustees to use the money to purchase various types of life, accident, hospitalization and surgical benefit insurance for the laborer, as in the instant case. In the Carter case, as here, the laborer had no rights to the contribution except as provided in the trust agreement, and it was provided that the contributions should not constitute or be deemed to be wages. In the Carter case the contractor became insolvent after completing the construction work and paying the laborers their wages. The contractor was unable to make the contribution to the trustees, who then brought an action against the contractor's surety who had issued a bond similar to the bonds in question in this case. While we are mindful that the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Carter case is not necessarily binding upon us in this matter, nevertheless what was said by the Court in that instance is very cogent. After stating, in effect, that the surety's liability on the bond must at least be co-extensive with the obligations imposed by the Act, and that the trustees' rights against the surety depend upon and are measured by the statutory provisions, the court said (353 U.S. at page 216, 77 S.Ct. at page 796, 1 L.Ed.2d at pages 782-784):

" 'The Miller Act, like the Heard Act, is highly remedial in nature. It is entitled to a liberal construction and application in order properly to effectuate the Congressional intent to protect those whose labor and materials go into public projects. [Citing cases.] But such a salutary policy does not justify ignoring plain words of limitation and imposing wholesale liability on payment bonds.' Clifford F. MacEvoy Co. v. United States, 322 U.S. 102, 107, 64 S.Ct. 890, 893, 88 L.Ed. 1163.

"The Miller Act represents a congressional effort to protect persons supplying labor and material for the construction of federal public buildings in lieu of the protection they might receive under state statutes with respect to the construction of nonfederal buildings. The essence of its policy is to provide a surety who, by force of the Act, must make good the obligations of a defaulting contractor to his suppliers of labor and material. Thus the Act provides a broad but not unlimited protection.

"* * * The unpaid contributions were a part of the compensation for the work to be done by Carter's employees. The relation of the contributions to the work done is emphasized by the fact that their amount was measured by the exact number of hours each employee performed services for Carter. Not until the required contributions have been made will Carter's employees have been 'paid in full' for their labor in accordance with the collective-bargaining agreements.

"The surety suggests that Carter's obligation to contribute to the fund was not covered by the statutory bond because that obligation was not set forth in his construction contract with the United States, but appeared only in the master labor agreements. Those labor agreements were also the source of Carter's obligation to pay the 'wages' payable directly to his employees, an obligation concededly guaranteed by the bond. * * *

"The surety also argues that the trustees are not entitled to recover the promised contributions under § 2(a) of the Miller Act, since they are neither persons who have furnished labor or material, nor are they seeking 'sums justly due' to persons who have furnished labor or material. An answer to this contention is found in cases arising under the Heard Act involving suits by assignees of the claims of persons furnishing labor or material. Such assignees were not the persons who had furnished the labor or material for which the claims were made. They did not seek 'sums justly due' to persons who had themselves furnished labor or material, since the assignments had extinguished the right which those persons had to the performance of the contractors' obligation. Yet these cases established that assignees of the claims of persons furnishing labor or material came within the protection of the statutory bond. * * *

"If the assignee of an employee can sue on the bond, the trustees of the employees' fund should be able to do so. Whether the trustees of the fund are, in a technical sense, assignees of the employees' rights to the contributions need not be decided. Suffice it to say that the trustees' relationship to the employees, as established by the master labor agreements and the trust agreement, is closely analogous to that of an assignment. The master labor agreements not only created Carter's obligation to make the specified contributions, but simultaneously created the right of the trustees to collect those contributions on behalf of the employees. The trust agreement gave the trustees the exclusive right to enforce payment. The trustees stand in the shoes of the employees and are entitled to enforce their rights.

"Moreover, the trustees of the fund have an even better right to sue on the bond than does the usual assignee since they are not seeking to recover on their own account. The trustees are claiming recovery for the sole benefit of the beneficiaries of the fund, and those beneficiaries are the very ones who have performed the labor. The contributions are the means by which the fund is maintained for the benefit of the employees and of other construction workers. For purposes of the Miller Act, these contributions are in substance as much 'justly due' to the employees who have earned them as are the wages payable directly to them in cash."

It will be noted that section 4204 of the Government Code does not limit the surety's liability to the payment of "wages," but refers to the contractor's failure to pay for "any work or labor."

[2] Our view is that the Trustees can properly bring an action such as the one under consideration. Section 4205 of the Government Code specifically provides that the bond shall, by its terms, inure to the persons therein named "or their assigns in any suit brought upon the bond." See French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 P. 92; Hub Hardware Co. v. Aetna Accident & Liability Co., 178 Cal. 264, 173 P. 81. The Trustees, in this instance, are the assignees under an equitable assignment of the rights and claims of the carpenters, and as such have the right to sue under the circumstances. See Matter of Otto, D.C., 146 F. Supp. 786; McIntyre v. Hauser, 131 Cal. 11, 14, 63 P. 69; Goldman v. Murray, 164 Cal. 419, 422, 129 P. 462; Thorpe v. Story, 10 Cal.2d 104, 114, 73 P.2d 1194; City of Oakland v. California Construction Co., 15 Cal. 2d 573, 578, 104 P.2d 30; City of Oakland v. De Guarda, 95 Cal.App. 270, 285, 272 P. 779, 273 P. 819.

In a recent case, In re Embassy Restaurant, 3 Cir., 1958, 254 F.2d 475, the court had under consideration a situation wherein the contractor had gone bankrupt and had not paid specified amounts to the Welfare Fund. In the employer's bankruptcy proceeding the Trustees of the Welfare Fund filed proofs of claim, seeking priority over tax claims of the United States. The district court, 154 F.Supp. 141, granted the wage priority to the employer contributions and the government appealed. The appellate court said, in affirming the district court (254 F.2d at pages 477-478):

"Union Funds providing welfare benefits to employees through employer contributions contracted for in collective bargaining agreements play an essential and ever growing part in our industrial economy. We are firmly convinced that unions bargain for these contributions as though they were wages, and further that industry considers the contributions as an integral part of the wage package. See Note, 66 Yale L.J. 449, 460 (1957). The contributions are in a true sense the agreed compensation for services rendered and as such must be considered wages. For this reason we are constrained to disagree with the view of the Second Circuit in the Hack decision [Local 140 Security Fund v. Hack, 242 F.2d 375] and to affirm the decision of the district court here."

The respondent maintains that we are bound to a limited and strict interpretation of the statute in question; that health and welfare contributions were not even known when the statute in question was adopted in 1919, and that therefore the legislature never intended that a statutory bond should include such health and welfare payments. The respondent admits however, that "[t]he purpose for which such labor and material bonds are executed is for the benefit of laborers and materialmen. (Citing cases.) It has been held that such statutes and bonds should be liberally construed to effect the purpose of the Legislature. (Citing cases.)"

Respondent also asserts that the section in question, namely § 4204 of the Government Code, was amended in 1947 to make the bond expressly cover State Unemployment Insurance Act taxes, and that therefore, in effect, it was the intention of the legislature, by including one additional obligation, to exclude any other. A complete answer to any such contention is that Unemployment Insurance taxes are a government imposed obligation, whereas health and welfare payments are mutually agreed to obligations in return for work.

Our California courts, in many instances, have interpreted the bond statute in question, with reference to what constitutes "materials" or "supplies." In Pacific Wood & Coal Co. v. Oswald, 1919, 179 Cal. 712, at pages 714-716, 178 P. 854, the court set forth:

"* * * Since the filing of the briefs herein, this court has had occasion to consider the effect of statutes like the one here involved, and has, in at least two cases, declared that such statutes must be given a broader construction than had, perhaps, been thought to be proper theretofore. * * The federal decisions, cited in the Sherman Case [Sherman v. American Surety Co. of New York, 178 Cal. 286, 173 P. 161], unite in giving to the statute and the bond a liberal interpretation, and hold, accordingly, that the obligation of the sureties will cover such items as cartage and towage of materials, rental of cars and other equipment used by the contractor, freight charges in transporting materials, and even the cost of provisions used by a contractor in feeding his employé's where the location of the work rendered the furnishing of such board necessary. A similar result was reached by Department One in Bricker v. Rollins [& Jarecki], 178 Cal. 347, 173 P. 592. The opinion in that case did, it is true, refer to the inclusion in the statute and the bond of the 'more comprehensive word "supplies."' It relied, however, on the authority of the Sherman Case and the cases there cited. In their reasoning, as well as in their citation of authority, the Sherman and the Bricker Cases must therefore be regarded as authority for the conclusion that items like the one here claimed are recoverable under a bond requiring payment for 'materials furnished for or in the doing of the work,' irrespective of the presence or absence of the word 'supplies.'"

Also, in the case of Williamson v. Egan, 209 Cal. 343, at page 349, 287 P. 503, at page 506, the court, in passing upon what the surety company was liable for, stated in effect that it was not disposed to give a narrow construction to the terms of the bond and said, "The bond sued upon here is one required by statute and its provisions are to be liberally construed to effectuate its purpose. Continental Nat. Bank v. Republic Casualty Co., 202 Cal. 586, 589, 262 P. 300. * * *"

And, in A. L. Young Machinery Co. v. Cupps, 213 Cal. 210, at pages 213-214, 2 P.2d 321, at page 322, the court said: "It has repeatedly been held in reference to the 1919 act, and its predecessors, that such acts are to be more liberally construed than the mechanic's lien statutes, and that the reasons for giving a limited construction to the latter are not applicable to the former. (Citing cases.) It has been held under the 1919 act and similar public work statutes, that rental of machinery, money expended on the hiring of mule teams, money spent for provisions, harness, and other equipment, including scrapers, freight on mules and equipment etc., are all recoverable against the surety. (Citing cases.)" See also, McCormick Saeltzer Co. v. Haidlen, 119 Cal.App. 96, 6 P.2d 255, and Christie v. Commercial Casualty Ins. Co., 6 Cal.App.2d 710, 715, 45 P.2d 263.

It would appear that if the words "materials" and "supplies" are to be given the broad interpretation and meaning indicated by the cited cases as proper, then surely the words "pay for * * * any work or labor thereon of any kind," as used in the same bond mean more, and should be construed to include more than just basic hourly wage rates.

It is our conclusion that the contributions sought to be recovered are directly related to the work performed in the construction of the school projects by the Contractor. The amounts became due solely because the work was performed, and the sum is measured by the number of hours of work performed.

The legislature intended to protect the laborer as to every element of his compensation, whether that compensation be an hourly wage, or whether it be an hourly wage plus other benefits, and the novelty of the health and welfare provisions of the contracts does not in any wise prevent the contributions therefor from being considered as payments for "any work or labor" on the bonded project.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer and allow defendants a reasonable time within which to answer the complaint herein if they be so advised.

Wm. J. Clark, Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., James E. Sabine, Asst. Atty. Gen., Dan Kaufmann, James C. Maupin, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

Trippet, Yoakum, Stearns & Ballantyne, Oscar A. Trippet and David Freeman, Los Angeles, amicus curiae.

NOURSE, Justice pro tem.

By its amended and supplemental complaint in this action appellant sought to recover sales taxes in the sum of $10,446.45 paid by it under protest. These sales taxes were based upon transportation charges made by appellant to its customers for the delivery or sending of the materials sold by it during the period from May 1, 1951, through September 30, 1953, and which were assessed upon the grounds that the cost of transportation was incurred prior to the sale of the materials and was taxable as a part of appellant's gross receipts.

The facts so far as relevant to the questions presented here are:

During the period in question appellant was engaged in the business of mining and selling decomposed granite from lands owned by it or held by it under mining leases. Appellant did not stockpile any materials but upon receiving an order for decomposed granite mined the material and placed it directly on trucks to be hauled to the place designated by the purchaser. Appellant did not own any trucks but in all instances contracted for the transportation of the materials with independent licensed "highway carriers." The charges of these carriers are governed by tariffs promulgated by the Public Utilities Commission which fix the charge that may and must be made for delivery within certain zones. Practically all of appellant's orders with the exception of those hereinafter noted came in by telephone.

When a new customer called he would ask the price and would be quoted the price per ton at the appellant's place and after giving the address to which the materials were to be delivered or sent he would be quoted the transportation cost based upon the applicable tariff and the total of the two items. If the customer was an old one there would be no discussion as to price but an order would be given and taken for so many tons of gravel with the point to which the materials were to be transported given. Unless the customer indicated his desire to pick up the materials in his own trucks no statement was made to the customer as to who would be employed to transport the materials.

Upon receiving the order appellant would call upon an independent "highway carrier," would load the amount of the order onto his truck and give him a delivery ticket in duplicate. This ticket contained the name of the consignee, the address to which the materials were to be transported, the purchase order number, if any, and a statement of the weight of the materials delivered, and the name of the highway carrier and it also contained a notation, as follows: "Our drivers will make every effort to place materials where customer designates, but the shipper assumes no responsibility for damages inside the curb line."

Upon reaching the destination shown in the delivery slip the carrier would cause one copy thereof to be signed by the consignee and would return it to the appellant and thereafter appellant would pay the transportation charge as fixed by the applicable tariff. Transactions of this character constituted the great bulk of the transactions involved.

In all instances on appellant's books the charges were broken down so as to separately state the price charged for the materials, the sales tax on those materials and the amount charged for transportation which in all cases was the exact amount paid to the highway carrier.

The form of invoice sent to purchasers of the class mentioned above varied. In some invoices the price of the materials was stated, the tax on the materials was stated and the transportation charge was separately stated followed by a total of all three items. On others there was a statement of the number of tons at a price per ton which equalled the pit price of the materials plus the transportation cost followed by a total of the two. There was then a notation such as "3½% tax on materials at $.55" followed by the total of the tax. In others the number of tons was stated at a price per ton equal to the pit price plus transportation and the total amount followed by the notation "3½% on material"<sup>1</sup> followed by a notation of the total tax.

In the case of certain private corporations and municipal corporations the method of handling the transactions varied from what we have stated but, inasmuch as the amount of the tax on these transactions is but a fraction of a per cent of the tax paid and sought to be recovered, and as the facts varied in each case and as the trial court made no distinction between these transactions and the great bulk of the transactions, it would serve no useful purpose to here detail the methods used in the transactions we have just mentioned.

The statutory provisions involved in the determination of this case are the following designated sections of Revenue and Taxation Code: sections 6051, 6006, 6011 and 6012.

Section 6051, Revenue and Taxation Code, in substance provides that for the privilege of selling tangible personal property at retail a tax of 3 per cent of the gross receipts of any retailer is imposed. By section 6011 "Sales price" is defined as the total amount for which tangible personal property is sold including the cost of transportation of property prior to its purchase but excluding transportation charges for transportation occurring after the purchase of the property if that charge is separately stated. By section 6012 "Gross receipts" is defined as the total amount received on the sale without any deduction of the cost of transportation of the property prior to its sale to the purchaser but excluding from the amount received "[t]ransportation charges separately stated" if the transportation occurs after the sale of the property is made to the purchaser. Section 6006 in defining "sale" provides in part as follows: "(a) Any transfer of title or possession, exchange, barter, lease, or rental, conditional or otherwise, in any manner or any means whatsoever, of tangible personal property for a consideration. 'Transfer of possession,' 'lease,' or 'rental' includes only transactions found by the board to be in lieu of a transfer of title, exchange, or barter. (b) Any withdrawal, except a withdrawal pursuant to a transaction in foreign or interstate commerce, of tangible personal property from the place where it is located for delivery to a point in this State for the purpose of the transfer of title or possession, exchange, barter, lease, or rental, conditional or otherwise, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, of the property for a consideration."<sup>2</sup> (Emphasis added.)

The trial court found that all the transportation charges made by appellant to its customers during the period in question were for transportation of the materials which occurred prior to this sale;

1. This included the city sales tax.
2. Effective September 15, 1953, this section was amended so as to delete subdivision (b) as above quoted. But the section as quoted was in effect during the entire period for which the taxes were assessed excepting the last 15 days thereof.

that no sale by appellant to its customers took place until delivery to the customer at the respective places designated by them; and that the appellant's bills to its customers included a charge for both the materials and transportation. The court made no finding as to whether the charges for materials and the charge for transportation were separately stated. By its conclusions of law the court concluded that all transportation charges made by appellant to its customers were for transportation of materials occurring prior to the sale thereof and were a part of the sales price of the property sold by appellant and were properly includable within the gross receipts of appellant and taxable as such. The court further concluded that section 6006(b) of the Revenue and Taxation Code heretofore quoted "is inapplicable to the facts presented at the trial."

It was the position of the respondent at the trial of the action and it is its position here that the question as to whether the sales took place before or after the transportation charges were incurred was to be resolved under the provisions of the Uniform Sales Act as adopted in this State (Part 4, title I, et seq., §§ 1721-3268 inc., Civ.Code) and that the definition of "sale" contained in subdivision (b) of section 6006, Revenue and Taxation Code, had no application and this position is the one adopted by the trial court in determining this case. It is further respondent's contention that the transportation charges made by appellant to its customers were not separately stated within the meaning of section 6012 and that therefore the tax was properly assessed irrespective of whether the charges were incurred before or after the sales took place.

Appellant contends that if the applicable law is the law of sales as set forth in the Uniform Sales Act the evidence establishes without substantial conflict that it was the intention of the parties that title should pass when its materials were placed upon the trucks of the independent contractor (highway carrier) for transportation to its customers. They assert, however, that the question as to what constitutes a sale is to be determined not by the Uniform Sales Act but by the provisions of section 6006 of the Revenue and Taxation Code and that all of the transactions here fell within the definition of sale set forth in subdivision (b) of that section.

[1] While a large part of the briefs of each of the parties is given over to the question of whether a sale took place before or after the transportation charges in question were incurred if the provisions of the Uniform Sales Act are applicable, that question need not be decided here for we are convinced that it is the definition of a sale set forth in section 6006(b) of the Revenue and Taxation Code which must be applied.

Under this section a taxable sale takes place when there is "[a]ny withdrawal * * * of taxable personal property from the place where it is located for delivery to a point in this State for the purpose of the transfer of title * * * of the property for a consideration." Withdrawal has a common meaning; it is defined by Webster's International Dictionary, second edition, as "removal, as from a place of deposit * * *." Applying this statutory definition of "sale" to the facts here it is clear that a taxable sale was accomplished the moment the decomposed granite was removed from the ground and placed aboard the trucks of the highway carrier consigned to the customer. As none of the transportation charges taxed were incurred until after the material was placed aboard the carrier they did not become a part of appellant's gross receipts except in instances where they were not separately stated.

Respondent makes no contention that the statute is ambiguous but bases its contention that the definition of sale contained in subdivision (b) of the section is not applicable upon the asserted fact that the purpose of the Legislature in enacting this statutory definition was to enable the State to tax retail transactions that would not otherwise be taxable; i. e., transactions where goods were shipped from one point in this State for sale within territory which had been ceded by the State to the United States without the rights of taxation being reserved to the State such as the military reservation known as "The Presidio" in San Francisco (see Standard Oil Co. v. People of State of California, 291 U.S. 242, 54 S.Ct. 381, 78 L.Ed. 775, decided in 1935).<sup>3</sup>

[2] We may assume for the purposes of this decision that the purpose of the Legislature was as contended for by respondent; but, there being no ambiguity in the statute, we cannot give it any different meaning from that which the language used compels. We may not, under the guise of interpretation, write into the statute something that is not there in order to give it a meaning other than the meaning expressed. Seaboard Acceptance Corp. v. Shay, 214 Cal. 361, 365-366, 5 P.2d 882; People v. One 1940 Ford V-8 Coupe, 36 Cal.2d 471, 475, 224 P.2d 677; In re Miller, 31 Cal.2d 191, 198-199, 187 P.2d 722; People v. White, 122 Cal.App. 2d 551, 554, 265 P.2d 115.

In Seaboard Acceptance Corp. v. Shay, supra, in which the Supreme Court was called upon to interpret a statute, the language of which was such as to defeat the evident purpose of the Legislature in enacting it, that court in refusing to place an interpretation on the statute which would accomplish the legislative purpose and render the statute valid rather than void, said (214 Cal. at pages 365-366, 5 P.2d at page 884): "It is probably safe to assume that the Legislature had in mind the protection of persons dealing with a buyer in possession, but the difficulty is that they have not expressed this intent in the language used. This court has no power to rewrite the statute so as to make it conform to a presumed intention which is not expressed. This court is limited to interpreting the statute, and such interpretation must be based on the language used. * * * It is elementary that there can be no intent in a statute not expressed in its words; that the intention of the Legislature must be determined from the language of the statute. (Citations.) 'It is a cardinal rule in the construction of statutes that the intent of the legislator should be followed, but this is subject to the imperative and paramount rule that the court cannot depart from the meaning of language which is free from ambiguity, although the consequence would be to defeat the object of the act.'"

[3] In order to uphold the judgment of the trial court and the contention of respondent, it would be necessary to read into the statute a provision which would exclude as a sale any withdrawal which was made for delivery to a point in the State where the property would be taxable. This we cannot do for the unambiguous language of the statute makes the definition applicable where the withdrawal is for delivery to any point in the State, irrespective of whether a sale at that point would be taxable.

Respondent asserts that if the definition of sale which we have held applicable is applied the provision of section 6012 that the cost of transportation prior to the sale shall be included as a part of the retailer's gross receipts is rendered nugatory. We see no merit in this contention.

[4] In the first place, the retailer is precluded from segregating from his gross receipts that part of the selling price which consists of the transportation cost paid by him in the acquisition of the goods sold. In the second place, section 6012 and the provisions as to transportation as contained in both sections 6012 and 6011 are only applicable to costs before the sale and as we have pointed out the

3. The definition of sale here in question was first incorporated in the Sales and Use Tax Law as a part of subdivision (a) in 1939 and was not eliminated until statute has clearly made the withdrawal from the place of deposit a taxable sale. At most this contention of respondent merely creates a doubt as to the intention of the Legislature and where the meaning of a tax statute is doubtful it must be construed most strongly against the taxing power. California Motor Transport Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 31 Cal. 2d 217, 187 P.2d 745; Pioneer Express Co. v. Riley, 208 Cal. 677, 687, 284 P. 663.

The trial court, as we have pointed out, made no finding upon the issue presented by the pleadings as to whether appellant's charges for transportation were expressly stated. Such a finding was not required under the theory upon which the matter was decided by the trial court, to wit: that subdivision (b) of section 6006 was not applicable and that applying the Uniform Sales Act there was, under the facts proven, no sale until the materials were delivered to the customer. But, as we have come to a contrary conclusion, we must pass upon the question as to whether the procedures adopted by appellant met the requirements of section 6012, Revenue and Taxation Code, that transportation charges incurred after the sale must be separately stated. It is our opinion that those that are in one of the forms of invoice noted above did this.

[5] A taxable sale having been completed by the withdrawal of the materials through placing them upon the trucks for delivery, the purposes of the statute were fully met by the separate entry of the price of the materials and the transportation charges and the tax in appellant's books and by an invoice which was sufficient to advise the customer as to the breakdown in the total amount for which he was billed. Certainly those invoices which separately stated the price of the materials and the amount advanced by appellant for transportation costs fully met the statutory requirement. Those that showed the tax on materials at a certain price per ton of materials required but a simple mathematical calculation by the buyer to segregate the transportation charge from the total for which he was billed. Those that only showed the tax and noted that it was on materials only did not require a complicated calculation.

[6] Our attention has not been directed by respondent to any published regulations, effective during the period involved here, of the Board of Equalization which required any more detailed separation of the charges and, as the methods adopted were sufficient to prevent evasion of tax, they were in our opinion sufficient, in the absence of specific regulations advising the taxpayer as to procedure to be adopted.

The judgment is reversed.

Suit for rescission of deed conveying realty from mother to her adult son. Upon the mother's death her administratrix was substituted in her place. The Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Otto J. J., held that son would be required to account for sum which he agreed to hold for payment of future medical expenses which the mother might incur.

1. Deeds §211(4)

In suit for rescission of deed conveying realty from mother to her adult son, evidence relating to mother's serious illness, her need for constant care which was supplied when son and his wife moved into property deeded to son, and the receipt by mother of money to pay her medical bills, and to her daily association with her two daughters at time of transaction, sustained trial court's finding that transaction was free of undue influence.

2. Appeal and Error §989

Ruth A. Harris, in pro. per.

FOX, Presiding Justice.

This is a suit for rescission of a deed to real property. Plaintiff has appealed from a judgment in favor of defendants.

Early in 1956 Laura, who was then 61 years of age, became seriously ill and was forced to spend several weeks in a hospital. Laura became concerned over the mounting hospital and doctor bills and had many discussions with each of her children regarding this problem. While Lewis was of the opinion that Laura's home (the property which is the subject of this suit) should be rented to provide an income, both his sisters wanted the property sold. In fact, the sisters made many efforts to persuade Laura to let them sell the furniture. Lewis opposed this action. Finally Laura decided that the house should be sold. It was determined that Laura should either execute a power of attorney or deed the property so that her children could handle the sale for her. Lewis was told by a real estate agent that Laura's transferring the legal title would be more desirable. Lewis suggested to Laura that all three children should be named in the deed. Laura stated that she did not wish Marcilette to be one of the grantees and even suggested that Lewis should be the sole grantee. However, when Lewis had the deed prepared by his attorney, he directed that Ruth and himself be named as grantees. Thereafter he took the deed to Laura and read her the contents. She approved and executed the deed on March 15, 1956. Although she was in the hospital at the time, she was fully coherent and had command of her faculties. She saw each of her children practically every day.

Lewis contacted several real estate agents in an effort to effect a sale of the property. Laura left the hospital on April 29, 1956, and went to live with Lewis and his family. Laura's doctor had informed the children that she would need constant care and should not be allowed to live alone. Late in May Laura was still worried about her medical bills and the house had not yet been sold. At this time Lewis and his mother entered into an agreement. Lewis was to receive the entire legal title to Laura's home. In return Lewis agreed to borrow $6,000 with which he would pay all Laura's medical bills, pay off the small mortgage on her house and defray certain expenses necessary in moving his family from his home into hers and in preparing his home for rental purposes. Lewis, his family and Laura were to live together in her home and Lewis was to provide food, clothing and care for Laura for the remainder of her life. There was a balance of $2,000 from the original loan which Lewis left in the bank; he told Laura that it was her money and that she could have it whenever she wanted it. The purpose of borrowing this extra $2,000, even though it was not then needed, was to provide a fund for any future operations or hospitalization without having to resort to another loan.

On May 21, 1956, Lewis and Ruth executed a deed conveying the property to Lewis and his wife. Laura approved this transfer. Lewis and his family and Laura moved into the subject property. Lewis effected the loan and paid the various bills.

The dressing on Laura's foot required constant changing and she was on a special diet. Lewis and his wife faithfully fulfilled Laura's needs in these respects.

After a short time Laura became dissatisfied with the arrangement and began to complain. Finally she gave Lewis formal notice of rescission of her transfer of the property in question. Lewis stated in writing that he would be willing to rescind on condition that he received compensation for the various expenses he had incurred and for the services he had rendered Laura. But Laura immediately filed this suit "for rescission, to cancel an instrument, for an accounting, and to quiet title." Laura continued to live in the house with Lewis and his family until the time of her death. Laura died in February, 1957, and the case proceeded to trial with Marcilette substituted as plaintiff. The trial court ruled that neither Laura nor her estate had any right, title or interest in the subject real property and rendered judgment for defendants. The court also denied any accounting.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that Laura's conveyance was free of undue influence. The rules governing this situation are clear:

[2] "When a finding is attacked on the ground that there is not any substantial evidence to sustain it, the power of an appellate court begins and ends with the determination as to whether there is any substantial evidence contradicted or uncontradicted which will support the finding of fact. [Citations.]

[3] "When two or more inferences can reasonably be deduced from the facts, a reviewing court is without power to substitute its deductions for those of the trial court. [Citations.]" Primm v. Primm, 46 Cal.2d 690, 693-694, 299 P.2d 231, 233.

Appellant argues that Lewis was in a confidential relationship with Laura, that Lewis exercised activity in procuring the deed, and that the consideration for the property was disproportionate to its value. From this she concludes that a presumption of undue influence arose, thereby shifting the burden of proof to Lewis. Kloehn v. Prendiville, 154 Cal.App.2d 156, 161, 316 P.2d 17. However, even if we assume that undue influence by Lewis could be presumed, the evidence is still sufficient to support the trial court's finding that the transaction was free of undue influence.

"Undue influence has been defined to be that kind of influence or supremacy of one mind over another by which that other is prevented from acting according to his own wish or judgment, and whereby the will of the person is overborne and he is induced to do or forbear to do an act which he would not do, or would do, if left to act freely. [Citations.]" Webb v. Saunders, 79 Cal.App.2d 863, 871, 181 P.2d 43, 47. "What constitutes undue influence and what constitutes sufficient proof thereof depend upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case." Sparks v. Sparks, 101 Cal.App.2d 129, 135, 225 P.2d 238, 242. In the instant case the evidence establishes that Laura transferred her title to the property because she wanted it sold; it was her own decision and Lewis, in fact, was opposed to such sale. Although Laura was in the hospital at the time she executed the deed, the evidence showed that she had full possession of her mental faculties, was at all times coherent, and that she knew what she was doing. She saw all her children regularly and constantly asked whether or not the house had been sold. When the property remained unsold after two months, Laura sought another means of solving her financial problem. She was living in Lewis' home and was being cared for properly. It appeared that neither of her other children could take care of her as well as Lewis and his wife. The agreement into which she and Lewis entered bestowed a great benefit on her; it completely solved the problems which had been distressing her for several months. Not only would she no longer have to worry about paying her medical bills, but she would also be assured that someone would take care of her for the rest of her life. Under such circumstances the trial court could properly deduce that Lewis did not gain any unfair advantage by the agreement. There was no evidence that Lewis coerced Laura into making this agreement. Her two daughters saw her practically every day during this period, and their constant presence tends to negate any inference that Lewis exerted undue influence upon her. Lewis' testimony clearly indicates that Laura made a free choice and exercised her own will in making the agreement.<sup>1</sup> It was, of course, within the trial court's discretion to believe this testimony. The record as a whole provides ample support for the trial court's conclusion that the transaction was free of undue influence. The court therefore did not err in denying rescission or other relief with respect to the property in question.

[4] Appellant's next contention is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings that on March 15, 1956, Laura intended to convey all her right, title and interest in the property in consideration of the agreement with Lewis. The findings

1. Relative to the discussion which Lewis and Laura had concerning his taking title to her home to the exclusion of the other two children, Lewis stated in part that "she [Laura] said that it was hers to give; that they [the other children] were married, and had less responsibility, and that she was going to live with me, and in the period that she had been at our house, it had been to her liking, and that she wanted to give me the house for me to borrow only enough money to take care of the actual hospital bills, and moving expenses, and in that way I would have less money to pay per month, and I told her that I appreciated it, but that there was the possibility of the operation, and we had to take that into consideration; that instead of getting one loan after another, it would be better to get one loan that would take care of it, up to $6,000; that I would give her $2,000 to be held for an operation or future hospitalization, or as she saw fit to use it."

in this regard are quoted below.<sup>2</sup> In effect the court finds that Laura made the March 15 conveyance in consideration of Lewis' agreement to borrow money and pay her medical bills, care for her, and so forth. This is slightly inaccurate in that the evidence establishes that Laura conveyed the property on March 15 for the purpose of facilitating its sale for her by Lewis. However, she did intend to convey her legal title to the property at that time. Whatever equitable rights she might have had in the property were extinguished by the agreement which she thereafter entered into with Lewis, and under which he was to receive outright title to the property. Pursuant to that agreement she approved the transfer of title from Lewis and Ruth to Lewis and his wife. And Lewis performed the acts required of him by the agreement; he paid her medical bills, paid off her mortgage, moved his family into her house, and provided her with the proper food and care. Laura was thereafter estopped to assert any right to the property. It is thus clear that the error in the findings is inconsequential and harmless.

[5] Appellant's final contention is that "the judgment is against the law in that it upholds the conveyance involved but denies plaintiff the consideration for said conveyance." In this connection appellant argues that Laura's estate should recover from Lewis the $2,000 which Lewis was holding for Laura and the money to pay a $660 hospital bill which accrued during her last illness. It does appear from Lewis' testimony that part of his agreement was to hold the extra $2,000 for Laura's benefit.<sup>3</sup> Under such circumstances it appears that the trial court should have ordered that he account to her estate for such amount. However, he should not be required to pay the $660 medical bill in addition. One of the purposes of having the $2,000 set aside was to defray any future medical expenses which Laura might incur. Thus, this last bill should be paid out of the $2,000 which Lewis holds for the benefit of Laura's estate. The findings, conclusions and judgment should therefore be revised to provide for Lewis' payment of $2,000 to appellant as administratrix of Laura's estate.

The judgment is reversed with directions to enter new findings of fact, conclusions of law and judgment not inconsistent with the views expressed herein. Each side shall bear its own costs on appeal.

2. With respect to the March 15 conveyance the court found:

"II

"That said conveyance was made voluntarily and without fraud or deceit or undue influence; that at the time said conveyance was made, the said Laura Lennix Williams was in possession of her faculties and mentally capable of executing the conveyance, and had knowledge that she had executed said deed, and intended to convey all of her right, title and interest in and to said real property.

"III

"That said conveyance was made in consideration that the said defendant Lewis Isaac Williams would borrow the sum of $6,000.00 with the said real property as security for said loan; that said defendant would provide support, shelter, food, medical care, and all the necessities of life for said Laura Lennix Williams for her lifetime; that said defendant and his family would remove from defendant's home to the subject real property; that the proceeds of the loan would be used in defraying a mortgage indebtedness against the subject real property in the approximate amount of $600.00; to pay the hospital and other medical expense of said Laura Lennix Williams; to pay all other indebtednesses of said Laura Lennix Williams; and to provide for future medical needs of said Laura Lennix Williams; that further sums were to be expended in repairing the home of defendants Lewis and Virginia Williams, and to provide for certain expenses incident to defendant's moving from his home to the subject real property."

3. On this point Lewis testified as follows:

"Q. Did you tell her in substance, 'I have this other $2,000 for you, and any time you want it, you can have it'?

A. That was the original deal.

"Q. That is what you told her? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you consider that $2,000 her money? A. I considered it her money."

Civ. 22916.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Aug. 18, 1958.

Hearing Denied Oct. 15, 1958.

Action for wrongful death of plaintiff's decedent, who was killed when a train operated by defendant railroad collided with his truck at a grade crossing. The Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Mildred L. Lillie, J., entered judgment for defendant, and denied plaintiff's motion for new trial, and plaintiff appealed from such judgment and order. The District Court of Appeal, Herndon, J., held that where it was determined on prior appeal of action that a question of fact was presented as to whether under the circumstances plaintiff's decedent took precautions which the situation demanded for his own protection, such decision established the law of the case that plaintiff's testimony was not irreconcilable with presumption of due care by decedent, and therefore trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction on such presumption, but, in view of evidence describing decedent's conduct just before the accident, and in view of jury's apparent finding that decedent was guilty of contributory negligence, such error would not be deemed prejudicial.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Appeal and Error ⇨1097(1)

Where evidence presented at a first and second trial of a wrongful death action was substantially the same, and, upon appeal following first trial, court held that plaintiff's evidence did not establish decedent's contributory negligence as a matter of law, such holding was the law of the case.

2. Appeal and Error ⇨1067, 1195(1)

Where it was determined on prior appeal of an action that a question of fact was presented as to whether under the circumstances plaintiff's decedent took precautions which the situation demanded for his own protection, such decision established as the law of the case that plaintiff's testimony was not irreconcilable with presumption of due care by decedent, and therefore trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction, on such presumption, but, in view of evidence describing decedent's conduct just before the accident, and in view of jury's apparent finding that decedent was guilty of contributory negligence, such error would not be deemed prejudicial.

3. Death ⇨58(1)

The only possible justification for employment of presumption of due care of a decedent against the party carrying the burden of proof is to provide a balancing factor to compensate for a handicap resulting from the destruction of a vital source of evidence, and the reason upon which such justification rests is almost nonexistent in a case where the evidence clearly describes activities of the decedent just prior to his death.

4. Appeal and Error ⇨110

A purported appeal from all proceedings taken on a motion for a new trial on all matters to which the same related presented nothing for review and such appeal would be dismissed.

Robert W. Walker, and J. H. Cummins, Los Angeles, for respondents.

HERNDON, Justice.

Plaintiff administratrix appeals from a judgment in favor of defendants entered upon a jury verdict in a wrongful death action. The decedent was killed when a passenger train operated by defendant Santa Fe collided with his truck at a grade crossing. Plaintiff advances as her sole assignment of error the refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury that her decedent was presumed to have exercised due care for his own safety. Defendants justify the refusal of the requested instruction on the basis of their contention that the testimony given by plaintiff's witnesses was wholly irreconcilable with the presumption sought to be invoked. No other question is raised concerning the form or content of the instruction as requested.

The instant judgment was entered at the conclusion of the second trial of the case. The first trial ended with a judgment of nonsuit, which was granted upon the ground that plaintiff's evidence established decedent's contributory negligence as a matter of law. The nonsuit was reversed by Division One of this court in Murphy v. Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway, 139 Cal.App.2d 792, 294 P.2d 458. Upon retrial, as we have indicated, the jury rendered a verdict for the defendants and judgment was entered accordingly.

It is undisputed that plaintiff's evidence at the first and second trials was substantially the same. Plaintiff called the same four witnesses and, with relatively minor variations, their testimony, as set forth in the opinion rendered in the former appeal, was repeated at the second trial. Therefore, we limit our present statement of the facts to a general summary referring to the above cited opinion for a more detailed exposition of the evidence.

At about 4 p. m. on July 22, 1952, Frank J. Murphy, the decedent, was proceeding in a westerly direction on Phelan Road in the town of Hesperia, California, driving an eighteen-wheel tractor and trailer which, with its load of potatoes, weighed about 35 tons. The over-all length of the equipment was 52 feet. When he approached the double mainline tracks of the railroad, which cross Phelan Road at right angles, the crossing was blocked by a long freight train traveling in a southerly direction at a speed of 15 to 20 miles per hour on the easterly set of tracks.

Decedent brought his truck to a stop 6 to 12 feet from the easterly set of tracks and waited for the freight train to pass. As the caboose of the southbound freight train cleared the crossing, decedent started his truck forward and on to the railroad tracks. A northbound passenger train traveling approximately 80 miles per hour on the westerly set of tracks collided with the truck amidships and the fatality was instant. There is evidence that the truck had attained a speed of 5 to 10 miles per hour when it was struck.

Except for some conflict as to whether or not the passenger train signalled its approach to the crossing by its horn or whistle, the testimony of all of the several eyewitnesses was essentially consistent and undisputed. Plaintiff's witness Floyd, traveling in an easterly direction on Phelan Road in his 1950 Chevrolet, approached the railroad crossing from the side opposite decedent. As he waited for the freight train to clear, Floyd observed decedent's truck come to a stop on the other side. Floyd proceeded to cross the tracks as soon as the caboose cleared, and as he did so he saw the passenger train approaching from his right at a distance of about 350 feet from the crossing. He also saw decedent's truck moving forward as he was passing over the tracks. He continued to watch decedent's truck through his rear view mirror. Floyd had attained a speed of about 40 miles per hour and had traveled about 150 feet when the collision occurred.

Plaintiff called two other eyewitnesses, both of whom were well positioned to observe the tragedy from different angles. The witness Howell had stopped his car directly behind decedent's truck and saw the truck move forward the instant the caboose cleared the crossing. As stated above, the testimony of the several eyewitnesses as to the conduct of the decedent, the movements, speeds and relative positions of the truck and of the two trains was essentially consistent and without substantial conflict. In other words, the accident was described by testimony which was unusually clear, consistent, and satisfactory, the only point of conflict relating to the question whether the passenger train sounded its horn as it approached the crossing.

Both sides to this appeal point to and rely upon the unchallenged testimony of a model engineer who demonstrated by means of models constructed to scale the maximum distances that decedent could see to the south on the westerly or northbound track when the truck and the caboose were placed at various assumed positions. Plaintiff summarizes the substance of this testimony as follows: "By a manipulation of the models he demonstrated that when the bumper of the decedent's truck was on the first east rail, and the caboose of the freight train had just cleared Phelan Road and the 'Chief' was down about 140 feet from the crossing, that the driver of the truck would have no vision of the oncoming 'Chief.' But when the front bumper of the truck is on the second west rail and the 'Chief' is 140 feet away, the 'Chief' then comes into vision from the truck driver's seat. With the bumper of the truck on the second east rail, and moving the caboose of the freight train 50 feet south of the crossing with the 'Chief' still at 140 feet south of the crossing, the line of vision would still be obscured from the driver's seat of the truck. The 'Chief' would have to be approximately 135 feet from the crossing before the driver of the truck could see it with the rig having its front bumper on rail No. 3 or the second east rail with the caboose at approximately 50 feet down the track. At 80 miles an hour the 'Chief' would be traveling 120 feet a second so that it would be a matter of a little over one second from the time the 'Chief' first came into view of the decedent until the time of the impact."

The applicable test by which it is to be determined whether the presumption in question may be invoked in such circumstances is stated as follows in Gigliotti v. Nunes, 45 Cal.2d 85, 93, 286 P.2d 809, 814: "Although there is no room for the presumption where the driver or other person whose claimed negligence is at issue himself testifies to his actions at the time involved (see Speck v. Sarver (1942), 20 Cal.2d 585, 587-588, 128 P.2d 16), the rule is established that if such person be deceased or unable to testify by reason of loss of memory, the fact that other witnesses for the parties testify fully as to the acts and conduct of the allegedly negligent person does not deprive the party relying on the presumption of the benefit thereof unless the testimony which he himself produces 'under circumstances which afford no indication that the testimony is the product of mistake or inadvertence * * * is wholly irreconcilable with the presumption sought to be invoked.' (Westberg v. Willde (1939), 14 Cal.2d 360, 365-368, 94 P.2d 590; Mar Shee v. Maryland Assur. Corp. (1922), 190 Cal. 1, 9, 210 P. 269; Chakmakjian v. Lowe (1949), 33 Cal.2d 308, 313, 201 P.2d 801.)" To the same effect are Norton v. Futrell, 149 Cal.App.2d 586, 588, 308 P.2d 887, and Scott v. Burke, 39 Cal. 2d 388, 394, 247 P.2d 313.

[1] Since the evidence presented at the first and second trials is substantially the same, plaintiff is correct in contending that it is the law of the case that plaintiff's evidence did not establish decedent's contributory negligence as a matter of law. Wells v. Lloyd, 21 Cal.2d 452, 454-457, 132 P.2d 471. Upon this premise plaintiff argues that the prior decision constituted a determination that the testimony produced by plaintiff was not irreconcilable with the presumption that at the time and place in question the decedent exercised due care for his own safety and protection. Plaintiff argues, in other words, that "to hold that the decedent's conduct was irreconcilable with the presumption of due care is tantamount to saying that the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law."

[2] We conclude that the decision reversing the judgment of nonsuit established the law of the case that plaintiff's testimony was not irreconcilable with the presumption of due care. This is made manifest by the concluding sentence of that opinion reading as follows: "Clearly it was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether decedent, under the circumstances existing at the time, took the precautions which the situation demanded for his own protection." Murphy v. Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway, supra, 139 Cal.App.2d 792, 798, 294 P.2d 458, 461. It logically follows that the instruction in question should have been given.

The conclusion that the refusal of the instruction was error imposes upon us the further duty to canvass the question whether the error requires a reversal. In recent decisions our Supreme Court has furnished us with helpful guidance in the form of restatements of the test properly to be applied in the determination of this question. In People v. Watson, 46 Cal.2d 818, at page 836, 299 P.2d 243, at page 254, following a careful and comprehensive review of earlier decisions dealing with the application of Article VI, section 4½ of the California Constitution, Mr. Justice Spence restated the test in the following language:

"Giving due consideration to the varying language heretofore employed in relating the constitutional amendment to the particular situations involved, it appears that the test generally applicable may be stated as follows: That a 'miscarriage of justice' should be declared only when the court, 'after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence,' is of the 'opinion' that it is reasonably probable that a result more favorable to the appealing party would have been reached in the absence of the error. Phrasing the test in this language avoids any complexity which may be said to result from the language employed in the double negative approach, and such phrasing seems to coincide with the affirmative language used in the constitutional provision."

More recently, in Alarid v. Vanier, 50 Cal.2d 617, 327 P.2d 897, it was held that errors of the trial court in giving two inappropriate instructions were not sufficiently prejudicial to require a reversal.

In the opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Gibson the controlling test is restated in terms consistent with the language from People v. Watson, supra.

In obedience to the requirements of these decisions we have made a careful "examination of the entire cause, including the evidence" and from that examination we have reached the opinion that it is not "reasonably probable that a result more favorable to the appealing party would have been reached in the absence of the error." We conclude, accordingly, that there has been no miscarriage of justice.

It seems pertinent to the question whether a miscarriage of justice has occurred to observe that plaintiff has had two trials of this cause. In the first a learned trial judge held (erroneously but perhaps not altogether unreasonably) that decedent had been guilty of negligence as a matter of law. In the second trial a jury apparently found the decedent guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of fact upon evidence which described decedent's actions with such clarity and consistency as to facilitate a most clear and satisfactory visualization of the tragedy.

[3] Evidence of such completeness, consistency and unquestionable reliability as that which we find in the instant record leaves precious little room for the application of any conclusional presumption concerning the decedent's conduct. Viewing the situation realistically, we think an intelligent jury could not reasonably have given any substantial weight to the presumption in the circumstances of this case. The only possible justification for the employment of the presumption against the party carrying the burden of proof is to provide a balancing factor to compensate for a handicap resulting from the destruction of a vital source of evidence. The reason upon which such justification rests is almost non-existent in such a case as this. It is in marked contrast with cases in which the available evidence concerning the conduct in question was meager, contradictory or of doubtful reliability.

[4] The purported appeal "from all proceedings taken on motion for a new trial and all matters to which the same relate" obviously presents nothing for review and the same is dismissed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Will contest, involving will and codicil. From a denial of revocation of probate, contestant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, White, P. #### Appeal and Error ⇨77(2)

In will contest involving will and codicil, judgment denying revocation of probate of will was final and appealable, as against contention that court, which also declared mistrial as to issues concerning codicil, did not finally determine all issues.

West's Ann.Code Civ.Proc. § 963; West's Ann.Prob.Code, § 1240.

Ralph Marks, Los Angeles, and Gunther H. Schiff, Beverly Hills, for appellant.

Max Z. Wisot and Harry Albert, Long Beach, for respondent, Mrs. Marietta Mordue.

WHITE, Presiding Justice.

Respondent, Mrs. Marietta Mordue, moves to dismiss the appeal herein upon the ground that the judgment and/or order from which the appeal was taken is not a final judgment or order within the meaning of Probate Code, Section 1240.

This proceeding presents a contest of will after admission to probate. It involves a will dated July 2, 1953 and codicil dated January 27, 1955. The contest was tried before a jury. When the taking of evidence before the jury was concluded each of the appearing proponents of the testamentary documents made motions for a directed verdict which motions were denied. Sixteen written interrogatories, or special verdicts (eight with an equal number of alternate forms) were submitted to the jury. After more than three days deliberation the jury reported it was able to agree upon only three special verdicts, and was hopelessly deadlocked as to the remainder. These verdicts were received and filed and the jury thereupon discharged. Two of the three special verdicts had reference to the will while the third found that the codicil dated January 27, 1955, "was executed in the form and manner prescribed by law".

Immediately following discharge of the jury, counsel for contestant (appellant herein) being present, counsel for the proponents (respondents herein), presented separate motions under Section 630 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that an order issue for entry of judgment in accordance with the foregoing motions for a directed verdict. After argument and submission on briefs, the court concluded that the motions for a directed verdict should have been granted with respect to the will of July 2, 1953, as modified by the testator and in accordance with the findings of the jury thereon after motions were made to the court for a directed verdict.

As to the codicil of January 27, 1955, the court concluded that the aforesaid motions for a directed verdict were properly denied.

Order and judgment was thereupon entered:

"(1) That petition for revocation of the will of July 2, 1953, is denied and said will should be admitted to probate as modified by the hand, intent and purpose of the testator on or about January 27, 1955, to the extent and in accordance with the finding and special verdict of the jury with reference thereto. * * *

"(2) That trial of the issues with reference to the codicil of January 27th, 1955, is declared a mistrial."

From that portion of the judgment wherein the court denied revocation of the probate of decedent's will dated July 2, 1953, appellant prosecutes this appeal.

In urging a dismissal of the appeal respondent urges that while the order and judgment appealed from disposed of the issues of due execution, mental competency, undue influence and revocation of the will dated July 2, 1953, it leaves unsettled the issues of mental competency and undue influence of the testator with respect to the codicil of January 27, 1955. That the codicil republishes the content of the will and therefore, the decision rendered does not finally determine all the issues raised by the contest of appellant, to-wit:

"1. Lack of due execution of the Will and Codicil;

"2. Unsoundness of mind and the incompetency of the Decedent to make his Will or Codicil;

"3. Undue influence exerted on the testator in the making of said Will and Codicil;

"4. That the Will (not the Codicil) had been revoked by intentional cancellation, defacement and obliteration which effectively revoked the Will and the Codicil."

Respondent then asserts, "That by reason of the foregoing, the appeal herein is premature and Appellant seeks a piecemeal adjudication in this Court of the issues raised in her contest."

We are not in accord with respondents' reasoning. Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an appeal may be taken "from a superior court in the following cases:

"* * * (3) From such probate orders and decrees as are made appealable by the provisions of the Probate Code", and Section 1240 of the Probate Code provides in part as follows:

"An appeal may be taken * * * from an order * * * admitting a will to probate or revoking the probate thereof; * * * refusing to make any order heretofore mentioned in this section * * *".

In Re Estate of Estrem, 16 Cal.2d 563, 566, 107 P.2d 36, 38, our Supreme Court stated: "A preliminary question is raised as to the appealability of this order denying the motion to set aside the probate. The decision in Re Estate of O'Dea, [15 Cal.2d 637] 104 P.2d 368, handed down since the filing of the briefs herein, was cited to us on oral argument. That case holds that section 1240 of the Probate Code specifies the only orders and judgments in probate from which an appeal will lie, and an order made on a motion under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, like any other probate order, is appealable only if expressly so declared in section 1240. The effect of the order here under consideration was a refusal to revoke the probate and the letters issued pursuant thereto, and an order either granting or refusing such relief is expressly made appealable by section 1240." (Emphasis added.)

See also In re Sanders' Estate, 70 Cal. App. 127, 128, 232 P. 733; Hartman v. Smith, 140 Cal. 461, 467, 74 P. 7.

An appeal similar to the one now engaging our attention was considered by the court in the case of In re Ricks' Estate, 160 Cal. 450, 117 P. 532, and 160 Cal. 467, 117 P. 539. In these companion cases a contest was filed after probate with respect to a will and codicil. A nonsuit was granted with respect to the will and from the judgment contestant took an appeal in the first case. Thereafter trial was had with respect to the codicil and the jury returned a verdict in favor of contestant, and from the resulting judgment and order the proponent appealed in the second case.

In the first case the argument was advanced that since the contest was to both the will and the codicil, no judgment could be entered on the nonsuit, until the entire litigation involving both the will and the codicil was finally adjudicated. The court rejected the contention, stating, 160 Cal. at pages 466, 467, 117 P. at page 539: "The last point made by appellant is that the judgment appealed from entered upon the motion granting the nonsuit as to the contest of the will, should be reversed because it was prematurely entered. His position is that as both the validity of the will and of the codicil were contested in a single petition, upon which the parties went to trial, that while the court might grant a nonsuit as to the contest of the will and deny it as to the contest of the codicil, or vice versa, still in law no judgment could be entered upon the order granting the nonsuit as to either until the entire contest, both as to the will and codicil, was finally determined. We do not think there is any merit in this point. Respondent had a right to move for a nonsuit, both as to the will and codicil, or as to either, at the close of contestant's case, and if in the opinion of the court the evidence was insufficient to warrant submitting the question of the validity of either instrument to the jury it was the duty of the court to grant a nonsuit accordingly. And, upon such nonsuit being granted, even if it applied to only one branch of the contest, the party in whose favor it is ordered is entitled to a judgment thereon. Code Civ.Proc., § 581." (Emphasis added.)

In the case at bar, we are persuaded that when the court made its ruling as to the will pursuant to the provisions of Section 630 of the Code of Civil Procedure, respondents were entitled to a judgment thereon though it applied to only one branch of the contest, and that an appeal therefrom is authorized by law.

We find nothing in the cases relied upon by respondents which militates against the conclusions we have arrived at herein. The cited cases of Mather v. Mather, 5 Cal.2d 617, 55 P.2d 1174, and Gombos v. Ashe, 158 Cal.App.2d 517, 322 P.2d 933, deal with appeals from a demurrer sustained without leave to amend as to one of several causes of action and where judgment was entered only as to such cause of action. It was held that such a judgment of dismissal did not constitute a final judgment or order within the meaning of Code of Civil Procedure, Section 963, for purposes of appeal thereunder. We are satisfied that such an appeal made under Code of Civil Procedure, Section 963, subd. 1 where a "final judgment" is required is not analogous to the question presented in the case at bar which has to do with an appeal under Probate Code, Section 1240. Equally distinguishable is the case of Murphy v. Fong Shuck, 151 Cal.App.2d 64, 311 P.2d 80, involving violations of collective bargaining agreements.

In re Hart's Estate, 119 Cal.App.2d 310, 259 P.2d 703, 704, an appeal from the parts of an order settling and assessing costs of trial under Section 383 of the Probate Code and cited by respondent confirms the views herein expressed by us, and states that the right to appeal under Probate

Code, Section 1240 "is determined by the legal effect of an order, not by its form".

The motion to dismiss the appeal herein is denied.

Cr. 6093.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

Aug. 14, 1958.

Hearing Denied Oct. 10, 1958.

Defendant was convicted of drunk driving and of failing to stop, identify himself and render assistance to victim of an automobile collision and from a judgment and order of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Edward R. Brand, J., the defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, on rehearing, Shinn, P. J., held that refusal of instruction on doctrine of imminent peril and on misdemeanor drunk driving was either not error or not prejudicial that conduct of the trial court did not result in a miscarriage of justice and that testimony as to a conversation had with the victim and the victim's physician was properly excluded.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Opinion, 327 P.2d 187, vacated.

1. Automobiles ⚡332

To establish a violation of the statute, it must be shown that accused drove a vehicle on a public highway when under the influence of intoxicating liquor, that in so driving he committed an act forbidden by law and neglected a duty imposed by law, and that such act or neglect was proximate cause of bodily injury to some person. West's Ann.Veh.Code, § 501.

2. Automobiles ⚡357

In prosecution for felony drunk driving, refusing an instruction on doctrine of imminent peril was not error where the doctrine was not applicable to the conduct of defendant prior to collision with victim's stopped automobile in that defendant was driving at excessive speed and driving with brakes in defective condition. West's Ann.Veh.Code, §§ 501, 510, 670.

3. Criminal Law ⚡1173(2)

In prosecution for drunk driving, refusal to give an instruction on imminent peril was not prejudicial error under the circumstances. West's Ann.Veh.Code, §§ 501, 510, 670.

4. Criminal Law ⚡1173(2)

In prosecution for felony drunk driving, failure to give defendant's requested instruction relating to misdemeanor drunk driving a lesser and included offense was not prejudicial in view that a verdict of violation of felony drunk driving would have been the same had the instruction been given. West's Ann.Veh.Code, §§ 501, 502.

5. Criminal Law ⚡823(6)

In prosecution of motorist for failure to stop, identify himself and render assistance to collision victim, instruction that a motorist who was rendered unconscious by an accident may not be held criminally liable for failure to perform the statutory duty while he is thus incapacitated was not prejudicial as a misdirection to the jury in view of other instructions given on the issue of criminal intent. West's Ann.Veh.Code, § 480.

6. Criminal Law ⚡656(2)

A trial judge has a duty to render assistance during production of evidence in a jury trial where assistance is needed and it is proper to intervene in order to aid in the elicitation of clear and comprehensive testimony but such must be done in a manner that gives no indication of the court's inclination for or against either party.

7. Criminal Law §1166½(12)

Act of the trial court in a criminal case in allegedly interrupting the orderly and efficient interrogation of the people's witnesses by the prosecutor and taking over the latter's duties repeatedly did not result in a miscarriage of justice and hence was not reversible error, where under the evidence and proper inferences the question of defendant's guilt was not a close one. West's Ann.Veh.Code, §§ 482(a), 501.

8. Criminal Law §1038(3)

Defendant could not complain of refusal of the trial court to give an instruction where it is not requested.

9. Witnesses §379(2)

In prosecution for felony drunk driving and failure to render assistance after an accident, excluding testimony of a conversation defendant had with victim and victim's physician at hospital about a week after accident to impeach testimony of victim and physician that victim had been seriously hurt was not error, since fact that victim was feeling better a week after accident would not authorize an inference that he had suffered no injury or that he had not appeared to be hurt.

10. Criminal Law §595(4)

Refusing defendant a continuance in order to produce an absent witness who was not under subpoena was not an abuse of discretion where defendant did not disclose the name of the witness and made no showing that his testimony would be material.

11. Criminal Law §594(1)

If a witness is directed that he need not appear until a certain time and the court is ready to receive his testimony before that time, it is discretionary to deny a continuance requested for the purpose of producing the witness.

SHINN, Presiding Justice.

In a jury trial, Gordon Travis Campbell was convicted of violating Vehicle Code, section 501 (Count I) and Vehicle Code, section 480 (Count II). He appeals from an order granting him probation and the denial of his motion for new trial.

At 12:45 a. m. on February 7, 1957, Mario Salcedo was driving his Plymouth automobile south on San Vicente Boulevard in Beverly Hills. The posted speed for automobiles traveling south on San Vicente at that point was 25 miles per hour. Salcedo stopped for a red light at the intersection of San Vicente and Wilshire Boulevard. While he was waiting for the signal to change, a Lincoln automobile, also going south on San Vicente, struck the rear end of the Plymouth, damaging both vehicles and causing severe injuries to Salcedo, who sustained a fractured skull. The Lincoln was registered to "Gordon T. or Elizabeth Campbell." Salcedo was taken to the hospital where he remained for 10 days. At the time of trial, he was still under a doctor's care.

One Porche, who was waiting for the signal in the lane to the right of Salcedo, testified that defendant got out of the Lincoln immediately after the collision, approached to within a few feet of Salcedo, who was lying on the front seat of the Plymouth, and then started to walk west on Wilshire Boulevard without giving his name or exhibiting his driver's license. Porche's passenger, a Mrs. Le Sassier, testified that defendant asked her what had happened and that she replied: "Can't you see what happened? Didn't you just hit this man?"; without saying anything further, defendant walked away.

vard in a police car to look for defendant. They found Campbell standing on the northwest corner of Wilshire and La Cienega, which was three blocks away. Fairlee asked defendant for some identification and defendant replied that he did not have to give any identification since he had not done anything. Upon being asked by the officer why he had left the scene of the accident, Campbell answered that he didn't know anything about any accident. When asked to accompany the officer, defendant refused to go. Fairlee forcibly placed Campbell in the car and returned to the scene where they met another officer, Marvin Sullivan.

Upon being questioned further by the officers at the scene, Campbell admitted having had two drinks of scotch at the Red Snapper Restaurant. He told the officers that he was in the Lincoln when the collision occurred, but he was not driving. The driver was a man he had met at the Red Snapper; he did not know the man's name. When the officers asked him whether he had been injured, defendant replied that he had not been hurt; he had no visible injuries. Officer Fairlee stated that defendant's breath smelled of alcohol, his eyes were watery and his face had a bloated appearance. The officers gave him a sobriety test. In their opinion, Campbell was under the influence of intoxicating liquor.

Sullivan testified that he observed 44 feet of skid marks on the street; the marks terminated at the point of impact. In his opinion, the Lincoln had been traveling in excess of 40 miles per hour at the time of the collision; he based his opinion upon the skid marks, the damage to both vehicles and the distance Salcedo's car had been pushed forward by the collision.

Defendant, testifying in his own behalf, denied having been intoxicated. He spent the earlier part of the evening of February 6 with a Miss McNally and a Mrs. Auchincloss. Around 8 p. m. he went to the Red Snapper Restaurant on La Cienega, where he had dinner with the proprietor, a Mr.

Herd, who was a friend. He ordered one drink of scotch at the bar and took it to the dinner table. Defendant sat talking with Herd until 11 or 11:15 when Herd left. Campbell remained for another 45 minutes. He had nothing further to drink before leaving the restaurant. Mr. Herd and Daniel De Blasio, a bartender employed at the Red Snapper, testified that Campbell had only the one drink at the restaurant.

Defendant testified further that after leaving the Red Snapper he drove "very normally, down San Vicente towards Wilshire." Just north of the intersection, Salcedo's car veered suddenly into his lane of traffic from the parking lane to his right. Campbell applied his brakes but they did not hold; he applied the emergency brake, but was unable to stop. He swerved to the right but was unable to avoid striking Salcedo's car. Campbell stated that his chin hit the steering wheel and he could not recall any of the events that happened subsequently or any of the statements that were made by the other witnesses or that were attributed to him. His first recollection was of being in jail, feeling cold, and asking for some blankets. Two of his teeth were broken off and he received a bruise on the right side of his jaw that was visibly red for several days afterward.

On cross-examination, defendant admitted that he probably walked up Wilshire from "instinct" to get help at a service station located on the northwest corner of La Cienega and Wilshire where he often bought gasoline. He had not been aware that there was an all night restaurant located on the south side of Wilshire at its intersection with San Vicente and an all night service station on the northeast corner of Wilshire and La Cienega.

William Welsh, a private investigator called by the defense, testified that he examined the area nine days after the collision and did not see any skidmarks. Miss McNally and Mrs. Auchincloss appeared for the defense and corroborated Campbell's statement that he had not had any drinks while in their company.

Dr. R. W. Hayward, a dentist called by defendant, stated that he examined Campbell's teeth on March 26 and found that two teeth on the right side which held his denture had been broken off. In his opinion, it would have taken considerable force to break off the teeth.

Ernest Bence, a witness for defendant, testified that he operated a service station in Brentwood. Two days before the collision, defendant drove into the station in the Lincoln using the emergency brake. Bence testified that he put in some brake fluid and told Campbell to have the master cylinder fixed "as soon as possible." Some time after the accident, defendant took his car to a repair shop operated by one Safady. A week or ten days after the car was brought in Safady tested it and found that the brakes did not hold. He took the car to a brake specialist, who opened the master cylinder and told him that the cylinder was leaking. In Safady's opinion, the leak was due to wear and tear; he had not examined the brakes and his opinion was based upon his previous experience in the repair business.

In urging a reversal of the judgment and order, defendant argues numerous assignments of error. It is not contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdicts.

With respect to Count I of the information which charged Campbell with felony drunk driving, defendant requested and the court refused to give an instruction on the doctrine of imminent peril and an instruction on misdemeanor drunk driving.

The first mentioned instruction was a proper statement of the rule that one who, without negligence on his part, is suddenly confronted with unexpected and imminent danger, is expected to exercise only the care that an ordinarily prudent person would exercise if confronted with the same unexpected danger under the same circumstances.

The evidence which defendant contends rendered the instruction applicable was the following: It appears that the southbound section of San Vicente at the location in question is a one-way street with four lanes. Campbell testified that he was traveling in lane four, he saw a car in lane three and "Well, I thought the car veered slightly to the left. I thought he was in the third lane. He changed from the third—I say he—as we approached here, he seemed to go from Lane 3 to Lane 4," and he testified, as previously stated, that when his brakes failed he swerved to the right.

[1] In order to establish a violation of Vehicle Code Section 501, it must be shown that the accused drove a vehicle on a public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, that, in so driving, he committed an act forbidden by law or neglected a duty imposed by law, and that said act or neglect was a proximate cause of bodily injury to some person.

[2] The possible violations of law that were to be considered were driving at a speed in excess of 25 miles per hour which, prima facie, would have been in violation of Section 510 of the Vehicle Code, driving with defective brakes in violation of Section 670 of the Vehicle Code, or driving without the use of ordinary care or skill, in violation of the duty imposed by Section 1714 of the Civil Code.

Section 670 of the Vehicle Code requires that automobiles when driven upon a highway must be equipped with brakes "adequate to control the movement of and to stop and hold such vehicle, * * *." Defendant knew his brakes were defective. Two days before the accident he was informed that the fluid had leaked out of the braking system and that he had no brakes except the emergency brake. He was told to have the condition repaired as soon as possible. He paid no attention to that admonition. He did not know, and he made no effort to find out, whether the brakes would continue to operate for hours or days or weeks. So far as he knew the leak might have been such as would have depleted a supply of brake fluid at any moment. He gave no thought to the danger that was involved and apparently intended to continue driving until his brakes failed again. This is precisely what happened.

The rule of sudden peril has application only to conduct which follows the unexpected appearance of danger. It was not applicable to the conduct of defendant prior to that time, namely, with respect to his speed or to his driving with his brakes in a defective condition.

Defendant had a right to have the jury instructed in accordance with his own theory of the case, which encompassed also instructions that were pertinent to an expression of his contentions with respect to the legal theories of the prosecution. It is necessary to examine those theories in the light of the evidence.

With respect to a claimed violation of law the contention of the People was that defendant was driving at an excessive speed, and they relied upon evidence of skidmarks of 44 feet which ended at the point of the accident, and upon expert testimony, based upon the skidmarks and the force of the collision, that his car was traveling at 40 miles per hour when the brakes were applied. The People did not contend that defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to make every effort to stop, but, upon the contrary, their evidence tended to prove that he did make a real effort, and that his speed was such that he could not stop. There was nothing in the People's evidence or their theory of the case that would have rendered appropriate the instruction on imminent peril. Neither was the instruction applicable to the defendant's theory of the case, which was that he made every effort to stop and to turn aside, and that so far as his conduct was concerned, the failure of his brakes was the sole cause of his failure to stop. His evidence furnished no reason for application of the rule of imminent peril. We can conceive of no state of facts reasonably deducible from the evidence which would be inconsistent with the theory of the People and also the theory of the defendant. In other words, there was no evidence whatever that would have warranted the jury in finding that defendant did not use ordinary care to come to a stop after he observed the movement of the Salcedo car.

Furthermore, defendant would not have been entitled to the instruction unless the jury could with reason have found that at the time of the appearance of the imminent danger he was driving in the exercise of ordinary care. Where the evidence would have warranted either of two conclusions, namely, that defendant had good brakes and skidded his car 44 feet, or that he had no effective brakes and was unable to stop, the jury could not have reached the absurd conclusion that defendant had good brakes, was driving at a reasonable and prudent speed but did not use ordinary care to stop his car after he saw the movement of the Salcedo car.

If we assume, for the moment, that it was a question of fact whether defendant was guilty of negligence in driving with defective brakes, it is, in our opinion, utterly improbable that the jury would have reached the conclusion that his conduct was that of a reasonably prudent driver. Unless the jury determined that his driving the car with his brakes in the defective condition that was known to him was the conduct of a reasonably prudent man, it would have been obliged to conclude that he was guilty of unexcused violation of Section 670. Alarid v. Vanier, 50 Cal.2d 617, 327 P.2d 897. Whether he had good brakes and was driving so fast he could not stop, or was driving with defective brakes, the jury could not, in our opinion, have found that he was free from negligence at the time he observed the movement of the Salcedo car. Unless he was then free from negligence his negligence was one of the causes which created the peril and the instruction was inapplicable.

[3] Finally, the claim of error in failing to give the instruction on imminent peril would be without validity unless there is reason to believe that the jury found that defendant was negligent in his conduct after he discovered the movement of the Salcedo car and might reasonably have reached a different conclusion if the requested instruction had been given. Such a contention would be entirely untenable and for this reason, if for no other, we would have to hold that defendant suffered no harm in the refusal of the instruction.

[4] The next contention is that the court committed error in failing to give defendant's requested instruction which related to misdemeanor drunk driving, a lesser and necessarily included offense (Vehicle Code, § 502). Under this instruction defendant would have been entitled to an acquittal of violation of Section 501 if the jury determined that although he may have been under the influence of liquor he was not guilty of violation of law which was a proximate cause of the accident.

We do not doubt that despite the evidence respecting the skid marks and the force of the collision the jury could have found that defendant was not driving at an unlawful rate of speed. In that view of the evidence, and absent evidence of any other violation of law, it would have been proper to give the instruction. But if the jury had believed that defendant's speed was not excessive there would have remained the question whether his conduct in driving with defective brakes was that of a reasonably prudent man. We have already expressed the opinion that the jury could not reasonably have reached that conclusion. Being convinced that the verdict of violation of Section 501 would have been the same had the instruction been given, we hold that the failure to give it furnishes no ground for reversal of the judgment as to Count I of the information.

[5] With respect to Count II, which charged him with failing to stop, identify himself and render assistance to Salcedo, defendant requested the following instruction: "Before you can find the defendant guilty as charged, his failure to perform one or more of the duties imposed upon him must have been wilful; and if you believe that he himself was so injured by the collision as not to be in possession of his faculties and his failure was due to that condition, then he should not be convicted." The proposed instruction was refused. At the People's request, the court instructed the jury as follows: "A vehicle driver who is rendered unconscious by an accident may not be held criminally liable for a failure to perform any duty defined in the foregoing law [Vehicle Code, section 480] while he is thus incapacitated." Defendant contends that the instruction given by the court was a misleading and inadequate statement of the law applicable to his defense that he was not guilty of a conscious failure to perform the duties imposed by the statute. He also contends that the court committed error in refusing to give the instruction proposed by him.

We cannot agree that the jury was misdirected to Campbell's prejudice by the instruction given at the People's request. That instruction, when considered in isolation, is properly to be criticized. If, defendant argues, the instruction means what it says, and no more, the jury might well have been led to believe that Campbell was to be excused only if he had been rendered completely unconscious by the collision, and oblivious to his surroundings and to what had occurred. But in the light of other instructions given on the issue of criminal intent, we do not think the jury could have been so misled. The jurors were told that the duties imposed by the code apply to persons "knowingly" involved in an accident and that the "wilful" failure of a driver to perform any of those duties is a criminal offense; that the statute is applicable to a driver who "knows" that he has been involved in an accident and that his failure to stop, identify himself and render assistance must be "wilful" and in another instruction, given at Campbell's request, that knowledge of the infliction of injury upon another person is an essential element of the offense. A fourth instruction stated that Campbell's conduct was not culpable unless it was knowing and wilful.

The instructions made it clear that inability to know what was going on or what had occurred would be a good defense, even though defendant's mental condition fell short of complete oblivion. In fact, the instructions that were given stated the law in much better form than it was stated in the refused instruction, which would have invited the jury to consider whether defendant was "in possession of his faculties." The instruction could well have been refused upon the ground of ambiguity. We do not doubt that the jurors understood they were to acquit Campbell on the second count if they believed his testimony respecting his mental incapacity.

Defendant's brief specifies many instances of alleged misconduct on the part of the court. With minor exceptions they relate to interruption of the proceedings by the trial judge by propounding questions to witnesses for the People during the course of their examination by the deputy district attorney. It would unduly prolong this opinion to give the full text of the questioning. A brief summary will suffice. In 15 or more instances, the court interrupted the examination of the People's witnesses by the deputy district attorney by questions which were calculated to and did elicit testimony seriously adverse to the defendant. The court asked a witness whether defendant said anything to any one immediately after the accident, whether he gave his name and address or showed his operator's license to any one, whether the officers' car was painted black and white, whether a witness who was testifying to a conversation with the defendant had made any observation with respect to defendant's sobriety, whether he smelled defendant's breath and what he observed, whether he had questioned the defendant respecting his drinking. When another witness was testifying to the condition of the surface of the highway, the court interrupted to ask whether the witness had an opinion as to defendant's sobriety. In other instances, the court cross-examined witnesses for the defendant in a manner that was abrupt and critical.

The interrogation of the witnesses by the deputy district attorney on direct and cross-examination was orderly and efficient. The questions propounded by the court were only those which would naturally have been asked by the prosecutor. Nothing had been overlooked or was likely to be overlooked by the prosecutor in the elicitation of all relevant testimony. There was no hesitation upon the part of any of the witnesses to testify freely and no uncertainty whatever in their testimony. There was no occasion whatever for the court to take over the duties of the deputy district attorney in the questioning of the witnesses, and yet this is what the court did persistently.

[6] There can be no doubt as to the duty of a judge to render assistance during the course of production of evidence in a jury trial, where assistance is needed. A witness may be evasive and his answers incomplete or uncertain, important matters may be overlooked by counsel, and in these and similar instances, it is entirely proper for the court to intervene in order to aid in the elicitation of clear and comprehensive testimony. This, of course, must be done in a manner that gives no indication of the court's inclination for or against either party. But for the court in a criminal case to interrupt the orderly and efficient interrogation of the People's witnesses by the prosecutor and to take over the latter's duties repeatedly, as was done in the present case, can scarcely fail to have some influence upon the minds of the jurors adverse to the defendant.

Judges have been admonished time and time again of their duty to maintain a strictly judicial attitude and to refrain from comment or other conduct which borders upon advocacy. We deem it appropriate to quote in part the remarks of the Supreme Court in People v. Mahoney, 201 Cal. 618, 626-627, 258 P. 607, 610: "Jurors rely with great confidence on the fairness of judges, and upon the correctness of their views expressed during trials. For this reason, and too strong emphasis cannot be laid on the admonition, a judge should be careful not to throw the weight of his judicial position into a case, either for or against a defendant. It is unnecessary to cite the cases bearing on this subject. It is a fundamental principle underlying our jurisprudence." When the trial judge officiously and unnecessarily usurps the duties of the prosecutor by taking over the questioning of witnesses and in so doing creates the impression that he is allying himself with the prosecution, harm to the defendant is inevitable. We do not see how any judge could fail to recognize that fact. People v. Long, 63 Cal.App.2d 679, 685, 147 P.2d 659.

Our question is not whether the court's conduct was harmful to the defense; we are certain that it was. The difficult question in such situations is whether the invasion of the defendant's rights was of so serious a nature as to have resulted in a conviction which otherwise, in all probability, would not have occurred. If we were in doubt here as to the correct answer we would resolve the doubt in favor of the accused.

[7] Our conclusion is that the conduct of the court did not result in a miscarriage of justice. With respect to an alleged violation of section 501 of the Vehicle Code, the evidence, both direct and circumstantial, firmly established the fact that defendant was intoxicated, if the witnesses for the People were to be believed. With respect to his having been operating his car in violation of law, we have already expressed the view that the jury could not reasonably have failed to find that in driving it with brakes which he knew to be defective defendant was not acting with reasonable prudence and care. There was also persuasive evidence that he was driving at a speed which endangered the safety of persons and property in violation of section 510 of the Vehicle Code. There was, of course, no doubt that Mr. Salcedo was seriously injured as a proximate result of defendant's conduct. There was also convincing evidence of a violation of section 482(a) of the Vehicle Code consisting of the failure of defendant to give his name, address, registration number of his vehicle and name of the owner to Mr. Salcedo, and the failure to render assistance to him. The only excuse offered by defendant for failure to identify himself and for leaving his car in the street while he departed the scene was that he was rendered unconscious in the sense that he did not know what had happened or understand what he was doing following the accident. His testimony to that effect had but slight, if any, support in the nature of his injuries or in his conduct. There was no convincing evidence that he received a concussion or a blow which was severe enough to seriously impair his mental faculties or which required medical care. He testified that he probably left the scene of the accident to find a telephone for the purpose of making a report of it. There was uncontradicted evidence that his conversation following the accident was lucid and his physical actions normal except for the symptoms of intoxication. There was ample evidence that the injuries he received did not render him unable to understand what had happened and what he was doing thereafter. We are of the opinion that under the evidence and the proper inferences the question of defendant's guilt under either count was not a close one, and we are not convinced that if the interruptions and interrogation of witnesses by the court had not occurred, the verdict would have been different as to either count.

[8] Defendant also contends that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury that he need only raise a reasonable doubt that he was unconscious in order to be entitled to an acquittal. A sufficient answer to this contention is that defendant did not request such an instruction. In the absence of such a request the general instructions on reasonable doubt were sufficient.

[9] The court did not commit error in excluding testimony which defendant proposed to give respecting a conversation he had with Salcedo and Salcedo's physician at the hospital about a week after the accident. Counsel offered to prove that Dr. Laurion told defendant that his patient had suffered a slight concussion, but was about cured, and that Salcedo said he was feeling "wonderful." Defendant's argument is that evidence of the conversation was admissible to impeach the testimony of Salcedo and Dr. Laurion that the former had been seriously hurt and also to prove that Salcedo had suffered no apparent injuries, hence Campbell was not under a duty to assist him. The argument is without merit. Salcedo's condition following the collision was described by Porche and the two police officers and it cannot be doubted that he was injured and in considerable pain. The fact, if it be a fact, that Salcedo was feeling better a week after the accident would not lead to an inference that he had suffered no injury or that he had not appeared to be hurt.

[10] The court likewise did not commit error in refusing defendant a continuance in order to produce an absent witness who was not under subpoena. Counsel informed the court that he had miscalculated the time necessary to present his case, that he wished to call a certain doctor to the stand, but that he had told the doctor to be in court at 2 p. m. It was then late morning. The court refused a continuance and the defense rested.

[11] If a witness is directed that he need not appear until a certain time and the court is ready to receive his testimony before that time, it is within the court's discretion to deny a continuance requested for the purpose of producing the witness. People v. Morhar, 78 Cal.App. 380, 386, 248 P. 975. Counsel did not disclose the name of the witness and made no showing that the doctor's testimony would be material. Had counsel deemed the testimony of the witness to be vital to the defense, he could have made a motion to reopen his case at 2 p. m., even though the cause was then being argued to the jury. People v. Morgan, 140 Cal.App.2d 796, 804, 296 P.2d 75. The court did not abuse its discretion in denying a postponement of the trial. People v. Franklin, 41 Cal.App.2d 669, 670, 107 P.2d 500; People v. Sherman, 139 Cal. App.2d 429, 431-432, 293 P.2d 809.

From a consideration of the entire evidence, we are convinced that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Defendants were convicted of possession of heroin in violation of West's Ann. Health & Safety Code, § 11500. The Superior Court of Tulare County, Robert K. Meyers, J., rendered judgments of conviction and entered order denying motions for new trial, and defendants appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Mussell, J., held that testimony of officer that in response to questioning by another officer, one of the defendants admitted that she had previously been arrested for possession of narcotics was admissible to show guilty knowledge of narcotic character of article possessed and that the evidence was sufficient to support conviction of both defendants.

Judgments and order affirmed.

John H. Marshall, Los Angeles, for appellants.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., and Joe J. Yasaki, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

MUSSELL, Justice.

Appellants were charged with violating section 11500 of the Health and Safety Code, a felony, in that on or about November 5, 1957, in Tulare county, they unlawfully had in their possession a quantity of heroin. They entered pleas of not guilty and trial was had before a jury which found them guilty as charged in the information. Motions for new trial and applications for probation were denied. Appellant Toms was sentenced to the State's prison at Vacaville and appellant Moore was sentenced to the State's prison at Corona. This appeal is from the judgments of conviction and from the order denying motions for new trial.

At about 11:00 a. m. on November 5, 1957, appellants were traveling south on highway 99 when they were stopped by a highway patrol officer for speeding. Appellant Toms was driving and was given a citation. At about 1:00 p. m. on the same day another highway patrolman (Morton E. Camp), while patrolling the highway in Tulare county, copied an all-points radio broadcast concerning the Oldsmobile in which appellants were riding. He observed the Oldsmobile and pulled out after it. The Oldsmobile increased its speed to 80 miles per hour and passed several other cars. The officer finally overtook it and ordered the driver to pull over. The officer then pulled up about 10 feet behind the Oldsmobile after it came to a stop. After satisfying himself that there was nothing in the road or the area of the car and that nothing had been thrown from it, he walked over to the Oldsmobile. Appellant Moore was driving it and appellant Toms was seated in the right front seat. Officer Camp asked appellant Moore for her driver's license and then returned to his patrol car. Appellant Moore got out of the Oldsmobile and started walking toward the officer's car and he told her to go back to the Oldsmobile. Shortly thereafter, when officer Camp was in his car, appellant Moore got out of the Oldsmobile, carrying a brown paper bag. She walked to the front of the Oldsmobile, crossed in front of it and walked for some distance to the right, away from the highway and front of the car. Appellant Toms remained seated on the passenger side with his arms over the car door, watching appellant Moore. Officer Camp then proceeded toward appellant Moore. He walked between the two vehicles and along the right of the passenger side of the Oldsmobile. At this time he observed that the area around the Oldsmobile was clear of all "foreign matter." As the officer walked beyond the Oldsmobile towards appellant Moore he had his back to appellant Toms. After retrieving the paper sack which appellant Moore had been carrying, the officer turned back toward the Oldsmobile and saw a crumpled aluminum foil object on the ground, even with the passenger door and three feet from the car. The object was bright and shiny and was in the clear dirt area near the car door. The object was about three inches long and one inch in diameter and was tightly compressed. Appellant Toms was still seated on the passenger side of the Oldsmobile but the car door was partially open. The officer picked up the object and unwrapped the aluminum foil. Inside was a white, lined paper containing a light grey powder substance, which was later analyzed and found to be 139 grains of heroin, of the value of approximately $700.00.

Other officers were summoned to the scene and a search was made of the Oldsmobile. The officers found between the front and rear seats a clear plastic bag containing three plastic spoons, an eye dropper, and a glass case containing two hypodermic needles. A box of Kleenex containing a white powder, which later was shown to be milk sugar, was found in the trunk, with a roll of aluminum foil, women's and men's clothing, phonograph records, and other items.

Appellants first contend that it was prejudicial error to permit a prosecuting witness to testify as to appellant Moore's prior conviction. We are not in accord with this claim. The record shows that during the trial highway patrolman Elvin E. Rogers testified on direct examination by the district attorney that he was present at and overheard part of a conversation between patrol officer Pieschke and appellant Moore. Officer Rogers testified:

"A. Well, actually I said nothing to either one of the defendants. Officer Pieschke asked Miss Moore, he says, 'Have you been the route before?' And she stated that she didn't know what he was talking about. And then he asked her, he says, 'Have you ever been arrested for narcotics before?' She stated that she had been arrested at one time for possession."

Following this testimony appellant made a motion for a mistrial. This motion was denied and the jury was instructed as follows:

"Members of the jury, the Court wishes to instruct you and to admonish you that the testimony heretofore had of this officer as to the oral statement made to him by the defendant Moore as to some previous contact with narcotics is admissible only for the purpose of showing, tending to show, knowledge on her part of the nature of narcotics in connection with the possession. You will not consider any other matter. It has no bearing other than that in this case."

[1,2] The rule is well settled that except when it shows merely criminal disposition, evidence that is relevant is not excluded because it reveals the commission of an offense other than that charged. As is said in People v. Peete, 28 Cal.2d 306, 315, 169 P.2d 924, 929:

"The general tests of the admissibility of evidence in a criminal case are: * * * does it tend logically, naturally and by reasonable inference to establish any fact material for the people, or to overcome any material matter sought to be proved by the defense? If it does, then it is admissible, whether it embraces the commission of another crime or does not, whether the other crime be similar in kind or not, whether it be part of a single design or not."

[3-5] In People v. Gory, 28 Cal.2d 450, 455, 170 P.2d 433, 436, it was held that "knowledge of the presence of the object as embraced within the concept of 'physical control with the intent to exercise such control'" is the essence of the possession announced by the narcotic statute. And in People v. Candiottio, 128 Cal.App.2d 347, 353, 275 P.2d 500, it was stated that knowledge of the narcotic character of the article possessed is a necessary ingredient of the offense of possessing narcotics. In the instant case the presence or absence of such knowledge was a material fact and the testimony was properly admitted to show guilty knowledge on the part of appellant

Moore. People v. Torres, 98 Cal.App.2d 189, 191, 192, 219 P.2d 140; People v. Howard, 150 Cal.App.2d 428, 430, 310 P.2d 120.

[6-9] Appellants' contention that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict of the jury is likewise without merit. It is the function of the jury in the first instance, and of the trial court after verdict, to determine what facts are established by the evidence, and before the verdict of the jury, which has been approved by the trial court, can be set aside on appeal upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, it must be made clearly to appear that upon no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached in the court below. People v. Newland, 15 Cal.2d 678, 681, 104 P.2d 778. Constructive possession of a narcotic constitutes a violation of section 11500 of the Health and Safety Code. People v. White, 50 Cal.2d 428, 325 P.2d 985. Such possession may be individual, through an agent, or joint with another. People v. Bigelow, 104 Cal.App.2d 380, 389, 231 P.2d 881. Exclusive possession need not be shown where several persons are charged with possession of the same contraband and the question of whether the appellants had joint control of the narcotics involved was properly left for the determination of the jury. People v. Romero, 161 Cal.App.2d 404, 327 P.2d 205. Under the circumstances shown by the record herein the jury could reasonably infer that appellant Toms threw or placed the heroin on the ground where the officer found it, and that appellant Moore was in joint possession thereof may also be inferred from her conduct in diverting the officer's attention while appellant Toms threw the heroin on the ground, as well as by her other acts and conduct shown by the evidence. Under the rules announced herein and the record before us, we cannot hold that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict.

1. Eminent Domain ⇨285

Where subdividers presented to city plans which included drainage system in immediate vicinity of landowners' property, and city approved plans, planned improvements were constructed and approved and accepted by city and became part of city's system of public works, and system of drains was so constructed that water was conducted into draw on landowners' property, causing erosion, subdividers were not liable for injury to property.

2. Waters and Water Courses ⇨38

Question of whether depression is watercourse is question of law and not a question of fact.

3. Waters and Water Courses ⇨38

A "watercourse" is a running stream of water, and there must be a stream usually flowing in a particular direction in a definite channel, having bed, sides, or banks, and usually discharging itself into some other stream or body of water.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Watercourse".

4. Waters and Water Courses ⇨38

In action by landowners against city to recover damages to property resulting from drainage system, which had been accepted by city as part of city's system of public works, and which discharged into draw on landowners' property, evidence was sufficient to support finding that draw on landowners' property was not a watercourse.

5. Eminent Domain ⇨271

Where subdividers presented to city plans which included drainage system in immediate vicinity of landowners' property, and city approved plans, planned improvements were constructed and approved and accepted by city and became part of city's system of public works, and system of drains was so constructed that water was conducted into draw on landowners' property, causing erosion, landowners had cause of action against city for damages.

6. Eminent Domain ⇨309

Where subdividers presented to city plans which included drainage system in immediate vicinity of landowners' property, and city approved plans, planned improvements were constructed and approved and accepted by city and became part of city's system of public works, and system of drains was so constructed that water was conducted into draw on landowners' property, causing erosion, city, obligated to pay damages, was not entitled to easement on theory that there had been a "taking" of land, as a cause of action existed in property owners for damages independent of a "taking." West's Ann.Const. art. 1, § 14.

7. Eminent Domain ⇨308

Where, in action by landowners against city for injury to land caused by construction of drainage system, accepted by city as part of system of public works, resulting in water being conducted into draw on landowners' property, causing erosion, city did not seek easement by its pleadings, awarding of damages to landowners without adjudging easement in favor of city was not improper.

8. Eminent Domain $\S$ 303

In action by landowners against city for injury to land caused by construction of drainage system, accepted by city as part of system of public works, resulting in water being conducted into draw on landowners' property, causing erosion, measure of damages was difference in reasonable market value of property without injury and reasonable market value of property in damaged condition.

9. Evidence $\S$ 18

It is common knowledge that land in California, and particularly Southern California, has had heavy appreciation in market value price and value subsequent to 1950.

10. Eminent Domain $\S$ 305

In action by landowners against city for injury to land caused by construction of drainage system, accepted by city as part of system of public works, resulting in water being conducted into draw on landowners' property, causing erosion, trial court was justified in making award of $20,000.

11. Eminent Domain $\S$ 298, 302

Where drainage system accepted by city as part of system of public works was constructed in immediate vicinity of landowners' property, allowing water to flow into draw and to cause erosion, measure of damages was not cost of installation of pipe to carry water through landowners' property, but in action brought by landowners against city, testimony as to cost of installing drainage pipe through land was admissible as evidence of decrease in market value.

McInnis, Focht & Fitzgerald, San Diego, for respondents.

From a judgment awarding $20,000 damages, defendant city of San Diego appeals.

Since 1922 plaintiffs have been the owners of certain land in the Point Loma area of the city of San Diego. Their land holdings in this area were increased in 1945 to a total holding of approximately 13 acres. For longer than the history in the record recites there was a draw or swale which crosses diagonally over the property. From 1922 plaintiffs' evidence indicates there was no running water in the draw except in 1927 and 1935, when there was a heavy rainfall. During these two rainfalls there was a small amount of water which ran through the property and which water caused no damage. One of the plaintiffs testified that even on these two occasions it took three or four days of heavy rain to cause the small run-off then in the draw.

About 1950, defendant subdividers presented subdivision plans to defendant city of San Diego which included a system of drainage, storm drains and highways. These plans pertained to property in the immediate vicinity of plaintiffs' property. These plans being approved by the defendant city, the planned improvements were constructed, approved and accepted by the defendant city and became a part of the defendant city's system of public works. This system of drains was so constructed that the rain water collected therein was conducted through a culvert under Catalina Boulevard and into the draw or swale on plaintiffs' property. In addition, the waters in the immediate vicinity on Catalina Boulevard are directed along the draw by an opening in the berm. At the other end of the draw is a culvert through which the water may leave plaintiffs' property. Most of the installed drainage system received the original and natural drainage area or basin, but there was included within the installed drainage system lands which were not a part of the natural area or basin.

Shortly after the completion of the drainage system there was a flow of water in the draw after a rain. This flow started within a short time after a rain started. In 1927 and 1935 the flow through the draw was a few feet in width and a few inches in depth. After the drainage system was installed the flow was as much as 100 feet in width and several feet in depth. After the drainage system was installed and over a period of years it became apparent there was a serious erosion problem on plaintiffs' land, which was created by the water channelled onto the land by the drainage system. In places, the erosion has reached a depth of four or five feet. There is testimony that over the course of time the eroding at the upper end will reach a depth of 20 feet before it reaches the hydraulic grade.

[1] When plaintiffs rested their case motions for nonsuit were made by all defendants. The trial court granted the motions as to all defendants except defendant city. This ruling was correct. In Anderson v. Fay Improvement Co., 134 Cal.App.2d 738, 745, 286 P.2d 513, 518, it is said:

"The law is well settled that the contractors or subdividers could not be held liable for the damage in a direct or inverse condemnation suit. 'If the contractor follows the plans and specifications furnished by the public agency, and damage results to the adjacent property, the public agency and not the contractor is liable.'" Heimann v. City of Los Angeles, 30 Cal. 2d 746, 757, 185 P.2d 597, 603, quoting from Veterans' Welfare Board v. City of Oakland, 74 Cal.App.2d 818, 832, 169 P.2d 1000; see, also, *Marin Mun. W. Dist. v. Cal. 492, 62 P. 829, [80 Am.St.Rep.] 147; Engebretson v. Gay, 158 Cal. 27, 109 P. 879."

The defendant city complains of the judgment rendered against it on the grounds (1) the evidence does not support the judgment; (2) if there was a "taking" within the purview of Art. 1, Sec. 14, California Constitution it is entitled to an easement over plaintiffs' property; (3) the evidence does not support the award of $20,000 damages and an incorrect rule of damages was used.

[2] Defendant city relies upon the cases of Archer v. City of Los Angeles, 19 Cal.2d 19, 119 P.2d 1 and San Gabriel Valley Country Club v. Los Angeles County, 182 Cal. 392, 188 P. 554, 9 A.L.R. 1200 in support of its first contention. In each of these cases the court had before it a condition which is described in the opinion as a watercourse or natural watercourse. We therefore must determine whether the draw through the plaintiffs' land properly can be described as a watercourse or is of some other characteristic. The courts of the state have decided that whether a depression is a watercourse or not is a question of law and not a question of fact. Sanguinetti v. Pock, 136 Cal. 466, 470, 69 P. 98.

[3,4] In Los Angeles Cemetery Ass'n v. City of Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 461, 464, 37 P. 375, 376, the court said:

"A watercourse is defined to be 'a running stream of water; a natural stream, including rivers, creeks, runs, and rivulets.' Black's Law Dictionary, title 'Watercourse.' There must be a stream usually flowing in a particular direction, though it need not flow continually. It may sometimes be dry. It must flow in a definite channel, having a bed, sides, or banks, and usually discharge itself into some other stream or body of water. It must be something more than a mere surface drainage over the entire face of a tract of land, occasioned by unusual freshets or other extraordinary causes. It does not include the water flowing in the hollows or ravines in land, which is the mere surface water from rain or melting snow, and is discharged through them from a higher to a lower level, but which at other times are destitute of water. Such hollows or ravines are not, in legal contemplation, watercourses. Angell on Watercourses, pp 3-7; Shields v. Arndt, 4 N.J.Eq. 234; Hoyt v. City of Hudson, 27 Wis. 656; [9 Am.Rep. 473]; Luther v. Winnisimmet Co., 9 Cush. 171; Washburn on Easements, 209, 210."

The evidence does not bring the draw or swale on plaintiffs' property within this definition of a watercourse. The trial court's determination that in contemplation of law it was not a watercourse is adequately sustained by the evidence in this case.

As to defendant city's second contention, the rule of law and distinctions to be made are clearly set out in Archer v. City of Los Angeles, supra [19 Cal.2d 19, 119 P.2d 4], where it is said:

"In certain circumstances, however, the taking or damaging of private property for such a purpose is not prompted by so great a necessity as to be justified without proper compensation to the owner. Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393, 43 S.Ct. 158, 67 L.Ed. 322; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 166 U.S. 226, 17 S.Ct. 581, 41 L.Ed. 979; see cases cited in 10 Cal.Jur. 283, 284, 295. The liability of the state under article 1, section 14 of the California Constitution arises when the taking or damaging of private property is not so essential to the general welfare as to be sanctioned under the 'police power' (Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, supra; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, supra; 10 Cal.Jur., supra; see Mugler v. State of Kansas, 123 U.S. 623, 8 S.Ct. 274, 31 L.Ed. 205), and the injury is one that would give rise to a cause of action on the part of the owner independently of the constitutional provision. Lamb v. Reclamation Dist., 73 Cal. 125, 129-131, 14 P. 625, 2 Am. St.Rep. 775; San Gabriel Valley Country Club v. County of Los Angeles, 182 Cal. 392, 188 P. 554, 9 A.L.R. 1200; Jefferson County Drainage Dist. v. McFaddin, Tex.Civ.App., 291 S. W. 322. * * * If the property owner would have no cause of action were a private person to inflict the damage, he can have no claim for compensation from the state. Lamb v. Reclamation Dist., supra, 73 Cal. 129-131, 14 P. 625; San Gabriel Valley Country Club v. County of Los Angeles, supra; Jefferson County Drainage Dist. v. McFaddin, supra. In the present case, therefore, plaintiffs have no right to compensation under article 1, section 14, if the injury is one that a private party would have the right to inflict without incurring liability."

[5, 6] Plaintiffs under the facts of this case would have a cause of action against a private individual and thus, under the rule of law just cited, they would have a cause of action against defendant city. LeBrun v. Richards, 210 Cal. 308, 291 P. 825, 72 A.L.R. 336; Andrew Jergens Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 103 Cal.App.2d 232, 229 P.2d 475; Callens v. County of Orange, 129 Cal.App.2d 255, 276 P.2d 886. Nevertheless, defendant city claims that under article I, section 14, California Constitution, if they have to pay damages they should be given an easement because there is a "taking" of land. We do not think this contention has substance. Prior to 1879 our state constitution provided in article I, section 8, "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

However, in 1879 a portion of article I, section 8 was revised and after that date article I, section 14 provided: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made to * * * the owner * * *"

The case of Reardon v. City & County of San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 6 P. 317, decided in 1885, is the first appellate case to be decided after the adoption of article I, section 14, and apparently is the leading case on this subject. It has been cited and followed in many cases but has never been overruled. We therefore will apply the rule of the Reardon case to the facts of this one. It is to be noted that the Reardon case was not an eminent domain case but, as here, was an action to recover damages to property resulting from installations put in by a public body. In construing the provisions of this constitutional provision the court said, 66 Cal. at page 501, 6 P. at page 322:

"To what kind of damage does this word 'damaged' refer? We think it refers to something more than a direct or immediate damage to private property, such as its invasion or spoliation. There is no reason why this word should be construed in any other than its ordinary and popular sense. It embraces more than the taking. If it did not refer to more than the damage above mentioned, the word 'damaged' in the clause relied on would be superfluous. It seems to us that the direct invasions spoken of would come within the clause as it stood in the constitution of 1849. If the word 'damaged' only embraced physical invasions of property, the right secured by this word would add nothing to the guaranty as it formerly stood. In the case above cited from 99 U.S., the court said, referring to a clause in the constitution of Illinois similar to that in the constitution of this state in force since 1879, that 'this is an extension of the common provision for the protection of private property.'"

Also, 66 Cal. on page 505, 6 P. on page 325, the court said:

"We cannot think that the convention inserting in the constitution of this state the word 'damaged' in the connection in which it is found, and the people in ratifying the work of the convention, intended to limit the effect of this word to cases where the party injured already had a remedy to recover compensation. They engaged in no such empty and vain work. It was intended to give a remedy as well where one existed before as where it did not; to superadd to the guaranty found in the former constitution of this state, and in nearly all of the other states, a guaranty against damage where none previously existed."

The Reardon case and others citing it, determined that a cause of action exists in a property owner for damages independent from a "taking."

[7] The trial court was correct in awarding damages without granting an easement. By its pleadings defendant city did not seek an easement. We are not now deciding whether defendant city might seek and obtain an easement in a separate proceeding, but we do decide that under the pleadings and the applicable law the trial court did not commit error in awarding damages without adjudging an easement in favor of defendant city.

[8-10] We have determined that this action does not involve a "taking" of property as though under eminent domain proceedings but it is one for damages to property. The trial judge, as the measure of damages, used the difference in the reasonable market value of the property before and after the injury. Neither party quarrels with this rule of damages but, in effect, defendant city says there was no evidence on which the court could apply this rule and there was no difference in the reasonable market value because the evidence reflects the reasonable market value was greater than it had been before the drainage installations. Defendant city does not contend the installations enhanced the market value but does insist that since there was evidence that the value of the property was greater in later years the court had no right to award damages. Defendant city's position would require a court to hold that where there is a general economic inflationary period causing an increased price, and damage is sustained during that period of time, there can be no dollar recovery. We do not believe this position is sound. In the instant case there is substantial evidence that the land without the damage was worth $131,800 and with the damage, $83,500. Further, there was evidence that the property in the area had appreciated in value. Apparently there is no one factor to which this may be attributed. It is common knowledge that land in California, and particularly southern California, has had a heavy appreciation in market price and value during the time period here in question. Obviously, plaintiffs' land was no exception. There was evidence that about 1949 the reasonable market value of plaintiffs' land was $34,600 and at the time of trial and without the damage it had a reasonable market value of $131,800. Under the evidence in this case the court was justified in making an award of $20,000, and such an award is sustained by substantial evidence. Therefore, we will not reverse it on this appeal.

[11] Defendant city complains of a ruling of the court allowing evidence to be admitted as to the cost of the installation of a drainage pipe through the plaintiffs' land which would channel and conduct the water and make some portions of the land usable. It was testified the cost would be $50,000. Defendant city says the trial court used this testimony to arrive at its award. The measure of damages is not the cost of the installation of a pipe to carry the water through plaintiffs' land; however it properly may be considered by the trial court for evidence of the decrease in market value. See Podesta v. Linden Irr. Dist., 141 Cal.App.2d 38, 296 P.2d 401. The ruling of the trial court in admitting this testimony was not erroneous.

Plaintiffs bring this action to quiet title to a strip of real property which lies in an area delineated on a Map of Middletown made by J. E. Jackson, described as California Avenue. Defendants are the City of San Diego (hereinafter called City) and Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. (hereinafter referred to as Santa Fe). From a judgment entered in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

Historically, Middletown was one of four large areas of land within what is now the City of San Diego and in 1874 was undeveloped land. On October 21, 1874, in the case of Baldwin et al. v. Coutts, et al., No. 869, (hereinafter referred to as Baldwin action) a partition decree for Middletown was signed in the 18th Judicial District of the State of California. The Baldwin action was brought to determine the conflicting claims and interests of numerous persons and entities in and to the real property of Middletown. The City of San Diego, the County of San Diego and the predecessors in interests of plaintiffs were among the parties named and appearing in the Baldwin action. Before October 21, 1874, the trial court appointed referees to partition Middletown. The report of the referees, dated October 12, 1874, was filed in the Baldwin case. The referees had a survey and map prepared subdividing Middletown into lots, blocks and streets. The map was referred to and by reference made a part of the decree in the Baldwin action. This map is commonly referred to as "J. E. Jackson Map", "J. E. Jackson Partition Map", "J. E. Jackson Partition Map of 1874", "Map of Middletown made by J. E. Jackson." In the Baldwin decree each litigant was given certain property described by lot or lots and block with reference to the J. E. Jackson Map. By the decree the City of San Diego was given specifically described property. The Baldwin decree made no specific mention of the disposition of the title to the land upon which the streets were laid out. In part, the Baldwin decree ordered, adjudged and decreed, "that the said Report and Map of the said Referees and all things therein, be and they are hereby ratified and confirmed, and that the partition therein and herein made and set forth, be firm, binding, effectual and final as to all parties and that the pieces and parcels of land as by said Report and this Decree set off to the Said parties, be theirs, their heirs and assigns forever in Severalty. And this Decree shall ratify and Confirm unto the Said parties the pieces or parcels of land therein and herein set off to them the same as if they had each executed and delivered to each other deeds of release and quitclaim in due form and in accordance with said Report and this Decree." The J. E. Jackson Partition Map was filed in the county clerk's Office October 19, 1874 and the Baldwin decree was filed and became part of the official records of the County of San Diego.

On December 21, 1880, one C. P. Noell, one of the litigants in the Baldwin action deeded a certain interest in a strip of land which was part of California Avenue on the J. E. Jackson Map to the California Southern Rail Road Company, which interest has since vested in Santa Fe Railway. By this deed, Noell granted a right of way to "that portion of California Avenue that lies between the front line of each of said lots and blocks and the middle line of said California Avenue as comes within the route of said railroad according to the Map of said railroad Company's railroad * * *"

Plaintiffs, by their complaint to quiet title allege: they and their predecessors in interest have been the owners of certain real property specifically described which lies within the area delineated as California Avenue (now California Street) on the J. E. Jackson Partition Map of 1874; there was no dedication of or acceptance of said street; the street has never been used for a street by anyone; and since the filing of the J. E. Jackson Partition Map in 1874 the street has been used as if free from any dedication. Also, plaintiffs allege defendant Santa Fe is the owner of a certain specifically described portion of the area delineated on the Jackson Map as California Street. Defendant City answered and denied specifically the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint except it admits the J. E. Jackson Partition Map reflects an area marked California Street. No affirmative defenses were alleged by defendant City. Defendant Santa Fe answered and admitted by failure to deny that it owns the area specifically described in plaintiffs' complaint and the plaintiffs' allegations regarding dedication, non-use and use inconsistent with dedication and affirmatively pleaded the deed from one Noell.

It appears that the plaintiffs' allegations of ownership in defendant Santa Fe, and the affirmative pleadings of defendant Santa Fe do not limit its interest to a right of way but specifically alleges ownership. However, the Noell deed attached as an exhibit to defendant Santa Fe's answer which was later admitted to evidence, states: " * * * hereby grant unto said California Southern Rail Road Company, its successors and assigns, a right of way, * * * over, in and upon the following premises * * *"

The pretrial conference order provided in part: "Issues 1. Whether or not the area in question is now a public street or whether title thereto should be quieted in the plaintiffs and the Railway Company."

On the trial date and during the opening statement of plaintiffs' counsel a title company "Litigation Guarantee," a copy of the Baldwin decree, a copy of the J. E. Jackson Partition Map of 1874 were received and marked as plaintiffs' exhibits. During the plaintiffs' opening statement all parties conceded that plaintiffs, respectively, owned the property contiguous to the parcels of land in litigation. At the close of this opening statement defendant City moved for a directed verdict. During the discussion on this motion there was introduced and marked as defendant Santa Fe's exhibits, a copy of the Noell deed and a map reflecting the location of the railroad in 1880. The trial court stated that apparently defendant City's motion was intended as a motion for judgment comparable to a motion for summary judgment and the evidence would be considered as though in affidavit form. Defendant City concurred in this statement. Then, plaintiffs made an offer to prove the street had not been used as a street, the property had subsequently been sold to third persons, and the property in question had been used as if free from dedication. An objection to the offer of proof was sustained. The trial judge ordered judgment entered in favor of defendant City subject to the easement in defendant Santa Fe.

Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and "from the whole thereof". Defendant Santa Fe has not filed briefs on this appeal. On this appeal plaintiffs contend (1) the doctrine of res judicata is not applicable, (2) Section 748.5, Code of Civil Procedure is applicable, (3) defendant City abandoned any rights to the property under the provisions of Section 2620 Political Code, (as it existed between 1874 and 1883)<sup>1</sup> by the City's failure to work or use the property for a five years' period.

Defendant City contends (a) the street was set aside as a public way pursuant to Section 764, Code of Civil Procedure, in the Baldwin action; (b) the Baldwin decree was effectual forever on all parties to that action and their successors in interest and is res judicata; (c) Section 748.5, Code of Civil Procedure does not change the effect of Section 766, Code of Civil Procedure; (d) plaintiffs are barred by laches.

As of the time the decree in the Baldwin action was signed and filed, Section 764, Code of Civil Procedure provided in part:

"* * * Before making partition or sale, the referees may, whenever it will be for the advantage of those interested, set apart a portion of the property for a way, road, or street, and the portion so set apart must not be assigned to any of the parties or sold, but shall remain an open and public way, road, or street, unless the referees shall set the same apart as a private way for the use of the parties interested, or some of them, their heirs and assigns, in which case it shall remain such private way. Whenever the referees have laid out on any tract of land roads sufficient in the judgment of said referees to accommodate the public and private wants, they shall report that fact to the court, and upon the confirmation of their report all other roads on said tract shall cease to be public highways. * * *

In part, and in 1874, Section 766 Code of Civil Procedure provided as follows:

"The court may confirm, change, modify, or set aside the report, and if necessary, appoint new referees. Upon the report being confirmed, judgment must be rendered that such partition be effectual forever, which judgment is binding and conclusive.

tioned as streets and gave these streets specific names. This map was referred to and made a part of the report of the court-appointed referees. This report, which had incorporated the map, was confirmed by the court and made a part of the decree of partition in the Baldwin case. No appeal was taken from the Baldwin decree and it thus became final. Under the provisions of section 766, Code of Civil Procedure, supra, the decree became "effective forever."

Whether or not section 748.5, Code of Civil Procedure, adopted in 1955 is applicable to the facts of this case must now be determined. This section reads as follows:

"Whenever a proposal to dedicate land for public improvement has been heretofore or hereafter made by map only, without any acceptance of the dedication being endorsed thereon, and the land has not been used for the purpose for which the dedication was proposed for a period of 25 years, and the property has been subsequently sold to a third person, after the filing of the map, and used as if free of the dedication, there is a conclusive presumption that the proposed dedication was not accepted, and in a suit to quiet title to such land naming the governmental agency to which the dedication was made by map as defendant, the decree in favor of the plaintiff shall clear the title of the proposed dedication and remove the cloud created by the proposed dedication. (Added Stats. 1955, c. 563, p. 1066, § 1.)"

[3, 4] No case has been cited to us and we have not found a case interpreting this section. The controlling words of the statute have clear and definite meanings. The word "proposal" has been construed to mean an expression of intention (Taylor v. Miller, 113 N.C. 340, 18 S.E. 504) and a willingness to do an act (Salisbury v. Credit Service, 9 W.W.Harr. 377, 39 Del. 377, 199 A. 674) and an offer (Black's Law Dictionary, 3rd Edition). "To dedicate" means "to appropriate and set apart one's private property to some public use —". (Black's Law Dictionary, 3rd Edition.) Under these provisions there would have to be an offer to set part a portion of the property to public use, and it would have to be done "by map only." In our case there was no proposal to dedicate by a person by a map only. The setting apart for public street purposes was accomplished by court decree. We must determine the provisions of section 748.5, supra, have no application to the facts of this case.

[5] The general rule of law regarding long delayed use or non-used property dedicated to public use is that the public cannot lose its right by delay in use. See, Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 28 P. 839, 16 L.R.A. 145; Wheeler v. City of Oakland, 35 Cal.App. 671, 170 P. 864; Gross v. City of San Diego, 125 Cal.App. 238, 13 P.2d 820; Sacramento County v. Lauszus, 70 Cal.App.2d 639, 161 P.2d 460. In absence of statutory law to the contrary, we believe this same rule of law is applicable to streets created by partition decree where the defendant City was a party to and appeared in and received from the partition action.

[6] Plaintiffs contend that between 1874, the date of the Baldwin decree, and 1883 the date of its repeal, Section 2620, Political Code provided that where a road was not used for a period of five years it ceased to exist. Assuming, without deciding, that such was the effect of this section and that it was not amended prior to 1883, plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest had a cause of action accrue to them as early as 1883. No action was filed by plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest for over 73 years. After 73 years of growth and development of the defendant city, dependent in large part upon the streets and lots laid out by the J. E. Jackson Map of 1874, plaintiffs seek to set aside this map and to declare it a nullity. If a cause of action ever existed in favor of plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest we believe that it is too late to be sustained after a lapse of 73 years.

[7] It is an oft and properly followed rule of equitable proceedings that where a court of equity acquires jurisdiction it should consider and determine all the rights and claims of the parties relating to the subject matter; and to enter a decree finally determining them to the end that a multiplicity of suits may be avoided. 30 C.J.S. Equity § 599 and numerous California cases therein cited. We are satisfied that the trial judge followed this rule to the end that the conflicting claims have been properly and equitably adjudicated.

Although plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and the whole thereof, they do not argue against the judgment entered in favor of defendant Santa Fe. By their complaint plaintiffs affirmatively allege ownership interest in defendant Santa Fe in California Street. This is admitted by defendant City. During the proceeding in the trial court all parties stated to the trial judge that they recognized defendant Santa Fe's easement. On this appeal no point is raised questioning the existence of this easement. This being the state of the record it is clear that plaintiffs concede ownership in defendant Santa Fe. We will not review this portion of the judgment.

We have considered the other contentions of the parties. We believe the equitable disposition of this case disposes of these contentions.

Judgment affirmed.

Civ. 22658.

Aug. 18, 1958.

Will construction case. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Harold W. Schweitzer, J., rendered judgment, and contestant appealed from a part thereof. The District Court of Appeal, Vallée, J., held that where will directed executor to "see that money from estate be tythed to the amount of twenty-five per cent and given to" named charities for missionary work and provided that if "this money cannot be used for missionary work—then to help some poor theological students" and residuary clause gave grandson "any money and stocks or other personal property that I may have at the time of my death", the phrase "money from estate" meant distributable assets of estate and not merely cash, and consequently 25% of distributable estate would be equally divided among the three charities and the money and stocks or other personal property then remaining would pass to grandson under the residuary clause.

VALLÉE, Justice.

Appeal from part of a judgment determining heirship. The question is the proper construction of a will.

The holographic will of the decedent, Kathryn Whitney, reads:

"Last Will and Testament

"I, Kathryn Z. Whitney at the age of seventy-five and being of sound mind and memory, and not acting under the influence of any person what ever, declare this my last Will and Testament.

"I direct that my executor here after named, pay my funeral expenses. That he see that money from estate be tythed to the amount of twenty-five per cent and given to the Nazerine Church—head quarters at Kansas City Mo The Oriental Missionary Society head quarters in Los Angeles Cal and National Missionary Society head quarters Marion Indiana for missionary work. If for any reason this money cannot be used for missionary work—then to help some poor theological students.

"I want five hundred dollars given to my daughter-in-law to pay her for grave and vault to put casket in.

"If anything should come up at this time in regard to my former husband Norman G. Whitney or his estate it is my wish that he be given the sum of one dollar What I have was mine before I met Mr Whitney.

"Then I give and bequith to my Grandson Robert A. Zimmerman any money and stocks or other personal property that I may have at the time of my death.

"I name and appoint my Grandson Robert Z. Zimmerman the executor of this my Will with out bond and revolk any former Will made by me

"Signed

"Kathryn Z. Whitney

"February fifteen Nineteen Hundred and forty-nine."

The court found the will is ambiguous and uncertain but that it means there shall be distributed to the three charities, to be equally divided among them, 25 per cent of the distributable estate. The judgment decreed that on distribution of the estate  $8\frac{1}{3}$  per cent of the distributable assets of the estate be distributed to each charity and that 75 per cent be distributed to decedent's grandson, Robert A. Zimmerman. Robert A. Zimmerman appeals from that part of the judgment decreeing that  $8\frac{1}{3}$  per cent of the distributable assets of the estate be distributed to each charity.

Appellant claims that by the phrase "money from estate" the testatrix meant only cash, and not the distributable assets of the estate as held by the probate court. Respondent says the probate court's interpretation of the will is in accord with the intention of the testatrix and the applicable law.

[1-4] At the hearing, the probate court, over appellant's objection, admitted in evidence an undated holograph in the handwriting of decedent and a part of the petition in the present proceeding to determine heirship. Appellant asserts the rulings were prejudicially erroneous. The will was signed February 15, 1949. The testatrix died October 17, 1955. There was no evidence as to when the undated holograph was written. The ruling admitting the holograph was clearly erroneous. The uncertainty is patent—it appears on the face of the will. When an uncertainty arises upon the face of a will as to the meaning of any of its provisions, the testator's intention is to be ascertained from the words of the will, taking into view the circumstances under which it was made, excluding the oral declarations of the testator as to his intentions. Probate Code, § 105; In re Estate of Sargavak, 41 Cal.2d 314, 319-320, 259 P.2d 897. There was no showing that the holograph constituted a circumstance under which the will was made. The parts of the petition to determine heirship admitted in evidence showed that the appraised value of the estate was $21,014.98; that the amount of cash on hand at decedent's death was $138.98; that on January 8, 1949, 38 days before the will was executed, the testatrix established a trust account for the benefit of appellant in the amount of $3,922.67, and that on March 9, 1955 she established another trust account for the benefit of appellant in the amount of $524.16, and that the accounts had been paid to appellant and at no time had been a part of the estate. There was no error in admitting the parts of the petition to determine heirship in evidence. The petition was signed by appellant and it was a representation to the court by appellant to be considered by it in construing the will. In Re Estate of Sargavak, supra, 41 Cal. 2d 314, at page 319, 259 P.2d 897, at page 900, it is said:

"As there was an 'uncertainty' on the face of the will the trier of fact may consider such matters 'as the size of the estate, the property involved in the gift, the circumstances of the parties, and their relation to each other and to the testator.'"

Since we have concluded that construing the will by its four corners together with the parts of the petition to determine heirship received in evidence, the ultimate conclusion of the probate court was correct, the error in admitting the holograph is of no moment.

"A will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator as expressed therein, and this intention must be given effect if possible. Each case depends on its own particular facts and precedents are of small value. In re Estate of Wilson, 184 Cal. 63, 66-68, 193 P. 581. Lord Coke made the sage observation that 'wills and the construction of them do more perplex a man than any other learning, and to make a certain construction of them, this excedit juris prudentum artem.' (Roberts v. Roberts, 2 Bulstr. 130, 80 Eng.Rep. 1008.)" In re Estate of Luckel, 151 Cal.App.2d 481, 487, 312 P.2d 24, 29.

"Where the meaning of any part of a will is ambiguous or doubtful, it may be explained by any reference thereto, or recital thereof, in another part of the will. All the parts of a will are to be construed in relation to each other, and so as, if possible, to form one consistent whole; but where several parts are absolutely irreconcilable, the latter must prevail." Prob.Code, § 103.

[5,6] The word "money" used in wills is essentially ambiguous. Thompson on Wills, 2d ed., 384, § 245. In a bequest it means money and money only, unless there is in the context of the will something to indicate that the testator intended a more extended meaning. In re Estate of Boyle, 2 Cal.App.2d 234, 236, 37 P.2d 841. When used in a will it has no fixed or technical meaning, but is a term of flexible scope having either a restricted or a wide meaning according to the signification which the testator intended to give the word, and may be used to mean cash only, personal property, or even wealth—that is, property of any kind that may be converted into cash. Industrial Trust Co. v. Saunders, 71 R.I. 94, 42 A.2d 492, 495; 26 Cal.Jur. 970, § 269; 96 C.J.S. Wills § 759 d, p. 162; Annotations, 93 A.L.R. 514; 173 A.L.R. 656. Where the context of a will discloses the intent of the testator to attribute to the word "money" a specific meaning which is more comprehensive than the meaning ordinarily given to it, that meaning will be adopted and may comprehend any class of property defined by the context. In re Rogers' Estate, 91 N.J.Eq. 294, 109 A. 16, 17; In re McKendrie's Estate, 150 Misc. 665, 271 N.Y.S. 228, 230; Mann v. Haines, 146 Kan. 988, 73 P.2d 1066, 1073; Hinckley v. Primm, 41 Ill.App. 579.

[7] In determining whether testatrix meant only cash or the distributable assets of her estate by her use of the words "money from estate be tythed to the amount of twenty-five per cent" in the bequest to respondents, we believe a broad construction of the word "money" is required. A reading of the will from all four corners, in light of testatrix' apparent intention at the time she made it, indicates the more extended meaning should be given. Testatrix was 75 years old at the time she made her will and, although the will contains mistakes of spelling, it is fairly well written and reflects her awareness not only of the nature of her act and persons to be benefited thereby, but the nature of her property—money, stocks, and other personality.

The testatrix directed that her executor "see" that money from her estate be "tythed" to the amount of 25 per cent and given to the named charities for missionary work. And she said that if "this money cannot be used for missionary work—then to help some poor theological students.” The testatrix did not direct her executor to “see” that money in the estate be tithed; she directed that he “see” that money “from” the estate be tithed. Her language presupposes action by the executor in liquidating the estate for the purpose of obtaining funds to make distribution to the charities. One meaning of “from” is “out of.” Webster’s New Inter. Dict., 2d ed., 1012. The phrase “from estate” manifestly enlarges the term “money” to include all property which the testatrix might have at death. “Estate” in the sense used obviously means “the totality of the assets and liabilities of the decedent, including all manner of property, real and personal, choate or inchoate, corporeal or incorporeal.” In re Estate of Adams, 148 Cal.App.2d 319, 323, 306 P.2d 623, 625.

Testatrix’ use of the word “tythed” is of significance.<sup>1</sup> It implies that the value of that which is to be tithed must first be determined. A “tithe” is a tenth part of some specific thing. 41 Words and Phrases, p. 661. To “tithe” is to pay or give a tenth part of some specific thing. Webster’s New Inter. Dict., 2d ed., 2655. Here the testatrix increased the amount to be given from a tenth to a quarter. Her direction to her executor is, in effect, to “see” that 25 per cent of her estate be taken and given to the named charities.

The residuary clause reads: “Then I give and bequith to my Grandson Robert A. Zimmerman any money and stocks or other personal property that I may have at the time of my death.” The word “Then” can mean only one thing: after the executor had done that which she had directed him to do, “Then * * *.” The word “any” modifies the words which follow, showing knowledge on the part of testatrix that he would not receive all. No comma appears after the word “money” to suggest that “any” should modify only the word “money.” As it stands, “any” modifies money and stocks and personal property.

Appellant argues that the word “stocks” appears in the residuary clause only, indicating testatrix divided her assets into the categories of “money” and “stocks.” The phrase “any money and stocks or other personal property” does not conflict with the broad construction of the phrase “money from estate” in the previous provision. The later provision must be read in light of the prior provisions of the will. The phrase “money from estate” is a more comprehensive term than the word “money” standing alone, as used in the residuary clause. Testatrix, having indicated her intention in the first bequest that the executor tithe up to 25 per cent of the money from her estate to the named charities after payment of funeral expenses, it necessarily follows that when she made the final bequest to appellant of “any money and stocks or other personal property” in her estate at her death she meant that which remained after all the prior bequests had been distributed and her directions carried out. See In re Estate of Miller, 48 Cal. 165, construing the word “money” in a will as synonymous with “property and estate”; In re Estate of Carrillo, 187 Cal. 597, 203 P. 104, 105, construing a bequest of “1 third of cash that is left after my demise” in a holographic will as including a note and mortgage; In re Miricks’ Estate, 193 Misc. 211, 82 N.Y.S.2d 778, 779, construing the words “money of my estate” as used in a holographic will as including all personal property not otherwise bequeathed; In re Smith’s Will, Sur., 131 N.Y.S.2d 390, construing the words “All money in” various depositaries in a holographic will as encompassing the testatrix’ entire estate; McCabe v. Cary’s Ex’r, 135 Va. 428, 116 S.E. 485, construing a bequest to a sister of “the use of the income from all money in my name from my father’s & mother’s estate” as including all property which the testatrix had received from her father and mother; Walcott v. Pitcher, 7

1. The word “tithe” was also formerly spelled “tythe.” 9 The Century Dict. and Cyclopedia 6355.

R.I. 555, construing a direction that annuities be paid "by my executor from my estate" as requiring payment from the corpus of the estate.

It was manifestly the intention of the testatrix that the charities should benefit substantially. Anything less than substantial benefits would not have been provided for division among three charitable institutions or for the help of "poor theological students." The construction of the will urged by appellant—division of 25 per cent of $138.98—would exclude the charities from any real benefits.

We conclude that the phrase "money from estate be tythed to the amount of twenty-five per cent" is used in the will at bar as "property" or "estate." The probate court correctly concluded that it means there shall be distributed to the three charities, to be equally divided among them, 25 per cent of the distributable estate.

Action for breach of contract for factoring or purchasing corporate defendant's receivables. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Stanley Mosk, J., entered judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Ashburn, J., held that substantial evidence supported trial court's finding as to amount of fictitious receivables sold by corporate defendant to plaintiff.

1. Contracts ⚡322(3)

In action for breach of contract for factoring or purchasing corporate defendant's receivables, substantial evidence supported trial court's finding as to amount of fictitious receivables sold by corporate defendant to plaintiff.

2. Appeal and Error ⚡1010(2)

Appellants must demonstrate that there is no substantial evidence to support challenged findings.

3. Appeal and Error ⚡1010(2)

Appellants' mere summary of the evidence given by various witnesses, without argument as to the effect or specific application of the evidence, is not the required demonstration that there is no substantial evidence to support the challenged findings.

4. Assumpsit, Action of ⚡5

Where the amended complaint specifically pleaded contract for factoring or purchasing corporate defendant's receivables, and breach of such contract through assigning to plaintiff fictitious receivables, and damage suffered therefrom, there was nothing in the nature of a common count.

5. Fraud ⚡58(1)

The rule that fraud must be proved by clear and convincing evidence is one for governance of trial judge, not a court of review.

6. Usury ⚡98

Usury goes only to the matter of interest and does not preclude recovery of the principal by the lender either from the primary obligor or from the guarantor.

7. Usury ⚡117

In action for breach of contract for factoring or purchasing corporate defendant's receivables, evidence warranted finding that the transactions were bona fide purchases and were not usurious loans not enforceable against individual defendants who guaranteed the performance of the obligations of the contract.

8. Usury ☞31

The giving of the guarantee is simply an item of testimony or evidence which the trial court may consider in determining whether the transaction is in fact a loan, and a usurious one, or, what it purports to be, a purchase and sale of a chose in action.

9. Joint Adventures ☞1.15

In action for breach of contract for factoring or purchasing corporate defendant's receivables, wherein individual defendants, guarantors, asserted that plaintiff and one of the individual defendants entered into a joint venture and then diverted to that project funds which belonged to the reserve account, thus substantially increasing the burden of the guarantors to their exoneration, evidence sustained finding that there was no such joint venture.

10. Guaranty ☞53(3), 59

Guarantors of contract for factoring or purchasing corporation's receivables were not relieved from their obligation by fact that in certain instances the plaintiff charged a greater factoring fee than was provided for in contract and by fact that certain customers of corporation had failed to take their discounts and that such amounts had been deducted from the invoices and held by plaintiff when the purchase price of those receivables was computed where these things were not done by agreement with corporation and such amounts were deducted from plaintiff's ascertained loss.

11. Guaranty ☞60

Contract for factoring or purchasing corporation's receivables gave plaintiff right to charge to reserve account an indebtedness owing by corporation and to apply balance of reserve account to corporation's out-of-pocket loss without thereby invading rights of guarantors.

The judgment is the only real conclusion of law and displaces all former statements in the findings on the subject.

ASHBURN, Justice.

Defendants appeal from a judgment for plaintiff for $54,025.77, growing out of a contract for the "factoring" by plaintiff of all accounts receivable of defendant Northern Lumber Sales, Inc. (hereinafter designated as Northern); performance of the obligations of this contract were guaranteed by the individual defendants, John M. Coughlan and Xerline Coughlan, his wife. Plaintiff sued upon the ground that certain receivables were sold and assigned to it, between June 3, 1955 and August 10, 1955, which were "false, fictitious and non-existent for the reason that said defendant Northern Lumber Sales, Inc. did not sell or deliver merchandise to the persons named in said bills of sale, and no accounts receivable were due, owing and payable as set forth in said bills of sale." The court found this allegation to be true, held that plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $62,379.41, and, after adjusting the account between the parties, awarded judgment for the sum first mentioned herein.

Plaintiff Refinance Corporation (hereinafter designated as Refinance) was engaged in the factoring of accounts receivable in the sense of buying same for its own account from vendors of various commodities. Defendant Northern was engaged in the wholesale lumber business. Defendant John M. Coughlan owned the control of said corporation and was active manager of its business. On October 9, 1953, plaintiff and defendant Northern made a written agreement whereby plaintiff became "sole factor for all sales of your [Northern's] merchandise." (The words "you" and "your" designated Northern throughout the agreement.) It was agreed that Northern should assign to plaintiff all its "bona fide accounts receivable" and convey title to all merchandise therein mentioned that might be returned by Northern's customers. Plaintiff agreed to purchase, without recourse to Northern, all its accounts for merchandise sold "provided that prior to the time of charging and delivery of merchandise to your customers, the account and terms of sales are approved by us in writing." Northern was required to deliver an assignment of each account, together with duplicate invoices, evidence of shipment and stamped addressed envelopes so that the original invoices could be mailed by plaintiff to the customers of Northern who were indebted respectively upon the assigned accounts. Each invoice was to bear an endorsement that it had been assigned and was payable to Refinance only. Northern represented and warranted "that each account is based upon an actual unconditional sale and delivery of merchandise; and that the customer has made himself or itself absolutely liable for the payment of the amount stated in the invoice without reservations of any kind." On sales where credit of the customer was approved in advance by plaintiff, "all purchases of your accounts by us are irrevocable and we will assume any loss by reason of the insolvency of the customer." Upon receipt of assignment of account plaintiff was to pay the full face of the invoice less the customer's discount shown thereon and a factoring charge of  $1\frac{1}{4}$  per cent of the gross purchase price, i. e. 80 per cent thereof to be paid concurrently with assignment of account and the balance on the 5th and 20th days of the month after payment of said account. It was understood that at no time should the "amount withheld" or reserve be less than 20 per cent of the remaining entire balance of unpaid accounts. While the written contract primarily dealt with accounts which were to be purchased without recourse, it also by implication and practical construction covered other receivables which were purchased with recourse because the buyer's credit was not approved in advance by Refinance. During the period of October, 1953 to August, 1955, more than \$2,000,000 of receivables were "factored" by plaintiff, of which sum \$957,000 face amount were purchased with recourse. The agreement made no distinction between receivables purchased with and those purchased without recourse so far as the necessity of assignment of a bona fide receivable, accompanied by appropriate delivery proofs, was concerned. In addition to the factoring transactions, defendant Northern borrowed large sums of money from plaintiff aggregating about \$174,000 and represented by promissory notes. These transactions appear to have been separate from the factoring activities.

[1] There is no real challenge of the court's finding of the sale by defendant Northern to plaintiff of fictitious receivables. At a pretrial hearing it was stipulated: "That various accounts receivable for which the defendant, Northern Lumber Sales, Inc., executed assignments, and for which the plaintiff paid to the defendant, Northern Lumber Sales, Inc., various sums, for which [sic] non-existent, for the reason that the defendant, Northern Lumber Sales, Inc., did not sell or deliver merchandise to the persons named in said invoices and no accounts receivable were due, owing or payable as set forth in the said invoices." However, there was reserved as a contested issue: "The amount of the accounts receivable for which the defendant, Northern Lumber Sales, Inc., executed assignments and for which the plaintiff paid defendant, Northern Lumber Sales, Inc., various sums of money between June 3, 1955 and August 10, 1955, which were false, fictitious and non-existent." That the amount found by the court, $62,379.41, is incorrect has not been established.

[2, 3] Although appellants assert insufficiency of the evidence in this and several other respects, they have not "demonstrated" that there is no substantial evidence to support the challenged findings as they are required to do in order to sustain that claim of error. Nichols v. Mitchell, 32 Cal.2d

598, 600, 197 P.2d 550; New v. New, 148 Cal.App.2d 372, 383, 306 P.2d 987. Appellants' mere summary of the evidence given by various witnesses, without argument as to the effect or specific application of the same, does not suffice for this purpose.

[4] Counsel argues that one cannot sue upon a common count to recover under an express contract which remains executory in some of its aspects. Conceding that to be the general rule, it does not apply here. The amended complaint specifically pleads the contract, its breach through assigning to plaintiff fictitious receivables, and damage suffered therefrom. There is nothing in the nature of a common count at bar.

[5] Next it is said that fraud must be proved by clear and convincing evidence, and that measure has not been filled at bar. The rule is one for governance of the trial judge, not a court of review (23 Cal.Jur.2d, § 83, p. 210). Moreover, this is not an action for fraud but one for breach of contract.

Northern is insolvent and appellants' efforts are directed chiefly to exoneration of the individual defendants, John M. Coughlan and wife, who were held liable upon their written guaranty. As above shown, the factoring contract expressly warrants that each account assigned to plaintiff "is based upon an actual unconditional sale and delivery of merchandise." The guaranty agreement which the Coughlans signed incorporates the factoring contract by reference, recites that purchase of accounts by Refinance will be made "all at the request of the undersigned and upon the inducement of this waiver and guaranty and [Refinance] would not have executed said sales agreement and will not in the future buy said accounts except upon said request and inducement." The document guarantees "prompt and faithful performance of all and singular the covenants, promises, warranties, guaranties, representations and stipulations made by the seller [Northern] in said sales agreement and/or to be made by it in said bills of sale."

able against a guarantor. It is settled, however, that usury goes only to the matter of interest and does not preclude recovery of the principal by the lender either from the primary obligor (see Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., 200 Cal. 609, 622, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A.L.R. 725; Campbell v. Realty Title Co., 20 Cal.2d 195, 196, 124 P.2d 810), or from the guarantor (see 91 C.J.S. Usury § 132 b, p. 727; 24 Am.Jur. § 43, p. 902). This is not an action for recovery of interest in any shape or form. It seeks recovery of moneys paid by plaintiff for fictitious receivables, plus the agreed factoring fee. However, defendant Northern seeks the recovery of interest alleged to have been paid in excess of the lawful rate.

Reliance upon Milana v. Credit Discount Co., 27 Cal.2d 335, 163 P.2d 869, 165 A.L.R. 621, indicates that appellants consider the amount paid for the receivables to have been a loan and the amount of the factoring charge to be interest upon a loan. The instant case is clearly distinguishable from Milana, however. That was an appeal from a nonsuit and the court held that the factoring contract there under consideration furnished, in the light of attendant evidence, substantial proof of a loan in the guise of a purchase of receivables. It did not hold that a contract for factoring or purchasing receivables is per se a loan or an usurious one. The contract in that case provided that each receivable be purchased at a two per cent discount additional to the customer's discount; it also contained a warranty that each debtor was solvent and would remain so until maturity of the account; also guaranteed that each account would be paid within 60 days after date of assignment; the reserve account was to stand as security for payment of the assigned accounts. The court said: "In the present case the defendants made cash advances less discounts and in taking assignments of the accounts they exacted the plaintiff's guaranty of payment of their face value in full within sixty days. In practice they subjected defaulted accounts to payment from reserves, or return to the plaintiff and 'repurchase' by the defendants under the same guaranties by the plaintiff. By the defendants' own testimony accounts not paid within the sixty-day limit were returned, and because the plaintiff was 'hard pressed' for money and unable to meet the terms of her guaranties, she chose to 'resell' them to the defendants at an additional two or two and one-half per cent discount for a further sixty-day period. In brief, the defendants by their contracts and practice secured themselves against loss and protected a return of two or two and one-half per cent for each sixty days or less during which their advances were in use by the plaintiff." 27 Cal.2d at page 340, 163 P.2d at page 871. "Contractors are free to buy and sell their property, and this may include promissory notes and other instruments, at a price agreed upon, and when the bona fides of the parties is established the percentage of profit has no relation to the usury law." 27 Cal.2d at page 340, 163 P.2d at page 872. "From the evidence introduced by the plaintiff in the case at bar the trier of the facts could reasonably conclude that the contracts of the parties provided for a conditional transfer of title; that advances by the defendants were contemplated to be repaid within a specified time at a charge for the use of the money which was deducted in advance; that the essence of the agreements was the use by the plaintiff of the funds at prescribed rates of interest which were in excess of the constitutional rate; that the transactions were not sales of accounts receivable but loans secured by assignments of the accounts at usurious rates of interest; that the intent to accomplish such a result was discernible from the contracts themselves; and that the negotiations and the conduct of the parties under the contracts further tended to dissipate any doubt arising from the employment of sales terminology. A finding on the plaintiff's case alone to the effect that the sale form was used merely as a cover for the real intent would find support from the written contracts, the conduct of the parties, and the surrounding circumstances." 27 Cal.2d at page 341, 163 P.2d at page 872. "The significant fact is that if the defendants had really purchased the accounts and had taken absolute title there would be no occasion for the provision or practice relating to guaranties of payment within specified periods, or reversions of title and 'repurchase' in the event of delayed payment by the customer." 27 Cal.2d at page 342, 163 P.2d at page 872.

[7] At bar there was a real purchase, not a loan, no guaranty of repayment of the purchase price, but on the contrary a purchase without recourse in cases where the customer's credit had been approved in advance by plaintiff; in other cases the seller, Northern, would take the account back upon default of the customer. The trial judge found that there was no usury, no receipt of usurious interest for the use and forbearance of money, and that the factoring agreement was not "a part of a plan and scheme to circumvent the usury laws of the State of California." It cannot be said that the evidence did not warrant the conclusion that the transactions in question were bona fide purchases and were not loans.

[8] The record does not clearly show whether any part of the $62,379.41 (found to be plaintiff's damage) grew out of any purchases of receivables with recourse. Findings IV, VI and VII carry a contrary inference. But if it be conceded (as orally argued by appellants' counsel) that some part of said $62,379.41 derived from purchases made with recourse, it does not follow as matter of law that those transactions were loans or usurious ones. Milana, supra, does not so hold. It is quite consistent with the rule stated in O. A. Graybeal Co. v. Cook, 111 Cal.App. 518, 531, 295 P. 1088, 1093, "that the giving of a guaranty is simply an item of testimony or evidence which the trial court may consider in determining whether the transaction is in fact a loan, or, what it purports to be, a purchase and sale of" a chose in action. Upon ample evidence the trial judge drew the inference of a bona fide sale in the case before us. Coast Finance Corporation v.

Ira F. Powers Furniture Co., 105 Or. 339, 209 P. 614, 615, 24 A.L.R. 855: "When the holder of an instrument, such as the conditional sales contract held by defendant, transfers the instrument at a discount and is required to indorse or otherwise guarantee it so that the vendor becomes liable contingently to pay the purchaser at a future day a sum greater than that received with legal interest, the authorities present different views. The great weight of authority is that such a transaction should be regarded as a valid sale of a chattel with a warranty of soundness, and the purchaser is allowed to enforce the obligation to its full extent against his own indorser and all prior parties. 39 Cyc. 933." That this represents the weight of authority appears from Annotation in 165 A.L.R. at page 691; 91 C.J.S. Usury § 19 a(3), page 595; 66 C.J. § 85, page 188; 55 Am. Jur. § 26, page 344; § 29, page 346.

[9] Appellants claim that plaintiff and defendant John M. Coughlan entered into a joint venture for the purchase and operation of certain lumber mills and then diverted to that project funds which belonged to the reserve account, thus substantially increasing the burden of the guarantors to their exoneration. The court found, however, that this allegation was untrue, that there was no such joint venture, that there was no agreement whereby funds required for operation of a lumber mill were to be provided and furnished by plaintiff and that plaintiff never agreed to advance funds for use of a joint venture with defendant Coughlan. A reasonable construction of the evidence upon this issue is that William I. Stein, who was president and active manager of plaintiff corporation, made an individual deal with John M. Coughlan whereby he advanced to him personally certain moneys for purchase of a lumber mill or mills, with the understanding that Stein was to receive certain shares of the capital stock in one of those concerns, but the evidence does not compel a finding that this was a corporate venture of Refinance or that reserve funds pertaining to the factoring agreement were diverted to that personal deal of Stein's.

[10] Alterations in the factoring agreement are claimed to have been made as a result of certain departures in manner of its performance, and it is argued that the guarantors were thereby released from their obligation. In certain instances plaintiff charged a factoring fee of  $2\frac{1}{4}$  per cent, instead of the agreed  $1\frac{1}{4}$  per cent, and the trial judge charged back to plaintiff \$5,525.40 for this reason when arriving at the amount of the judgment. It was also found that certain customers had failed to take their cash discounts, which amounts had been deducted from the invoices and held by plaintiff when computing the purchase price of those receivables; that plaintiff should account to defendant for the same. The court accordingly charged an amount of \$2,828.24 to plaintiff and deducted it from plaintiff's ascertained loss when fixing the amount of the judgment. It will be noted that these things were not done by agreement with Northern; they did not effect modifications of the contract and could not prejudice the guarantors whose liability was reduced by application to the amount otherwise recoverable of those items charged by defendant in excess of what the contract permitted.

[11] It is also said that plaintiff wrongfully charged to the reserve account an indebtedness of $50,000 owing by Northern and later wrongfully applied the balance of the reserve account, $37,703.65, to its out-of-pocket loss, which last mentioned entry occurred after this lawsuit was begun. But the contract expressly provides (as the trial judge pointed out at the trial): "We shall have the further and irrevocable right to offset any and all claims which we may have against you, arising from any cause, contract, agreement or promise whatsoever, against any moneys or other assets in our possession belonging or payable to you, and we shall have the further irrevocable right to deduct from and retain any such moneys or assets to repay us in full for any such claims against you." Thus it appears that these applications of funds worked no wrong upon the guarantors because they invaded none of their rights (cf. S. W. Towle Lumber Co. v. Anderson, 208 Cal. 371, 374, 281 P. 500).

[12] The court did not fail to find upon material issues as asserted by appellants. In this connection counsel specifies the matters of usury, alteration and modification of the principal contract, and claimed release of guarantors. All these matters are covered directly or indirectly by the findings as made. The argument is directed to the subject of appropriate conclusions. "The judgment is the only real conclusion of law and displaces all former statements in the findings on the subject." In re Estate of Buckhantz, 159 Cal.App.2d 635, 324 P.2d 317, 325; see, also, cases therein cited.

Divorce action wherein the husband appealed from an order for attorney's fees and costs to enable wife to resist appeals taken by the husband from two orders in the wife's favor. From an order of the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, Orla St. Clair, J., entering an order for attorney's fees and costs the husband appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Dooling, J., held, inter alia, that where husband appealed from order finding that he was in arrears for child support and also from an order which imposed a lien upon a balance remaining from a judgment recovered by husband against third party to secure the balance accrued and nonpaid to divorced wife under order for temporary alimony, court had power under statute to order husband to pay to wife attorney's fees and costs to enable wife to resist the appeals from such orders.

Affirmed.

The statute which after providing for award of attorney's fees in court during pendency of action for divorce provides in respect to services rendered after entry of judgment that court may award such costs and attorney's fees as may be reasonably necessary to maintain or defend any subsequent proceeding authorizes court to allow reasonable attorney's fees and costs in any proceeding taken in divorce action, after final judgment has been entered, which the court has jurisdiction to entertain. West's Ann.Civ.Code,  $\S$  137.3.

3. Divorce $\S$ 219

Divorced wife was entitled to amounts accrued under order for temporary ali-

4. Divorce ⇨307

While an allowance for support of wife may not afterwards be made if the final decree makes no provision for alimony and contains no reservation of power to make such order in the future, court has continuing jurisdiction to make awards for child support although the final decree is silent on that subject, which power is found in statute which gives court continuing jurisdiction over custody of the children. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 138.

5. Divorce ⇨306

The fact that father created a trust for future support of child could not affect the right to recover amounts accrued under order for child support before the trust was created nor could father successfully argue that fact that mother had supported the child after support order was made barred her from recovering the amounts due and unpaid under that order. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 138.

6. Divorce ⇨284, 312.4

Where divorced husband appealed from orders which found a certain sum to be accrued and unpaid under order for child support and which imposed a lien upon a balance remaining from a judgment recovered by husband to secure the balance accrued and nonpaid to divorced wife under order for temporary alimony, the necessity for allowance to divorced wife of attorney's fees and costs to enable her to resist the appeals taken by the husband was sufficiently shown by wife's affidavit that she had no funds for nor property with which to pay counsel fees and costs, her only property being an interest in community property under the management and control of her then husband. Edward D. Mabson, San Francisco, for appellant.

Terry A. Francois, San Francisco, Carl B. Metoyer, Berkeley, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice.

Defendant appeals from an order for attorney's fees and costs to enable plaintiff to resist two appeals taken by defendant from two orders in plaintiff's favor.

A final decree of divorce was entered herein on May 11, 1951. By the terms of that judgment, which has long since become final, the custody of the minor child of the parties was awarded to plaintiff but no order for any payments for the support of said child was included therein, nor did said judgment contain any provision for alimony.

On February 10, 1955, the court made an order modifying the final decree to require defendant thereafter to pay $75 per month for the support of the child. No appeal was taken from this order. On December 14, 1956, the court found that the sum of $1,650 was accrued and unpaid under the previous order for child support. Defendant filed notice of appeal from this order.

On October 22, 1946, before the entry of the interlocutory decree of divorce herein, the court made an order for temporary alimony. No appeal was taken from this order. On December 31, 1956, the court made an order imposing a lien upon the balance remaining from the judgment recovered by defendant in Washington v. City and County of San Francisco, 123 Cal.App.2d 235, 266 P.2d 828, to secure the balance accrued and unpaid to plaintiff herein under said order for temporary alimony. Defendant appealed from this order.

It was to enable plaintiff to oppose these two appeals that the order herein appealed from was made.

[1,2] The basic power to allow attorney's fees and costs to enable plaintiff to oppose the two appeals is found in Civil Code, section 137.3 as it read in April 1957 when the order appealed from was made. That section after providing for the award of attorney's fees and costs during the pendency of an action for divorce, continued: "In respect to services rendered after the entry of judgment * * * the court may award such costs and attorney's fees as may be reasonably necessary to maintain or defend any subsequent proceeding therein * * *". Stats.1953, p. 1864. We have no doubt that this language is broad enough to give the court power to allow reasonable attorney's fees and costs in any proceeding taken in the divorce action, after final judgment has been entered, which the court has jurisdiction to entertain.

[3] Plaintiff is legally entitled to the amounts accrued under the order for temporary alimony up to the time when that order was terminated or superseded by further order or the interlocutory decree of the court. Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 809-810, 167 P. 394, L.R.A.1918B, 415; Solomon v. Solomon, 118 Cal.App. 2d 149, 155, 257 P.2d 760. Under settled principles the divorce court has jurisdiction after final judgment to take the necessary action to enforce the satisfaction of this accrued obligation.

[4] As to the order for payments for the support of the child appellant argues that since the final judgment made no provision for child support and contained no reservation of power to make a future order in that regard the court was without power to make its subsequent order, citing Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, 47, 37 P. 770. The Howell case was explained in McKay v. Superior Court, 120 Cal. 143, 146-147, 52 P. 147, 40 L.R.A. 585, as not covering the case of awards for child support. Since the decision in McKay our courts have consistently held that while an allowance for the support of the wife may not afterwards be made if the final decree makes no provision for alimony and contains no reservation of power to make such order in the future (McClure v. McClure, 4 Cal.2d 356, 359, 49 P.2d 584, 100 A.L.R. 1257), the court does have continuing jurisdiction to make awards for child support although the final decree is silent on that subject (Krog v. Krog, 32 Cal.2d 812, 816-817, 198 P.2d 510). This power is found in Civil Code, section 138 which gives the court continuing jurisdiction over the custody of the children.

Since both proceedings were "subsequent proceedings" in the divorce action which the court had jurisdiction to entertain the portion of Civil Code, section 137.3 above quoted gave the court the power to make the award of counsel fees and costs.

[5] Appellant points out that he has created a trust for the future support of the child, but this cannot affect the right to recover the amounts accrued under the order for child support before the trust was created, nor can appellant successfully argue that the fact that the mother has supported the child after the support order was made bars her from recovering the amounts due and unpaid under that order. McKay v. McKay, 125 Cal. 65, 57 P. 677, cited by appellant only holds that an order for past support cannot be made by the court, not that an order for future support cannot be enforced as to past due instalments.

[6] The necessity for the allowance is sufficiently shown by plaintiff's affidavit that she has no funds nor property with which to pay counsel fees and costs, her only property being an interest in community property under the management and control of her present husband.

The order is affirmed.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing
Aug. 27, 1958.

Hearing Denied Sept. 24, 1958.

Action by Attorney General for declaratory relief as to conflicting claims to assets of charitable trusts created for benefit of Gold Star mothers. From judgment and orders of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Lloyd S. Nix, J., defendant and cross-defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Ashburn, J., held that diversion of trust funds to unauthorized uses, inefficiency and mismanagement, hostility to beneficiaries and assumption of adverse trust afforded good grounds for removal of trustee.

Judgment and order approving, settling and allowing report and first account current of receivers, etc., affirmed; other appeals dismissed.

1. Charities ☞33

In action by Attorney General for declaratory relief as to conflicting claims to assets of charitable trusts created for benefit of Gold Star mothers, evidence sustained finding that charitable corporation acquired funds in trust for benefit of all needy members of patriotic organization of Gold Star mothers and acquired certain property in trust for benefit of needy parents of servicemen who were World War II victims, that corporation repudiated trusts by attempting to dedicate property and funds to partially different uses and to exclusion of management of patriotic organization, that there were inefficiency and mismanagement of property and trust funds, hostility to beneficiaries and assertion of adverse trust, justifying removal of charitable corporation as trustee. West's Ann.Civ.Code, §§ 2232, 2234; West's Ann.Corp.Code, § 9603; Lanham Act, § 601(b) as amended 42 U.S.C.A. § 1581(b).

2. Charities ☞40

Where a corporation becomes trustee of a benevolent trust, the courts look first to its charter to determine the nature and extent of the dedication of its assets to eleemosynary purposes.

3. Trusts ☞171

A trustee cannot change the trust upon which it holds property.

4. Appeal and Error ☞931(1)

The reviewing court reviews the evidence favorably to respondents.

5. Charities ⇨33

A charitable trustee will be removed on the same grounds as the trustee of a private trust.

6. Trusts ⇨166(2)

Diversion of trust funds to unauthorized uses, inefficiency and mismanagement, hostility to beneficiaries and assumption of an adverse trust are good grounds for removal of trustee. West's Ann.Civ.Code, §§ 2232, 2234.

7. Charities ⇨50

The proper administration of a benevolent trust, especially the prevention of departures from its legitimate objects and the redressing of breaches and repudiations of the trust, are matters of large public interest which preclude application of the doctrines of laches and estoppel, and particularly so in an action brought by the Attorney General.

8. Charities ⇨50

Attorney General could maintain action for declaratory relief as to conflicting claims to assets of charitable trusts created for benefit of Gold Star mothers, notwithstanding that Attorney General did not allege breach of trust or a departure from its general purposes. West's Ann.Corp. Code, §§ 9505, 10207.

9. Statutes ⇨212.1

In enacting and codifying statute providing that nonprofit corporation which holds property subject to public or charitable trust is subject to examination by Attorney General to ascertain the condition of its affairs and to what extent it may fail to comply with the trusts which it has assumed or may depart from the general purpose for which it is formed and in the event of any such failure or departure to institute the proceedings necessary to correct the noncompliance or departure, the legislature presumptively was cognizant of decision holding that Attorney General represents the community in seeing that charitable trusts are properly performed. West's Ann.Corp.Code, § 9505.

10. Charities ⇨49

The statute authorizing Attorney General to institute proceedings necessary to correct noncompliance with or departure from general purposes of charitable trust imposed on Attorney General an obligation to institute such a proceeding when he has concluded after investigation that there has been such noncompliance or breach and did not deprive Attorney General of his historic right and duty to supervise charitable trusts and to represent the community in seeing that such trusts are properly performed. West's Ann.Corp. Code, § 9505.

11. Declaratory Judgment ⇨322

In action by Attorney General for declaratory relief as to conflicting claims to assets of charitable trusts created for benefit of Gold Star mothers, one of the conflicting claimants could maintain a cross complaint, where the Attorney General in his pleading and the deputy attorney general in his closing argument impliedly consented to the prosecution of the cross complaint by such claimant standing in the position of a relator.

12. Parties ⇨5

A "relator" is a party in interest who is permitted to institute a proceeding in the name of the People or the Attorney General when the right to sue resides solely in that official; the Attorney General prescribes his own rules for granting his consent and such rules may be entirely informal.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Relator".

13. Quo Warranto ⇨5, 21
Trusts ⇨165

Court of equity could remove corporate trustee of benevolent trust and transfer to another fiduciary the management of all property held by the corporate trustee for such purpose, and quo warranto was not the exclusive, or indeed the appropriate, remedy for the removal of the corporate trustee, notwithstanding that the removal of the corporation as trustee would strip it of all its assets. West's Ann.Corp.Code, §§ 4690, 4691.

14. Declaratory Judgment ⚖️298

Directors of nonprofit charitable corporation were not necessary parties to action by Attorney General for declaratory relief as to conflicting claims of such corporation and another to assets of charitable trusts, notwithstanding that charitable corporation was removed as trustee of all the trust assets.

15. United States ⚖️135

United States was not necessary or indispensable party to action by Attorney General for declaratory relief as to conflicting claims to assets of charitable trusts created for benefit of Gold Star mothers, notwithstanding that United States under Lanham Act had deeded temporary housing project for defense workers and armed forces personnel to one of the claimants, a nonprofit charitable corporation acting as trustee for the charitable trust, and that by contemporaneous agreement certain conditions had been imposed, where the judgment removing trustee and appointing receivers could not affect any rights of United States growing out of a prospective violation of the agreement. Lanham Act, § 601(b) as amended 42 U.S.C.A. § 1581(b).

16. Charities ⚖️43

Where court had jurisdiction over action by Attorney General for declaratory relief as to conflicting claims to assets of charitable trusts created for benefit of Gold Star mothers, and the court removed trustee, the court possessed incidental jurisdiction to appoint receivers pursuant to the usages of equity. West's Ann.Code Civ.Proc. § 564, subsd. 3, 4.

17. Charities ⚖️50

Where monthly allowance to receivers of charitable trust was named "pending the further order of this court", affirmance of the order would not control the future action of the court upon the matter of receivers' compensation.

ASHBURN, Justice.

Two appeals in the same case are presented together. One of them (No. 22766) is taken from a judgment removing Memorial National Home Foundation (hereinafter designated as Foundation) as trustee of a charitable trust and granting other relief; the other (No. 22871) attacks an order fixing compensation of receivers, etc.

Appeal from Judgment.

Basically the litigation is a struggle between Foundation and American Gold Star Mothers, Inc. (herein referred to as Gold Star) for control of the assets of charitable trusts created for the benefit of Gold Star mothers. The attorney general instituted an action against both of these corporations seeking declaratory relief as to their conflicting claims; Gold Star filed a cross-complaint. The assets were in the name and under the control of Foundation. The court held it had abused and abandoned its trusts, should be removed as trustee and a new trustee should be appointed; it also appointed receivers to manage the property pending the selection of a successor trustee, the taking of an accounting from Foundation, etc. Though designated as interlocutory, this court held the judgment to be final for purposes of appeal (Brown v. Memorial Nat. Home Foundation, 158 Cal. App.2d 448, 322 P.2d 600).

[1] Gold Star's ultimate position is that Foundation is its subsidiary and agent which acquired title to property intended for use in furtherance of Gold Star trusts and then repudiated those trusts, declared its independence of Gold Star and dedicated the property to partially different uses and to the exclusion of Gold Star management. Foundation and appellant Eleanor D. Boyd come to rest upon the proposition that Foundation has been at all times a distinct entity which never was a subsidiary of Gold Star, that its trusts are defined by its charter, which basic instrument it has amended to change the scope of the trusts as it had a lawful right to do.

The appellants (Foundation and Eleanor D. Boyd, cross-defendant) argue first that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the court's findings and conclusions as to the trusts assumed by Foundation and the class of beneficiaries to be benefited thereby. This raises the important question in the case. Did Foundation, under the dominating influence of Mrs. Boyd, acquire property and money dedicated to the relief of members of Gold Star and attempt to divert it to uses which defeat, at least partially, the trust for the benefit of members of Gold Star? The initial assets belonged to Gold Star; those and subsequent acquisitions were turned over to Foundation, held in its name, administered and claimed by it, and the claims of Gold Star with respect thereto were denied and ignored by Foundation. The story is long, but the result seems clear—that Foundation did acquire property, (cash and other donations and grants) to be held in trust for members of Gold Star, and having done so diverted them to uses divergent from and partially destructive of those of Gold Star, and also excluded Gold Star from any voice in administration of the trust.

Gold Star, which has its headquarters in Washington, D. C., was formed as a corporation for charitable and patriotic purposes under the laws of the District of Columbia, in January, 1929, under the name of American Gold Star Mothers. Its purposes were stated as follows: "[T]o unite with loyalty, sympathy, benevolence, charity, and love for each other, mothers whose sons or daughters have made the supreme sacrifice while in any branch of the Military or Naval Service of the United States of America, or who have died as a result of such service, * * *" By amendment of 1937 the objects were restated to contain the following definition of purposes: "To extend needful assistance to all Gold Star Mothers and when possible, to their descendants * * *. This is an association of Mothers whose sons and daughters served and died in the Allied Cause in the Great World War, or died as a result of such service." In November, 1950, the name was changed to "American Gold Star Mothers, Inc." and the objects again amended to add a definition of the word "mothers" as used in the original and amended articles, viz., "mothers whose sons or daughters have made the supreme sacrifice while in any branch of the Armed Services of the United States of America or have died as result of such service and are designated as 'Gold Star Mothers' by the laws of the Congress of the United States and/or the Rules and Regulations issued by the Department of National Defense or any branch thereof"; the amendment retained the following expressed purpose: "* * * to extend needful assistance to all Gold Star Mothers and when possible to their descendants."

In 1950 Mrs. Boyd, then president of Gold Star, described the organization as the one "that has been known for more than twenty years as the National Organization for Gold Star Mothers." At the time of trial in July, 1956, it had more than 500 chapters and over 20,000 members in good standing. Membership dues are three dollars a year and fathers of persons dying as a result of war injuries become associate members without vote and without dues.

Mrs. Boyd was elected president of Gold Star in June, 1946, and continued to be such until June, 1952, with the exception of the period from June, 1947 to June, 1948. Prior to the convention of June, 1947, she had conceived or adopted the idea of establishing a home for needy members of Gold Star. At that meeting she presented the matter as a "No. 1 objective of the organization," saying in part: "I feel we should keep faith with our sons and daughters for forming a Foundation within our present organization for a National Memorial Home for these forgotten mothers. This can be done under the direction of the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc., which is a non-profit organization. * * *" A resolution fostered by her was adopted, reading as follows: "Resolved that President Eleanor D. Boyd be, and she is hereby authorized and directed to proceed with the formation and establishment of a national home for needy members of Gold Star mothers, which home shall at all times be under the auspices of the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc.

"Resolved, further, that the president, Eleanor D. Boyd, be and she is hereby directed to make a full report as soon as possible showing the action which she has taken with respect to the formation of the Memorial National Home." Articles of Incorporation for such a project had been previously drafted and were filed in July, 1947. They created a charitable nonprofit corporation under the laws of California. "[T]he primary purpose of its Articles of Incorporation was to benefit members of American Gold Star Mothers, Inc." according to appellants' opening brief.

[2] Where a corporation becomes trustee of a benevolent trust the courts look first to its charter to determine the nature and extent of the dedication of its assets to eleemosynary purposes. Pacific Home v. County of Los Angeles, 41 Cal.2d 844,

852, 264 P.2d 539, 543; "Similarly, all the assets of a corporation organized solely for charitable purposes must be deemed to be impressed with a charitable trust by virtue of the express declaration of the corporation's purposes, and notwithstanding the absence of any express declaration by those who contribute such assets as to the purpose for which the contributions are made. In other words, the acceptance of such assets under these circumstances establishes a charitable trust for the declared corporate purposes as effectively as though the assets had been accepted from a donor who had expressly provided in the instrument evidencing the gift that it was to be held in trust solely for such charitable purposes. It follows that neither plaintiff nor its successor could legally divert its assets to any purpose other than charitable purposes * * *." In re Los Angeles County Pioneer Society, 40 Cal. 2d 852, 860, 257 P.2d 1, 6: "[A] devise to a society organized for a charitable purpose without a declaration of the use to which the gift is to be put is given in trust to carry out the objects for which the organization was created."

The original articles of Foundation adopt the name "American Gold Star Mothers, Incorporated, Memorial National Home Foundation." Its purposes as therein stated are to acquire, manage and maintain homes, rest homes, etc. for "distressed and needy members in good standing of American Gold Star Mothers, Incorporated, in any State or Territory"; to receive funds and other property to be used for the "protection, health, welfare and relief of sick, destitute, distressed and needy members in good standing of American Gold Star Mothers, Incorporated." The articles also provide for a board of five directors and prescribe that "[a] majority thereof shall be members in good standing of American Gold Star Mothers, Incorporated"; the directors "shall be the sole and only members of the corporation."<sup>1</sup> Although the organization of a separate corporation was probably a violation of the Convention's mandate (cf. Shattuck v. Wood Memorial Home, 319 Mass. 444, 66 N.E.2d 568, 573), the original articles afford evidence of a deliberate effort to comply with the resolution of June, 1947; the corporate name "American Gold Star Mothers, Incorporated, Memorial National Home Foundation" definitely ties into that of the organization whose Convention authorized the establishment of a national home for needy members. The restriction of membership in the new corporation to members of Gold Star, with such members dominating the board of directors, effectively placed the control in the parent corporation. At that point Foundation truly could be said to exist "under the auspices" of Gold Star and to be its subsidiary. Although Mrs. Boyd testified at the trial that she did not think of the home as an American Gold Star Mothers project and did not explore the possibility of working it out within the framework of Gold Star, and further declared that the resolution of June, 1947, did not control the Foundation, her conduct at the time of organizing that corporation paints a different picture which is far more persuasive than the assertions made at the trial of July, 1956.<sup>2</sup>

1. This limitation of membership in such corporations was then legal (Civ.Code § 600), as it is now (Corp.Code § 9603).

The fact of organizing a separate corporation, though contemplated by Mrs. Boyd in advance of the June, 1947 Convention, was not then disclosed because, as she testified, she did not consider that necessary at the time. The fact was first stated in a bulletin sent by Mrs. Boyd to all chapters and members of Gold Star in July, 1947, the explanation being that this was necessary for exemption from taxes.<sup>3</sup> At that 1947 Convention the members contributed 441 dollar bills to be used in establishing the home; additional donations had increased the total to $1,498 by the time said bulletin was issued.

When apprised of the fact of a separate organization, various members, chapters and officers of Gold Star became apprehensive and dissatisfied and there was acrimonious correspondence between them and Mrs. Boyd, who not only was president of Gold Star at the time but was also president of Foundation continuously from its organization and selected and dominated its board of directors at all times. In further bulletins to chapters and members, issued by her in October and December, 1947, she asserted that the authority of the June resolution had been carefully pursued and that a separate corporation was necessary for tax and other reasons. In the third bulletin (in December, 1947) she said: "I am now in receipt of a letter from the National President of the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc., demanding that the National Board have complete control of the Memorial National Home Foundation, that I surrender all monies to her and that I cease sending bulletins to the chapters. A bulletin has also been issued on her letterhead, which states that the Corporation has been rejected by the National Board.

"The Memorial National Home Foundation is still a legal and functioning corporation. It will remain so until action taken by legal delegates in a legally called annual National Convention of the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc. decrees otherwise.

2. The court recited in its findings that it "does not question the honesty and integrity of Eleanor D. Boyd" but it specifically found that she "owed and still owes a fiduciary obligation to the defendant and cross-complainant, American Gold Star Mothers, Inc., and the members of its chapters and National Executive Board, in connection with her activities in forming and managing the Memorial National Home Foundation and acting as an officer and President of said corporation," and that such fiduciary obligation had been violated.

3. This viewpoint was elaborated in a complaint filed by Foundation against Gold Star in 1952 seeking control of the assets of the trust. The pertinent allegation is that Gold Star "has no provision in its Constitution or By-Laws for its funds upon dissolution to be delivered to a non-profit foundation or other corporation; that as a result thereof said defendant is unable to obtain an exemption from Federal Taxation Laws." But this theory does not appear to have been explained previously to Gold Star officers or members.

"* * * The Directors of the Memorial National Home Foundation have a dual obligation. Their responsibility lies not only in providing a National Home for distressed and needy members of American Gold Star Mothers, Inc., but they must conduct their affairs in such a way that no donor to the Memorial National Home Foundation shall ever question the singleness of purpose for which the funds they gave are applied.

"The National President and National Board of American Gold Star Mothers, Inc. have plenty to do to establish new chapters and carry on other work of the parent organization."

In January of 1948, before the June Convention at which she was re-elected president of Gold Star, Mrs. Boyd caused the articles of Foundation to be amended. The name was changed to "Memorial National Home Foundation," thus dropping the words "American Gold Star Mothers, Incorporated." The provision that a majority of directors must be members of Gold Star was changed to read: "A majority thereof shall be Gold Star mothers (mothers whose children were killed in the service of the United States of America)." The purpose clause of the articles was amended to eliminate reference to members of Gold Star and to say, for the "welfare and relief of sick, destitute, distressed and needy Gold Star mothers (mothers whose children were killed in the service of the United States of America)." This was done without the consent or knowledge of Gold Star, its officers, or national executive board. It was a plain attempt to change the scope of a charitable trust by mere amendment of the trustees' charter.

[3] Counsel for appellants argue that this could be done lawfully but they cite no authority which supports the proposition. Reliance upon In re Los Angeles County Pioneer Society, supra, 40 Cal.2d 852, 257 P.2d 1, proves futile, for that case held that an attempted amendment of the charter which was in derogation of the trusts expressed in its original articles was nugatory, the court saying at page 862 of 40 Cal.2d, at page 7 of 257 P.2d: "Pioneer's course of conduct throughout these proceedings thus demonstrates that it has abused and abandoned its trust and amply supports the determination of the trial court that a new trustee should be appointed. [Citations.] 'If the trustees abandon, or in any way abuse, their trust, equity will correct the abuses, and remove the offenders.'" It is obvious that a trustee cannot thus change the trust upon which it holds property. This attempt at ex parte divorce was doomed to failure.

In 1950 the Foundation articles were again amended to eliminate the words "needy Gold Star Mothers (mothers whose children were killed in service to the United States)" and to say: "The purpose for which this corporation is formed is the acquisition and/or creation and operation of a nonprofit home for parents of persons who served in the armed forces during World War II and who died of service connected illness or injury." In 1956 they were again amended to substitute these words: "The specific, primary, and only purpose of this corporation shall be the establishment and maintenance of a nonprofit home or shelter for destitute, distressed, or needy parents of persons who served in the Armed Forces of the United States during World War II and who died of service connected illness or injury."

It should be noted that the Foundation articles as amended in 1950 and 1956 restrict its beneficiaries to the parents of victims of World War II, while those of Gold Star never have been restricted to any specific war or even to its own members. Its membership extends to "mothers whose 'sons and/or daughters served and died in line of duty in World War I, World War II, or the Korean conflict, or died as a result of injuries received in such service.'" As shown by its articles and the testimony of Mrs. Boyd "one of the purposes of that organization is to help all Gold Star Mothers, whether they be members or not of [the] organization."

The erroneous notion that this legerdemain of charter amendments could succeed is reflected in Mrs. Boyd's activities at all subsequent times. Legerdemain would seem a harsh word were it not for the fact that Mrs. Boyd, who was re-elected president of Gold Star in 1948 and each successive year until 1952, who was at all times president and dominating personality of Foundation, actively, but without disclosing the attempted divorce, encouraged and solicited all chapters and members of Gold Star to raise money for the home through such familiar devices as bazaars, raffles, sales of plaques, donations in honor of the president's birthday, etc.; all this was done under the assurance that it was done for "your home." This procedure continued until Mrs. Boyd and Foundation openly repudiated any trust for members of Gold Star (as such) in May, 1953. At that time Foundation had accumulated from members' activities and similar sources, $73,577.12. All of it had been contributed, as found by the trial judge, "for the purpose of establishing a home for sick, destitute, distressed and needy mothers of the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc." As stated in June, 1949, by Mrs. Boyd, in a newspaper known as "Gold Star Mothers,"<sup>4</sup> the said funds "largely represent donations from individual chapters and from the mothers in memory of their sons, or other loved ones."

At the June, 1948, Convention of Gold Star, where she was re-elected president, Mrs. Boyd told the assembled members that the word "incorporated" had been dropped from the name of Foundation, but did not mention elimination of the words "Gold Star Mothers." She said (contrary to the existing fact) that the controlling vote in Foundation was with Gold Star and would so continue; also that Gold Star Mothers were in control; that the Foundation belonged and always would belong to Gold Star and "it is your organization."

Although the delegates made Mrs. Boyd president, they also adopted a resolution at the same Convention, reading: "We, the members of American Gold Star Mothers, Inc., * * * desire that the National Memorial Home Foundation be an integral part of our organization under the supervision and management of our duly elected and appointed officers and committees." They rejected a proposed resolution worded as follows: "We, the delegates * * * desire that the present directors of the Memorial National Home Foundation, American Gold Star Mothers, be kept and the Foundation be under the present management." Mrs. Boyd, though not so stating to the Convention, decided to ignore the resolution which had been passed, and actually reported to Foundation's attorney in Los Angeles that the other one had been adopted. At the trial she said: "I considered it null and void, having not carried or lost by the method we had used for resolutions," further explaining that it had not passed by a two-thirds vote. In fact, there was no such requirement in by-laws or custom. Never did she take any steps to conform to this resolution.

During World War II the United States Government had established at Long Beach a temporary project for defense workers and armed forces personnel consisting of about 90 acres of land with some 1,000 family dwelling units on it. It had been named Truman Boyd Manor in honor of Mrs. Boyd's son who had been killed in the service. As early as August, 1947, Mrs. Boyd began a campaign to induce the government to relinquish this project to Foundation as a home for Gold Star Mothers, under the authority of the Lanham Act (42 U.S.C.A. § 1581(b)). In these activities she contacted senators, representatives, Public Housing Administration officials and others having authority concerning the subject. She now claims to have acted solely as president of Foundation, but the record she made at the time refutes this contention. She told various senators that "Memorial National Home Foundation is incorporated to take care of the needy members of the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc., as well as other needy Gold Star Mothers and Fathers.

"The American Gold Star Mothers, Inc. is a National organization qualified in the District of Columbia after World War I. The Memorial National Home Foundation was incorporated to take care of the needy Gold Star Mothers and Fathers on a National scale." Congressman Doyle of Long Beach was quoted in one of the letters in evidence as stating that "he participated with Mrs. Boyd in the Congressional and Navy Department discussions at the time the enabling legislation was passed, and that it was assumed on all sides that this was a charitable project of the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc." There was much correspondence with government officials, most of which was upon the letterhead of Gold Star and signed by Mrs. Boyd as president of that organization and chairman of the board of Foundation. She introduced herself and was introduced to various officials as president of Gold Star. Finally, in 1950, an amendment was incorporated in the Lanham Act which was intended and understood to apply to Gold Star, viz.: "[W]here the Administrator determines that the housing involved is urgently needed by parents of persons who served in the armed forces during World War II and died of service-connected illness or injury."<sup>5</sup>

When formal application for relinquishment was made it was presented in the name of Foundation. However, it included a copy of a resolution adopted at the Gold Star Convention of 1949, reading: "Resolved that the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc. authorize the Chairman of Memorial National Home Foundation to proceed to acquire the emergency Housing Project * * * that project being ninety (90) acres, which assures us of plenty of room to take care of the mothers and fathers who need assistance; to be known as the Memorial National Home Foundation property for Gold Star mothers and fathers throughout the nation."<sup>6</sup> Also included was a financial statement of Gold Star written upon its own letterhead. This application caused surprise and questioning within the Housing Administration (which had jurisdiction over this matter) and it required that a relinquishment of the property to Foundation be approved in writing by Gold Star. When this was received and the executive board of Gold Star had appeared in support of the application, same was approved, for the Housing Administration then concluded that "Memorial National Home Foundation was a corporation that had been established to take title to the property as an operating organization for" American Gold Star Mothers, Inc. The court found, upon adequate evidence, "that the Housing and Home Finance Agency, Public Housing Administration, did believe that the said Truman Boyd Manor was being conveyed to an organization which was an integral part of and controlled by the defendant, American Gold Star Mothers, Inc." Before the matter could be accomplished the Korean conflict arose and a freeze was placed on all such relinquishments.

Early in 1953 the subject of lifting the freeze on this property was considered and

5. This was the language of the statute at the time the relinquishment to Foundation was approved on June 7, 1950, "for the purposes of acquiring and operating a Home for the parents of persons who served in the Armed Forces during World War II and who died of service connected illness or injury."

By amendment of October 26, 1951, the words "during World War II" were stricken and the following phrase was substituted, "at any time on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to July 26, 1947, or on or after June 27, 1950, and prior to such date thereafter as shall be determined by the President." (65 Stat. 648, Ch. 577, Sec. 2.)

6. The corporate name of Gold Star did not include "Inc." until the amendment of November, 1950. It is a fair inference that the phrase "Gold Star Mothers" had a generally accepted secondary meaning which signified respondent corporation and its members.

the question again arose whether Foundation would be a proper grantee. Mrs. Boyd then furnished the authorities a copy of a resolution adopted at the Gold Star Convention of 1952, to the effect "that the National Executive Board of the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc., uphold and recommend the continuance of the policy of the Memorial National Home Foundation, also, that in accord therewith each chapter shall proceed to annually elect a member to the advisory committee of the Memorial National Home Foundation. * * *" Careful scrutiny of this resolution shows that it related only to the policy of the Foundation to have members of Gold Star upon its advisory committee. But the resolution satisfied the government officials, the freeze was lifted and the property deeded to Foundation on May 29, 1953, for a price of $138,404.63<sup>7</sup> with a down payment of $944.66. The entire balance was paid in the ensuing year out of current revenues from the property, which grosses approximately $500,000 a year. An appraisal made for Foundation showed a value of $2,698,143.15.

An action was brought in June, 1952, by Foundation against Gold Star to establish its right to all the trust property. It was later voluntarily dismissed and was followed by another similar action filed on July 31, 1953, which was likewise dismissed.

The deed to the government property having been received in May, 1953, Mrs. Boyd in that same month openly repudiated any trust for the benefit of members of Gold Star. This she did through a news release given to the Long Beach Independent. It said, in part: "Memorial National Home Foundation was incorporated in July, 1947, while Mrs. Boyd was National President of Gold Star Mothers. It has no connection with that organization, however, except that Gold Star Mothers have been invited to name an advisory board." No convention of Gold Star members had been told that these corporations were independent. Mrs. Singer, who was president of Gold Star at the time of trial, testified that she always believed that control and ownership of Foundation was in Gold Star; also that Mrs. Boyd always said at chapter meetings "this is yours. It is for American Gold Star Mothers." Mrs. Broom, who was first vice president of Gold Star during all the years of Mrs. Boyd's incumbency as president, never learned of the amendments to the charter of Foundation until 1953. Mrs. Boyd testified at the trial that she did not feel that Gold Star was the parent organization of Foundation.

Shortly after the press release the 1953 Convention of Gold Star was held in June, and a resolution was there adopted "that the National Executive Board of American Gold Star Mothers, Inc., be, and it is hereby authorized and directed, in order to protect the interests of the members and Chapters of American Gold Star Mothers, Inc., to take all action and to do all things, as said National Executive Board shall, in its sole discretion, deemed necessary and proper, for bringing about a change in the control, management and operation of Memorial Home Foundation so as to place the said control, management and operation of such Foundation in the duly authorized representatives of American Gold Star Mothers, Inc. * * *"

In May, 1951, while the Long Beach property was frozen, Foundation, without consulting Gold Star, its officers or executive board, acquired certain property at Ojai, California, professedly as a home "for Gold Star parents." The court found "that the said property was purchased as a home for 'needy and distressed parents' of American Gold Star Mothers, Inc." The property consists of eight acres which then had on it a single residence and servants' quarters. The purchase price was $55,330, and Foundation spent $20,212.74 on improvements, consisting mainly of a single cottage which was supposed to be a model of homes for needy mothers. The court found that the initial payment on the purchase price

7. This represented the cost of the land to the Government of $133,182.49, plus a payment in lieu of taxes of $4,277.48, and the sum of $944.66 for accounts receivable.

"was from funds contributed by American Gold Star Mothers, Inc., its National Executive Board, and its members, chapters and friends." Though no finding to that effect was made, it seems a fair inference that later payments on the price and other expenses came from the earnings of Truman Boyd Manor. All contributions had been mingled as received and appellants' brief says: "Exhibit X shows that all of the net cash receipts through May 31, 1952, were invested in the Ojai property excepting only the sum of $1,097 shown as cash unrestricted at that date." The Ojai property has had a total income of less than $2,000 and a total loss of over $40,000, an average of $8,000 a year. The purchase was made somewhat hurriedly so that Mrs. Boyd could announce at the June Convention of Gold Star the existence of a home for mothers.

The property was and is zoned for single family residence. After its purchase an effort was made by Foundation to change the zoning, but this failed because of protests of neighbors who stressed a shortage of water in the area. Foundation has no license from the State to care for needy persons, and no definite plans have been made for the further improvement of this property. The only permanent resident has been a caretaker. There have been a few overnight and weekend guests. Foundation also obtained an option to buy an adjoining 32 acres and Mrs. Boyd solicited all chapters and members of Gold Star to contribute $200 per chapter toward the option price. Addressed to "Dear Presidents and Chapter members of American Gold Star Mothers, Inc.," one appeal commenced as follows: "Memorial National Home Foundation was organized to benefit our Gold Star Mothers and Fathers." After the June, 1953, resolution of the Gold Star Convention, Foundation placed on a single door in the Ojai "Manor House" a plaque reading: "The American Gold Star Mothers, Inc." and has since contended that the total property owned by it and devoted exclusively to the needy members of Gold Star "is a bedroom at Ojai of 187 square feet in area, together with the right to use jointly with other occupants a service area of 2407 square feet, not counting 8.14 acres of land." This was based upon the amount of contributions made prior to the amendment of Foundation's articles in January, 1948,—$2,170.08. Ojai has at all times been a dead loss and promises to be so for an indefinite future time.

[4] The foregoing review of the evidence (which of course is based upon the testimony, exhibits and inferences favorable to respondents; Nichols v. Mitchell, 32 Cal.2d 598, 600, 197 P.2d 550; New v. New, 148 Cal.App.2d 372, 383, 306 P.2d 987), amply sustains the court's findings that all funds accumulated prior to the purchase of Truman Boyd Manor "were funds accumulated for benevolent and charitable purposes and held in trust by the Memorial National Home Foundation for the purposes as set forth in paragraph III herein," which means for the benefit of members of Gold Star in good standing; also that Truman Boyd Manor is held in trust "for 'needy and distressed parents' of World War II veterans for the purposes as set forth in paragraph III herein, but limited to needy and distressed parents of World War II veterans."<sup>8</sup>

It thus appears that there were imposed upon Foundation two trusts, one of which is for the benefit of all needy members of Gold Star, and the other, Truman Boyd Manor, for the benefit of needy parents of World War II victims. The first classification grows out of the specific declaration of Foundation's original articles of incorporation and the second out of the circumstances attending the acquisition of Truman Boyd Manor, the statute being expressly restricted to providing relief for World War II parents. The Ojai property

8. The phraseology of the statute as amended in 1951 (see footnote 5, supra) is broad enough to include the Korean conflict, but the conveyance to Foundation was made on the basis of the 1950 approval of relinquishment and the statute then prevailing.

probably falls partially within each of the two classifications for it was acquired primarily with funds contributed by members of Gold Star for the expressed purpose of establishing a home for members and secondarily from the funds derived from operation of Truman Boyd Manor (for World War II parents only).<sup>9</sup>

The evidence also supports the finding "that the defendant and cross-defendant, Memorial National Home Foundation, has abused and abandoned its trusts and new trustees should be appointed to carry out the terms of the trusts." This is true because all funds and property have remained throughout all the maneuvers of Foundation impressed with a trust for the exclusive benefit of members of Gold Star, except property which is held in trust for the exclusive benefit of needy parents of victims of World War II,<sup>10</sup> namely, Truman Boyd Manor and the Ojai property; that is to say, that Foundation, as the subsidiary of Gold Star, initially committed itself to a trust for the benefit of members of Gold Star, has never been released from this dedication and could not without concurrence of Gold Star and the Court release itself from that fiduciary obligation through charter amendment or other device. So far as Truman Boyd Manor is concerned (and to some extent Ojai), the trust was narrowed to parents of World War II victims through the circumstances of the grant, but it still remains for the benefit of members (regular and associate) of Gold Star. Foundation persists in denial of any obligation to members of Gold Star, as such, and thereby it continues to repudiate its trust and to emphasize the necessity for its removal as trustee.

As an additional ground for removal, the court also found "that hostility, strife and antagonism has existed and does exist between members of the Board of Directors of the defendant, Memorial National Home Foundation, and particularly between its president, Eleanor D. Boyd, and members of the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc., and its National Executive Board. The Court further finds that the defendant and cross-defendant, Memorial National Home Foundation, and its president, Eleanor D. Boyd, cannot, with fairness and impartiality, carry out the provisions of its charter, insofar as its beneficiaries are concerned, under existing conditions without detrimental results to its trusts and beneficiaries." Also that Mrs. Boyd dominates Foundation and "is unduly influenced by passion and prejudice emanating from personal differences with members of the National Executive Board and members of the chapters of the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc."

The record is replete with illustrations of hostile reaction on Mrs. Boyd's part to any questioning or criticism of her regime. Reference has been made above to the two actions brought in 1952 and 1953 by Foundation against Gold Star in an effort to exclude it from the management of the trust. Smaller incidents are also revealing. In response to one member's question about the acquisition of a home, Mrs. Boyd said "that she was taking care of it and we would be informed when she was ready." She told the 1951 Convention: "We are directed to take care of the Memorial National Home Foundation and not ask so many questions that are not necessary to be told to you at this time." When told that a Mr. Geisler had a photostatic copy of the charter amendments, Mrs. Boyd said: "You had no business to go down there. That isn't any of your business at all. That

9. Under Gold Star management the trust has a wider scope, relief of all Gold Star mothers whether members of the organization or not, except as to Truman Boyd Manor and (in part only) the Ojai property; the benefit of the Long Beach property is limited to parents of World War II victims in its entirety; but Ojai was acquired from two sources, only one of which is limited to World War II parents; the exact proportion must be determined through the accounting ordered by the trial court.

10. By courtesy, husbands of members of Gold Star become associate members if they are parents of the victims of the designated wars, World War I, World War II, and the Korean conflict.

is the business of the Memorial National Home Foundation." When Mr. Geisler replied that he thought it the business of all members of Gold Star, she further said: "Well, I don't interfere in your business, and I don't think you should interfere in mine, and this is my business." On another occasion when Mrs. Geisler referred to having photostatic copies of the amendments, the following colloquy occurred: Mrs. Boyd: "You misrepresented or you could not have gotten them." Mrs. Geisler: "I did not misrepresent, the record books are open to all who wish to see them." Mrs. Boyd: "You had to swear you were entitled to them; you had to tell a lie to get them; you could not have gotten them otherwise." In 1949 a dissident faction of Gold Star organized an entity known as National Gold Star Mothers, and the October issue of the paper "Gold Star Mothers" referred to them as "quislings" and "fifth columnists" and "not honorable Americans."

As to Mrs. Boyd's lack of experience and lack of qualification to manage a two million dollar trust, the history of Ojai above recited furnishes potent proof. The administration of the Long Beach property is also convincing. The City of Long Beach has an ordinance which permits temporary housing until 1961 only; it would cost a million dollars to bring the Truman Boyd Manor up to the ordinance standard; though its gross income is a half million dollars a year, no reserve fund has been set up and no plans have been made to do this work or otherwise construct a home on the premises. True, preliminary drawings were made after this action was filed, but when presented to the City Council of Long Beach they were rejected because the proposed location is directly in the path of a freeway which the State intends to put through the property. The same is true of a duplex plan and a hospital plan submitted to the city. Not more than 20 to 30 Gold Star parents have been given housing in the 994 rental units of this property; they are in scattered units; there are about 300 Navy families there who pay no more rent than do the Gold Star parents. During this long period of relative inactivity and bickering the rents have been accumulating, the total in bank on May 31, 1956 being $103,697.64. Dr. Boyd, husband of appellant, operates a clinic upon the premises but Mrs. Boyd was unable to testify to any facts about his arrangement with Foundation, what rent he paid or whether it ever had been changed.

[5, 6] A charitable trustee will be removed on the same grounds as the trustee of a private trust. 3 Scott on Trusts, § 387, page 2049: "A trustee of a charitable trust may be removed as trustee for the same reasons for which a trustee of a private trust may be removed. Thus he may be removed for serious breaches of trust, for unfitness, for long continued absence and the like. He can also be removed where his views are hostile to the purposes of the trust, as in the case of a religious trust where he ceases to hold religious views which it is the purpose of the trust to promote." To the same effect, see, Restatement of Law of Trusts, § 387, page 1181. That diversion of trust funds to unauthorized uses, inefficiency and mismanagement, hostility to the beneficiaries, assumption of an adverse trust, afford good grounds for such removal is well established.

Civil Code, § 2232: "No trustee, so long as he remains in the trust, may undertake another trust adverse in its nature to the interest of his beneficiary in the subject of the trust, without the consent of the latter." Section 2234: "Every violation of the provisions of the preceding sections of this Article is a fraud against the beneficiary of a trust." "The power of a court of equity to remove a trustee, and to substitute another in his place, is incidental to its paramount duty to see that trusts are properly executed, and may properly be exercised whenever such a state of mutual ill feeling, growing out of his behavior, exists between the trustees, or between the trustee in question and the beneficiaries, that his continuance in office would be detrimental to the execution of the trust, even if for no other reason than that human infirmity would prevent the co-trustee or the beneficiaries from working in harmony with him, and although charges of misconduct against him are either not made out, or are greatly exaggerated." May v. May, 167 U.S. 310, 320, 321, 17 S.Ct. 824, 828, 42 L.Ed. 179. "If hostility between trustee and beneficiary is such that the best interests of the trust are jeopardized, the trustee will be removed." 45 A.L.R. 331, 333.

[7] The pleas of laches and estoppel which are aimed at Gold Star cannot be sustained. Firstly, the complaint of the attorney general, as is hereinafter shown, sustains this proceeding regardless of capacity of Gold Star to complain of Foundation's mismanagement or repudiation of the trust. Secondly, the proper administration of a benevolent trust, especially the prevention of departures from its legitimate objects and the redressing of breaches and repudiations of the trust, are matters of large public interest which preclude application of the doctrines of laches and estoppel and particularly so in an action brought by the attorney general. "No length of diversion from the plain provisions of a charitable trust will prevent restoration to its true purpose." William Buchanan Foundation v. Shepperd, Tex.Civ.App., 283 S.W.2d 325, 336. "The lapse of many years is no bar to such action. 'Generally it is true that no length of time of diversion from the plain provisions of a charitable foundation will prevent its restoration to its true purpose.'" Shattuck v. Wood Memorial Home, supra, 319 Mass. 444, 66 N.E. 2d 568, 573. To the same effect, see, Trustees of Andover Theological Seminary v. Visitors of Theological Inst., etc., 253 Mass. 256, 148 N.E. 900, 918.

[8] Appellants argue that neither the attorney general nor Gold Star (which filed a cross-complaint herein) has authority to maintain this action.

As to the attorney general, appellants rely primarily upon § 9505 Corporations Code, which says: "A nonprofit corporation which holds property subject to any public or charitable trust is subject at all times to examination by the Attorney General, on behalf of the State, to ascertain the condition of its affairs and to what extent, if at all, it may fail to comply with trusts which it has assumed or may depart from the general purposes for which it is formed. In case of any such failure or departure the Attorney General shall institute, in the name of the State, the proceedings necessary to correct the noncompliance or departure." Section 10207, which appears in the part covering corporations organized for charitable or eleemosynary purposes, contains almost identical language. Counsel say that the statute imposes a condition precedent to a suit by the attorney general, namely a finding by him that there has been a failure to comply with the trust or a departure from its general purposes; that such finding was not made at bar and therefore the predicate for a suit by the attorney general was not laid. Emphasis is placed upon the fact that this is an action for declaratory relief. The complaint alleges that Foundation has possession and control of charitable trust assets of the value of approximately one million dollars; that Gold Star contends it is entitled as trustee to possession and control of same; that Foundation claims it is entirely independent and not subject to control of Gold Star and is the only proper trustee of said charity; that plaintiff has been unable to determine "the precise nature and extent of the charitable trust and/or trusts involved, or to resolve the dispute between said defendants regarding the right to possession and/or control, as Trustees, of the aforesaid charitable trust assets." Also, "that all the charitable trust assets chargeable to and in the possession and/or under the control of defendant, Memorial National Home Foundation, were solicited by and tendered to said Memorial National Home Foundation with the understanding that said assets were to be administered by the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc. and that at least a substantial portion of said assets would be devoted toward the rendering of aid and assistance to needy and distressed members of said American Gold Star Mothers, Inc." Again, that public interest requires a prompt determination of the nature and scope of the charitable trust or trusts involved, and the designation of the proper trust or trustees to accomplish the purpose or purposes of same. The prayer is for judgment determining the nature and scope of the trusts and which defendant is the proper trustee of each trust; that "defendants be required to account for all assets properly chargeable to said trusts to enable the court to further clarify the rights and duties of plaintiff in hereafter enforcing and supervising said trusts, as his statutory and common-law duty. Plaintiff also prays for such other and further relief as the court may deem just in the premises, including costs of suit incurred herein."

[9,10] It is true that the complaint makes no allegation of a breach of trust or departure from its general purposes. But § 9505 does not impose such a finding as a condition precedent to any suit by the attorney general. All counsel seem to agree that that official has an historic right and duty to supervise charitable trusts and to maintain such actions as may be appropriate to protect the public interests therein. 3 Scott on Trusts, § 391, page 2052, says: "In England the records show that even before the enactment of the Statute of Charitable Uses in 1601 suits were brought by the Attorney General to enforce charitable trusts. The community has an interest in the enforcement of such trusts and the Attorney General represents the community in seeing that the trusts are properly performed." People ex rel. Ellert v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 136, 45 P. 270, 271, 35 L.R.A. 269: "The state, as parens patriae, superintends the management of all public charities or trusts, and in these matters acts through her attorney general. Generally speaking, such an action will not be entertained at all unless the attorney general is a party to it. Such was the rule at common law, and it has not been changed in this state. Even in those states, such as Massachusetts, where by special statute the attorney general is instructed to prosecute such actions, it is declared that the statute does not narrow or diminish in this regard the common-law powers incident to the office. Parker v. May, 5 Cush., Mass., 336. The principle and rule are thus succinctly stated in Attorney General v. Compton, 1 Younge & C. Ch. 417: Where property affected by a trust for public purposes is in the hands of those who hold it devoted to that trust, it is the privilege of the public that the crown should be entitled to intervene by its officers for the purpose of asserting, on behalf of the public generally, the public interest and the public right, which probably no individual could be found effectually to assert even if the interest were such as to allow it. 2 Kent's Commentaries, 10th ed., 359; Lewin, Trusts, § 665; 1 Daniell's Chancery Practice, § 13; Perry, Trusts, § 732." The soundness of this ruling is emphasized by the California concept that "[t]he Attorney General, as the chief law officer of the state, has broad powers derived from the common law, and in the absence of any legislative restriction, has the power to file any civil action or proceeding directly involving the rights and interests of the state, or which he deems necessary for the enforcement of the laws of the state, the preservation of order, and the protection of public rights and interests." Pierce v. Superior Court, 1 Cal.2d 759, 761-762, 37 P.2d 453, 460, 461, 96 A.L.R. 1020. The legislature presumptively was cognizant of the Cogswell decision when enacting § 605c Civil Code in 1931 (Stats.1931, Ch. 871, p. 1852), and codifying it as § 9505, Corporations Code, in 1947. It is to be inferred that there was no intention to change the law by stripping the attorney general of a recognized and important function in the absence of clear and explicit language so indicating. In re Guardianship of Thrasher, 105 Cal.App.2d 768, 777, 234 P.2d 230, 236: " * * * it is not to be presumed that the legislature in the enactment of statutes intends to overthrow long-established principles of law unless such intention is made clearly to appear either by express declaration or by necessary implication. Lowe v. Yolo County Consolidated Water Co., 8 Cal.App. 167, 174, 96 P. 379; 23 Cal.Jur. 782, sec. 158.' See, also, Freeman v. Jergins, 125 Cal.App.2d 536, 552-553, 271 P.2d 210. The utmost effect to be attributed to § 9505 is the imposition upon the attorney general of an additional obligation (rather than a mere discretion) to institute suit when he has concluded after investigation that there has been a breach of a charitable trust or a departure from the general purposes for which the corporation was formed. There was no error in ruling that the present suit is properly maintained by the attorney general.

[11] Appellants' argument that Gold Star has no capacity to maintain its cross-complaint rounds out the thought that nobody can maintain an action to correct abuse in administration or repudiation of a charitable trust until the attorney general has made an investigation and reached the decision specified in § 9505, Corporations Code. The argument is that Gold Star has proceeded upon the theory that it has standing to sue as creator of the trusts held by Foundation, or that it represents the donors to those trusts. It seems to be the law of this State that the trustor or donors of a charitable trust cannot maintain an action such as this independently of the attorney general. O'Hara v. Grand Lodge I. O. G. T., 213 Cal. 131, 139, 2 P.2d 21, 24, says: "[E]ven if defendant be treated as the creator of this trust, it does not appear what standing it has in this action to claim any interest in the real property. Defendant parted with its entire interest in the property for a valuable consideration, subject to the trust, and retained no reversionary interest therein. Under such circumstances, it has no standing in a court of equity, except as a relator, to attempt to compel the proper execution of the trust, or to claim any interest in the trust property. The law is well settled that when property has become fully vested in trustees for a valid charitable purpose, neither the creator of the trust nor his heirs or assigns have any standing in court in a proceeding to compel the proper execution of the trust, except as relators." To the same effect are Pratt v. Security Trust & Savings Bk., 15 Cal.App. 2d 630, 640, 59 P.2d 862; George Pepperdine Foundation v. Pepperdine, 126 Cal. App.2d 154, 161, 271 P.2d 600.

The Gold Star pleading named the attorney general as cross-defendant, and that official filed an answer which admitted or denied various allegations and concluded with the prayer "that the Court hear and determine all the issues raised by the pleadings herein and that it enter judgment accordingly, including the awarding to this answering cross-defendant of costs of suit; and such other and further relief as the Court may deem just in the premises."

[12] A relator is a party in interest who is permitted to institute a proceeding in the name of the People or the attorney general when the right to sue resides solely in that official. The term is thus defined in 2 Bouv. Law Dict., Rawle's Third Revision, page 2863: "At common law, strictly speaking, no such person as a relator to an information is known, he being a creature of the statute of 9 Anne. In this country, even where no similar statute prevails, informations are allowed to be filed by private persons desirous to try their rights, in the name of the attorney-general, and these are commonly called relators." The attorney general prescribes his own rules for granting such consent and they may be entirely informal.

In People v. San Francisco, 36 Cal. 595, 605, an interested party filed a mandamus proceeding under the title of People ex rel. Ferguson. The application and notice thereof were signed by the attorney for the relator, but not by the attorney general. The court said in this connection: "Though the Attorney General did not sign the notice, he unites in the brief in support of the application, and thereby, impliedly at least, consents to the use of the name of the People." That ruling is applicable at bar. The attorney general has impliedly consented to the prosecution of the cross-complaint by Gold Star standing in the position of a relator. Not only did he do so by his pleading, but the deputy attorney general in charge of the case stated, in closing his argument below: "Upon a complete examination of this record and with the great realization of what I am about to advocate, it is my earnest conclusion that, with the view in mind to properly benefiting the beneficiaries in carrying out the trust purposes, removal of the present trustee is essential." The attorney general has also filed a respondent's brief in this court which argues: "The Findings of Fact are Fully Supported by the Evidence and Required the Removal of Memorial National Home Foundation as Trustee. * * * The Trial Court Properly Removed Memorial National Home Foundation as Trustee of Charitable Assets," and concludes: "This respondent concludes that the evidence and the law clearly supports the decree and the procedure by which it was obtained. * * * This respondent concludes that this action was proper and was more than justified by the substantial evidence elicited." We hold that Gold Star's cross-complaint was properly entertained by the court, even if it were to be conceded (which we do not) that the attorney general's own complaint was not sufficient to sustain the action.

[13] Next it is argued that the removal of Foundation as trustee stripped it of all its assets and therefore operated as a dissolution; that an action in quo warranto is the exclusive applicable procedure, and it cannot be pursued without compliance with § 4691, Corporations Code, which gives the corporation an opportunity to cure its derelictions by charter amendment or other corporate action.<sup>11</sup> It appears, however, that this section applies only to an action brought under § 4690, not strictly quo warranto but one "to procure a judgment dissolving the corporation and annulling, vacating, or forfeiting its corporate existence." "Apart from statutes extending the existence of, or conferring powers upon, corporations for the purpose of winding up their affairs, the dissolution of a corporation implies the termination of its existence and its utter extinction and obliteration as an entity or body in favor of which obligations exist or accrue or upon which liabilities may be imposed." (13 Am.Jur., § 1342, p. 1191.) See, also, Restatement of Conflict of Laws, § 157, Comment a, p. 227. The instant action has no such purpose; it leaves Foundation intact as a corporation, qualified to undertake and administer any new charitable trusts which do not impinge upon those whose administration has been taken from it. In re Los Angeles County Pioneer Society, supra, 40 Cal.2d 852, 257 P.2d 1, has established the law for this State that a court of equity may remove a corporate trustee of a benevolent trust and transfer to another fiduciary the management of all property held by it for such purpose. There is no merit in the contention that quo warranto was the exclusive, or indeed the appropriate, remedy to be pursued at bar.

[14] Absence of indispensable parties is urged on two grounds,—that the directors of Foundation and the United States are in that category.

As to the directors, the argument proceeds as if the action sought their removal from office, which obviously is not the case. Authorities cited to the proposition that the directors are essential parties to such an action are not in point. Although the corporation was removed as trustee of all the trust assets in the instant case, the

11. Corp.Code, § 4691: "However, if the cause of action is a matter or act which the corporation has done or omitted to do that can be corrected by amendment of its articles or by other corporate action, such suit shall not be maintained unless (a) the Attorney General, at least 30 days prior to the institution of suit, has given the corporation written notice of the matter or act done or omitted to be done, and (b) the corporation has failed, neglected, or refused to institute proceedings to correct it within the 30-day period or thereafter fails to prosecute such proceedings."

corporation is not dissolved and the directors remain able to function as such. Title to the trust assets was vested in the trustee, not in the directors, and the judgment takes nothing from them to which they were entitled as individuals. They were neither indispensable nor necessary parties.

[15] The United States is not an indispensable or necessary party. The contention that it is rests upon a collateral agreement made at the time the government deeded Truman Boyd Manor to Foundation. That was done by quitclaim deed which contained no covenants or conditions. A contemporaneous agreement was made between the United States, "represented by the Department of the Navy," and the Foundation, under date of May 27, 1953. It recites the request of Foundation for transfer of Truman Boyd Manor pursuant to the Lanham Act, also the willingness of the Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency to effect the transfer "on the expressed condition that a satisfactory agreement be entered into between the Foundation and the Department of the Navy, with respect to operation of the project, its availability for occupancy by persons engaged in defense or mobilization activities and reasonable rentals." Then follows the agreement that so long as there is a defense need for the project, as determined by the Navy, Foundation will continue to operate it for housing purposes and maintain reasonable rents, that it will give preference to military and other defense personnel in filling vacancies, will consult with the naval commander prior to changing any rent schedules, and in the event of hostilities will, if requested by the Navy, make the project available for full military use. The condition mentioned was that a satisfactory agreement be made, and when the agreement under discussion was executed the condition had been performed and hence ceased to be further operative. At best, its violation could amount to a partial failure of consideration (Foundation paid $138,-404.63 for the property),—partial failure which the United States might be able to capitalize in some proceeding brought for that specific purpose. But this agreement left no cognizable interest in the property in the United States. Its rights, if any, growing out of a prospective violation of the agreement could not be affected by the judgment at bar, for the receivers and the new trustee take with full notice of the contract and become subject to all the sanctions which could be invoked against Foundation with respect to it. Under the principles announced in Bank of California, Nat. Ass'n v. Superior Court, 16 Cal.2d 516, 520-524, 106 P.2d 879, the United States cannot be held a necessary or an indispensable party to this action.

Finally, appellants argue that "[t]he trial court has in effect determined that it, rather than Congress and the Housing and Home Finance Agency, should determine who is to manage Truman Boyd Manor"; and that "[t]he contract between the United States and Memorial National Home Foundation demonstrates that the United States has not completely disposed of Truman Boyd Manor." Hence, counsel say, this judgment interferes with the power of Congress to dispose of and make all needful regulations concerning property of the United States. (U.S.Const., Art. IV, § 3, clause 2.) There is no merit in this contention for, as shown above, United States parted with its entire interest in Truman Boyd Manor; if perchance it has any rightful complaint as to performance of the contract with the Navy above discussed, that right is not affected by the judgment herein.

No other points concerning the judgment require discussion.

Appeal from Order Fixing Compensation of Receivers.

By the judgment herein the court appointed Messrs. Roy E. Allen and George D. Lyon receivers of all the trust property "pending the appointment of a new trustee, or trustees." They qualified, took possession and in due course presented their Report and First Account Current wherein they prayed for an allowance of compensation and averred that their "joint work is reasonably and fairly worth $2,500.00 per month." Supporting testimony was given. As the court was about to rule, counsel for appellant Foundation objected to payment of any moneys to the receivers "out of the funds of Memorial National Home Foundation" on the ground of lack of jurisdiction, the reference apparently being directed to jurisdiction over the action and jurisdiction to appoint a receiver. The court made its "Order Approving, Settling and Allowing Report and First Account Current of Receivers, Fixing Compensation of Receivers, etc.," stating that "the circumstances are such that this is an appropriate case for allowance of compensation to the receivers on a salary basis, and that the fair and reasonable value of the services of the said receivers in their capacity as such receivers in this action is the sum of $2,500.00 per month, pending the further order of this court. * * * That the said receivers be and hereby are allowed, pending the further order of this court, the sum of $2,500.00 per month for their services as such receivers herein, and that out of the funds in their possession, they are authorized to disburse $1,250.00 per month to each of the said receivers, from the date of their qualification herein as such receivers, pending the further order of this court." From this order Foundation has taken appeal No. 22871.

No contention is made that the award is excessive, or that the court abused its discretion in any respect. Appellant's brief says: "The resolution of the instant appeal would seem to be governed by the disposition of the appeal by appellant from the interlocutory judgment which among other things appointed the respondent receivers"; also, "[a]s earlier stated, the resolution of this issue is ancillary to and dependent on the decision of the main appeal in No. 22766."

Appellant argues two points, (1) that the court had no jurisdiction over the action, hence the order appointing receivers is void and the costs of same cannot be assessed against the receivership assets but must be borne by the party which secured the void order;<sup>12</sup> (2) that, even if the appointment was not void, where "the party objecting to the receivership has the property restored on the merits, the general rule is that the receiver is not entitled to compensation out of the property but instead must look to the applicant for the receiver for such compensation."

[16] Our disposition of the appeal from the judgment reveals that the court had jurisdiction over the action and hence possessed incidental jurisdiction to appoint receivers pursuant to the usages of equity (Code Civ.Proc., § 564, subds. 3, 4; Bowles v. Superior Court, 44 Cal.2d 574, 584, 283 P.2d 704).

[17] The affirmance of that judgment precludes the possibility of restoration of the property to appellant upon the merits and renders any discussion of the contrary hypothesis wholly unnecessary. However, we suggest in that connection that the allowance to receivers on a monthly basis was made "pending the further order of this court." Mr. Allen testified: "I do not feel that a court setting a salary is bound, after the event, to maintain that salary longer. We would like to have some idea of what we are being paid"; and counsel for the receivers say in their brief: "It should be remembered that permitting the receivers to look to the fund in the first instance and as between themselves and the parties, does not necessarily settle the ultimate incidence of liability for the receivership costs and expenses. These may be allocated against all or some of the parties in accordance with the circumstances and the purpose of bringing about a fair result. That, however, is a matter which need not—indeed, probably cannot—be reached until the receivership has been finally disposed of." We agree that affirmance of the order, phrased as it is, does not control the future action of the court upon the matter of receivers' compensation.

12. Apparently the receivers were appointed on the court's own motion in order to protect the assets pending appointment of a successor trustee.

Multiplicity of Appeals

[18] The notice of appeal from the judgment, and the whole thereof, adds the words "including the Minute Order of the above entitled Court entered on October 24, 1956, signed on the 7th day of December, 1956 and entitled 'Interlocutory Judgment' and all preliminary orders and rulings of said Court in the above entitled action to the Supreme Court of the State of California." That minute order directs the "Attorney General to prepare the Interlocutory Judgment and Restraining Order"; hence the minute order is not appealable. Herrscher v. Herrscher, 41 Cal.2d 300, 304, 259 P.2d 901. The other matters mentioned in the omnibus clause of the notice are not appealable.

The notice of appeal from the order allowing compensation to the receivers specifies both the formal order and the minute order which preceded it. That appeal was heretofore dismissed by this court so far as it relates to the minute order.

The judgment and the Order Approving, Settling and Allowing Report and First Account Current of Receivers, Fixing Compensation of Receivers, etc., are affirmed. All other appeals are dismissed.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Aug. 19, 1958.

Hearing Denied Oct. 15, 1958.

Defendant was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon and from a judgment and order denying a new trial in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, Walter Carpeneti, J., the defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Fred B. Wood, J., held that the evidence sustained conviction as against claim of self-defense; that error in cross-examination of character witnesses of the defendant was not prejudicial; that it was not error to refuse defendant right to testify as to his own state of mind; and that the prosecutor was not guilty of prejudicial misconduct.

329 P.2d—9½

1. Assault and Battery §92

Evidence sustained conviction of assault with a deadly weapon as against claim that defendant acted in self-defense. West's Ann.Pen.Code, §§ 195, subd. 2, 197, subds. 2, 3, 692, 693.

2. Witnesses §274(1)

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, questions to character witness of the defendant concerning his arrest for liquor violations may be proper if showing the extent of the witness' familiarity with the defendant's reputation. West's Ann. Bus. & Prof.Code, § 23000 et seq.

3. Witnesses §274(2)

Even if the crimes charged have no relevance to the character trait testified to by character witness for the defendant; his knowledge of community rumors concerning an arrest of defendant would be relevant to his qualifications to speak on the defendant's reputation.

4. Witnesses §280

Where character witnesses for defendant were asked whether they "knew" of the arrests of defendant for liquor violations, questions were improper in form, since inquiry is general talk about the defendant and not truth of the rumors.

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, improper form of questions to character witnesses for the defendant was not prejudicial under the circumstances.

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, statements of defendant attempting to testify as to victim's state of mind in attempting to kill the defendant were properly excluded.

8. Criminal Law Ⓒ1170(4)

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, refusing to permit defendant to testify on direct examination as to his own state of mind was not prejudicial where the pertinent question whether the defendant was afraid of the victim was asked and answered without objection during the direct examination.

9. Criminal Law Ⓒ715

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, that the prosecutor in a court demonstration apparently attached arrows to an inspector's suit to show the bullet holes and had him stand as if he had one knee on the bar and fall down and roll over to attempt to show that the victim was shot at least twice while on the floor, was not improper.

10. Criminal Law Ⓒ814(17)

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, refusing instructions on circumstantial evidence was not prejudicial where the only evidence that could be characterized as "circumstantial" was whether the defendant shot the victim while lying on the floor.

11. Assault and Battery Ⓒ96(3)

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, giving instructions that privilege of defense ends when danger ends and that a person is not justified in using a deadly weapon in self-defense under certain circumstances was proper where the instructions embodied the prosecution's theory and found support in evidence.

12. Criminal Law Ⓒ829(5)

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, refusing an instruction respecting an assault made only with the hands or fists and right to resist the attack with whatever force would be deemed necessary was not prejudicial in view of the instructions given.

13. Criminal Law Ⓒ772(2)

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, failure to give an instruction taining definition of assault was proper as unnecessary.

14. Criminal Law Ⓒ781(1)

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, failure to give an instruction that oral admissions of a party should be viewed with caution was not error under the circumstances.

Gregory Stout, San Francisco, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., Clarence A. Linn, Asst. Atty. Gen., Raymond M. Momboisse, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

FRED B. WOOD, Justice.

Charged with an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill, defendant was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon and sentenced to one year in the county jail. In support of his appeal he claims insufficiency of the evidence, errors in the examination of witnesses, errors in the giving and refusing of instructions to the jury, and misconduct of the prosecutor.

I. Is the Evidence Sufficient?

[1] Defendant claims that he acted in self-defense and that the preponderance of the evidence demonstrates that he acted reasonably in defending himself.

"Lawful resistance to the commission of a public offense may be made * * * by the party about to be injured." Pen. Code, § 692. "Resistance sufficient to prevent the offense may be made by the party about to be injured: * * * 1. To prevent an offense against his person, or his family, or some member thereof. * * *" Pen. Code, § 693. See also Pen. Code, § 195, subd. 2, and § 197, subds. 2 and 3.

John Mahan, the victim, was employed by the defendant as a relief bartender. On June 22, Mahan came to work between 11:30 and 12:00 o'clock. At about 1:30 or 2:00 he called defendant, saying he would like to "terminate". Defendant appeared between 4:00 and 4:30. He told Mahan he could have his check later in the evening.

Mahan testified that he returned around 10 o'clock. Defendant gave him the check. Mahan complained that it was $5.50 short. Defendant said they would fix it later. After first refusing, defendant cashed the check. Mahan then asked to be paid for overtime. Defendant said he would pay Mahan later. Then he took out $15 and offered it to Mahan. Mahan said he owed much more. Defendant put out another $15. Mahan said, "Mike, that isn't going to do it. * * * You owe me at least $50 or $60." Defendant asked if Mahan would take a check, and Mahan agreed. Defendant opened a drawer of the cash register, turned around and shot Mahan. Mahan remembered being hit in the shoulder, and heard the report of a gun while he was lying on the floor. Mahan then got up and walked out.

Dr. Jew examined Mahan at the Mission Emergency Hospital in the early morning hours of June 23, and found that five bullets had been fired into Mahan, producing eight holes with two bullets remaining in the body.

The defense witnesses had more colorful descriptions of the encounter. Robert Batchelder testified that he was in the bar on the evening of June 22, 1956. Mahan came in shortly after eleven, got the check and demanded it be cashed. Mahan said to defendant, "What the hell good is this Goddamn check? I want my money," wadded up the check and threw it over the back of the bar. When the defendant bent down to pick up the check, Mahan raised his hand and struck a blow. The witness could not tell from his vantage point whether he actually hit the defendant or not. Defendant then agreed to cash the check. He bought drinks for a number of patrons, including Mahan, and the argument subsided. Then Mahan demanded payment for overtime work. After a momentary lull, Mahan "jumped up, and with one leg upon the bar he grabbed for the defendant and said, 'I'll kill you * * *.'" Defendant backed away, took out the gun "which didn't seem to scare Mr. Mahan at this particular time, as he kept coming, and then he [defendant] began firing."

John J. Toomey was also at the bar on June 22, 1956. His account of the events of the evening was substantially the same as Mr. Batchelder's except that he testified Mahan reached over the bar to grab defendant, and had not started up over the bar. James Lynch testified that immediately before the shooting, Mahan was "on top of the rail" and threatened defendant's life.

Defendant testified to the same arguments and threats, that Mahan actually struck him in the face when he bent down to pick up the check and that immediately before he got the gun, Mahan had grabbed him around the necktie and shirt.

Defendant argues that the evidence preponderates in favor of the theory that he shot Mahan in self-defense. It is not clear whether his conclusion is that the judgment should be reversed on that ground or is merely a preliminary argument to establish the premise that any error occurring at the trial was prejudicial. It is clear that there was sufficient evidence in Mahan's testimony to support the verdict, even though numerically more witnesses supported defendant's version of the incident. The prejudicial effect of any errors occurring at the trial will be considered in conjunction with the alleged errors.

Defendant argues that there is no evidence in the record that defendant shot Mahan while he was lying on the floor "so that the evidence to support appellant's conviction is legally insufficient." The evidence would be sufficient to support defendant's conviction without evidence that defendant shot Mahan while he was on the floor if Mahan's testimony concerning what happened before he found himself on the floor is to be believed. Moreover, there is clear circumstantial evidence indicating defendant kept on shooting after Mahan was immobilized. Mahan testified he heard one shot after he was on the floor although he did not feel himself being hit after the first wound. The gun had five spent shells in it when the police took it from defendant. Five bullets had struck Mahan. If Mahan's testimony that he heard one shot while he was lying on the floor is believed, it is clear that defendant shot him at least once while he was on the floor.

II. Asserted Errors In the Examination of Witnesses

Several witnesses testified that the defendant had a good reputation for peace and quiet. Defendant assigns error in the allowance of certain questions asked of these witnesses upon cross-examination.

In respect to the cross-examination of the witness Gasland, the following appears:

"Q. * * * Were you familiar with the fact that there had been several arrests of the defendant at the premises for violation of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act [Bus. & Prof. Code, § 23000 et seq.], which was the act under which you were employed—Are you familiar with that? A. I am.

"Q. Would the fact that the defendant in 1946 and 1953 had been convicted of staying open after hours, selling to minors, would that in any way affect your judgment as to defendant's reputation for peace and quiet in the community? A. At that time I was not in the San Francisco District and was not familiar with the charges.

"Q. No. I say, if you had known those facts, would those facts affect your judgment as to what the defendant's reputation in the community is for peace and quiet?

"Mr. Skillin: Wait a minute. Did you say he was arrested for selling to minors?

"Mr. Berman: That is correct * *

"Mr. Skillin: He was never arrested for selling to minors, so we object to that question on the ground that it states facts not in evidence, and not correct. [Here follow several questions establishing the content of several sections of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act.]

"Q. Had you been aware of the fact that this defendant had been arrested for these offenses, would that have affected your judgment as to his reputation in the community for peace and quiet?

"Mr. Duane: We will object to that question on the grounds that it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial; argumentative; calling for the opinion and conclusion of the witness.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"Mr. Duane: There is no evidence here that he was convicted."

Character witness Senn testified that he was familiar with the arrest for these offenses, and without objection was asked whether that fact affected his estimate of defendant's reputation for peace and quiet. The witness said no. Then,

"Q. Did you ever familiarize yourself with whether the Ensign Cafe, No. 1 Market Street, was a hangout for homosexuals?

"Mr. Skillin: Wait a minute. The question is objected to as assuming facts not in evidence, incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and not proper cross-examination.

"Mr. Berman: I think it has to do with the question of peace and quiet.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"Mr. Duane: There is no evidence before this Court that that place was a hangout for homosexuals. * * *

"The Witness: A. There has been homosexuals in the place, that I believed were homosexuals—I have been in there on various times, as I have been into most bars on the Embarcadero.

"Mr. Berman: Q. Knowing that fact, did that in any way affect your judgment as to the reputation of the defendant for peace and quiet? A. No,—because the Embarcadero has got a few homosexuals on it."

Character witness Koryell was asked by the prosecutor: "You are familiar that there had been some trouble in Mr. Caldaralla's cafe over a number of years? A. Yes. Q. Didn't that affect your judgment of his reputation for peace and quiet? A. Considering the time I was down there, he was in very little trouble, considering he had been on the waterfront for many years." No objections were interposed during the examination of this witness.

The witness Kruger was asked by the cross-examiner: "As a matter of fact, you knew that the bar there had been in difficulties through 1946 to 1953, during that period of time?" The line of questioning continued, without the mention of specific offenses. No objection was made.

Witness Lang was asked by the prosecutor: "Q. Are you familiar with the fact that arrests had been made of the defendant at the premises there at No. 1 Market Street?" The witness stated he was not, and that if he had, this would not affect his opinion as to defendant's reputation for peace and quiet. No objections were made by defense counsel.

The witness Moriarity was asked: "Q. You knew the defendant had been arrested for maintaining a bar and selling liquor after hours, did you not?" The witness replied he did know this, and it would not affect his opinion as to defendant's reputation for peace and quiet. No objection was made to the foregoing question. The witness was also asked without objection whether he knew the defendant was charged with selling liquor to minors.

It is possible that allowance of the questions concerning the arrests, even if deemed error, did not operate prejudicially. The question was asked and answered twice by Mr. Gasland before objection was made by defense counsel. Any damage that could have been done by the questions was probably fully accomplished then. However, on the possibility that repetition could do more harm, the problem of error will be discussed.

Respondent's counsel does not mention the questions concerning homosexuals frequenting the bar, apparently conceding these to be improper. He also apparently concedes that keeping a bar open after hours, or serving to minors, indicate only that defendant was not always a law-abiding citizen. However, respondent argues that being a law-abiding citizen has relevance to a reputation for "peace and quiet."

Two cases cited by respondent, Weakley v. State, 168 Ark. 1087, 273 S.W. 374, 377 and State v. Lindsey, Mo., 7 S.W.2d 253, 254, do equate "peace and quiet" with "law-abiding." Both involved convictions for second degree murder. In the first, the court held it was proper to question the witness about his knowledge of drinking parties for boys sponsored by the defendant. The witness had previously testified that he had never known the defendant to be in any trouble except for his drinking, and the questions concerning his knowledge of the parties could be impeachment of this statement. In the second case, the court held it was error, when witnesses had testified to defendant's reputation for peace and quiet, to fail to give instructions on good character.

There appear to be no cases in California directly holding that "peace and quiet" is equivalent to "law-abiding." There is language in People v. Burwell, 44 Cal.2d 16, 279 P.2d 744, which indicates that "peace and quiet" means an absence of violence and quarrelsomeness, not merely law-abiding: "This defendant chose to put in issue his reputation for peace and quiet, and the people had the right to counter this showing by evidence indicating an unruly and violent disposition, and to impeach the testimony of his own witnesses." 44 Cal.2d at page 35, 279 P.2d at page 754. See also People v. Moran, 144 Cal. 48, 62, 77 P. 777, implying that vagrancy is not relevant to peace and quiet.

It appears that respondent misconceives the import of People v. Logan, 41 Cal.2d 279, 286, 260 P.2d 20. In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon and robbery, it was held proper to ask character witnesses on cross-examination whether they had heard of the defendant being arrested, and whether they had heard that he had been convicted of assault and battery. The witnesses had previously testified to defendant's good reputation for peace and quiet. Apparently the assault and battery arrest, which would be relevant to a reputation for peace and quiet, was the only subject of the questioning. Respondent states in his brief that the witness was asked "whether or not they had heard that he had had a little trouble." This was not the question. It was the response made by the character witness.

and truthfulness and "for being a law-abiding citizen." Four witnesses were asked whether they had heard that the defendant was arrested for receiving stolen goods in 1920, twenty-seven years before the trial. The court held this was not reversible error. The opinion first discusses the relevancy of the entire subject of character, and the countervailing considerations of prejudice and confusion that might result from opening the inquiry, setting forth the rules concerning putting character in issue. But once the defendant puts it in issue, "his own witness is subject to cross-examination as to the contents and extent of the hearsay on which he bases his conclusions, and he may be required to disclose rumors and reports that are current even if they do not affect his own conclusion. It may test the sufficiency of his knowledge by asking what stories were circulating concerning events, such as one's arrest, about which people normally comment and speculate." 69 S.Ct. at page 220. Concerning impeachment of the witness' qualifications to speak on the reputation of the defendant, the court said: "The inquiry as to an arrest is permissible also because the prosecution has a right to test the qualifications of the witness to bespeak the community opinion. If one never heard the speculations and rumors in which even one's friends indulge upon his arrest, the jury may doubt whether he is capable of giving any very reliable conclusions as to his reputation." 69 S.Ct. at page 222.

[4] Thus, even if the crimes charged had no relevance to the character trait testified to by the witness, his knowledge of the community rumors concerning an arrest would always be relevant to his qualifications to speak on the defendant's reputation. Therefore, the subject of the questions here appear to be proper. But they were not properly put. The witnesses were all asked whether they knew of the arrests, an improper form of the question since the inquiry is general talk about the defendant, not the truth of the rumors. Michelson v. United States, supra, at 69 S.Ct. 221; see also People v. McDaniel, 59 Cal.App.2d 672, 676, 140 P.2d 88; and People v. Neal, 85 Cal.App.2d 765, 770, 194 P.2d 57.

[5] The form of the question was improper; the subject was not. The question of prejudice is a difficult one. On the one hand, the case was a close one in that both the defense and the prosecution had plausible accounts of the events of the evening. It might well be concluded that any improperly introduced derogatory information about the defendant, no matter how remote, would be sufficient to swing the balance toward conviction. On the other hand, the charges on which defendant had previously been arrested were very remote from the essentials of the crime charged in this trial, could have been brought about by a momentary lapse of memory or attention and should have been given very little weight by the jury. They were not such as to arouse the passions of the jury against the defendant. Although generally in a close case any error may be sufficient to require a reversal, the peculiarly innocuous nature of the errors in this case would not seem to. Moreover, the information was first put before the jury without objection. The same could be said of the questions concerning homosexuals frequenting the bar, which the respondent does not discuss. A bar is a public place, and the officer who was asked this question testified that this information would not affect his judgment concerning the reputation of the defendant for peace and quiet, "because the Embarcadero has got a few homosexuals on it."

B. Impeachment of the witness Toomey.

[6] Toomey was questioned concerning certain statements he had made to Inspector Shelley. The prosecutor asked: "At that time, isn't it true that you told the police that at all times both Mr. Mahan's feet were on the floor?" Mr. Duane: Wait a minute. I think if the witness is being interrogated by a paper which Mr. Berman has in his hand, we are entitled to see the paper." The court did not require the prosecutor to produce the paper for inspection by the witness and defense counsel.

Code of Civil Procedure, section 2052 provides: "A witness may also be impeached by evidence that he has made, at other times, statements inconsistent with his present testimony; but before this can be done the statements must be related to him, with the circumstances of times, places, and persons present, and he must be asked whether he made such statements, and if so, allowed to explain them. If the statements be in writing, they must be shown to the witness before any question is put to him concerning them." Defendant does not complain of the failure to show the witness the statement at the time defense counsel asked for it, on the authority of People v. Jones, 160 Cal. 358, 365, 117 P. 176, 179, where the court held that it was proper to ask the witness, "'Did you not testify that you did not know the man until later, at the preliminary examination?'" before a foundation for impeachment was laid. The court's theory was that such questions are not necessarily impeaching questions. "Frequently such questions may be properly asked upon collateral matters, where the answer would bind the questioner without right to impeach. Frequently they are designed to test the recollection of the witness, and frequently, as in the instance before us, the question is proper, though ultimately, and according to the answer which may be made to it, it will or will not be followed by a strictly impeaching question." 160 Cal. at page 365, 117 P. at page 179.

However, defendant does complain that "because of the prosecutor's failure to complete his impeachment of the witness by the introduction into evidence of testimony relative to what Toomey said immediately after the shooting, either by stipulation or by means of either Inspectors Shelley or Asdrubale, error occurred." Respondent cites People v. Ellena, 67 Cal.App. 683, 691, 228 P. 389, which held in that particular instance, the failure to complete the impeachment was not prejudicial, and did not show bad faith on the part of the prosecutor.

Here, there was no purpose in calling the inspectors to testify that the witness made the statements claimed because they were not impeaching, but consistent with the testimony at the trial, as the witness explained. On the examination in chief, the witness did not testify as to the position of Mahan's extremities immediately before the shooting began. On cross-examination, the witness was asked, "When you saw that happen [Mahan reaching out to grab the defendant], where were Mr. Mahan's feet? A. Well, I couldn't see his feet, but I surmise from where he was he must have had them on the rail." He was then asked whether he saw Mahan's knee on the bar, and the witness explained that other persons were obstructing his view. After the witness confirmed that he was twice interviewed by the police, he was asked, "At that time [the first interview after the shooting], isn't it true that you told the police that at all times both Mr. Mahan's feet were on the floor? * * * Isn't it true that you told the police at that time that the only thing that was on the bar at the time he was shot were his hands, not his feet, not his knees, but just his hands? A. I don't recall that. Q. Well, specifically, were you asked this question, to which you gave this answer: * * * 'Q. Did he have his hands, knees, or feet on the bar? A. Well, maybe his hands.' * * * A. Well, he could still have his hands and be inclined over the bar. * * Q. But at no time did you see his knee on the bar? A. Well, my view was obstructed. There were other people in the way. I could see a portion of his waist coming on the bar." Giving the prosecution the benefit of the doubt, the answer previously given to Inspector Shelley was ambiguous. The witness explained the ambiguity, removing its impeaching effect. There would seem to be no point in producing the Inspector to testify that the question and answer were actually given in that situation.

C. Examination of the defendant.

Defendant complains that it was error "to refuse to him the right to testify as to his own state of mind," relying on People v. Sonier, 113 Cal.App.2d 277, 278, 248 P.2d 155, 156. There, the court held it was error to sustain an objection to the question, "'Q. Mr. Sonier, were you in fear that you would receive serious bodily injury from the shoe rest if you did not take some action against the complaining witness?'"

The following interrogation appears to be the one to which the complaint relates:

"Q. Well, tell us his position. A. Yes, well, he come in the bar, he have one foot on the bar and the left leg right on top of the bar there. * * * And he tried to come behind the bar, and the only way I could protect my life, to stop him, was—

"Mr. Berman: Just a moment. I object to that and ask that it be stricken out.

"The Court: That may go out. * * *

"The Witness: If he get behind that bar I wouldn't be here to make a statement.

"Mr. Berman: Just a minute. I ask that he be stricken out, and that the witness be admonished to respond to the questions only. I ask that the answer be stricken out.

"Mr. Duane: Tell us what he did. * * * A. He jumped on top of the bar and I try to talk to him, but it didn't do me no good.

"Mr. Berman: I ask that be stricken out.

"The Court: That may go out.

"The Witness: A. So, to protect myself and my life,—

"Mr. Berman: I ask that that be stricken out.

"The Court: That may go out.

"Mr. Berman: I ask that the interrogation of this witness be conducted in question-and-answer fashion.

"The Court: I think that is best, Mr. Duane. * * *

"Mr. Duane: Q. Now, go ahead.
* * *

"The Witness: A. He come on top of the bar to kill me.

"Mr. Berman: I ask that that be stricken out.

"The Court: That may go out.
* * *

"A. Now, what can I do? What else? I wouldn't be here if I don't protect myself.

"Mr. Berman: I ask that that be stricken out. * * *

"The Court: * * * You can only answer the questions. You can't give your opinion and conclusion.
* * *

"Q. Now, what happened next?
* * * A. Well, he want to kill me.

"The Court: Just a moment. The objection is overruled. * * *

"Q. He grabbed you by the necktie? A. He grabbed me by this way, and I pull.

"Q. You pulled back? A. I pulled back. And I said, 'Don't jump behind this bar, because I am going to kill you,' and he jumped on top of the bar, and the only way I could do to protect myself—

"Mr. Berman: I ask that that be stricken out.

"The Court: That may go out."

After testimony about taking the gun out of the cash register, the following occurred: "Q. How many shots did you fire? A. I don't remember. I was scared, frightened. I don't remember how many times I shot. * * * Q. And you were afraid of him [complainant], were you? * * * A. Yes, I am afraid."

On cross-examination, the following questions and answers pertaining to defendant's state of mind were given:

"Q. You were aiming at him, too?
A. No, I just got the gun, I was frightened, I just kept on shooting.
* * *

"Q. So it was your intention to kill him if he jumped over the bar? A. To protect my life, yes. Me and him have come to the point it was me or him.

"Q. That's it, and when you fired the gun you intended to kill him, didn't you? A. To protect myself."

[7, 8] The witness was clearly in error in attempting to testify as to Mahan's state of mind. ("He come on top of the bar to kill me"; "Well, he want to kill me.") The protestations that his actions were "to protect himself" were conclusionary statements and not responsive to the questions. Moreover, he was allowed without objection to so testify on cross-examination. The pertinent question, whether he was afraid of Mahan, was asked and answered without objection during the direct examination. There appears to be no error in the court's ruling.

III. Was the Prosecutor Guilty of Prejudicial Misconduct?

Defendant asserts misconduct in respect to certain matters heretofore discussed, the attempted impeachment of witness Toomey, and the cross-examination of the character witnesses. He argues that it was misconduct to argue to the jury that Mahan was shot while lying on the floor. As discussed above, there was support in the evidence for such argument. He also objects to the use of Inspector Shelley as an illustrative exhibit during the argument.

[9] The prosecutor apparently attached arrows to Mr. Shelley's suit to show the bullet holes, had him stand as if he had one knee on the bar, and fall down and roll over to attempt to show that Mahan was shot at least twice while on the floor. No objection was made to this demonstration at the time. Appellant cites no case holding such a demonstration erroneous.

In People v. Mullen, 115 Cal.App.2d 340, 345, 252 P.2d 19, it was held proper for the prosecutor, during the course of the argument, to show that a knife introduced into evidence fitted a hole in the victim's shirt which was admitted into evidence. In People v. Freeman, 107 Cal. App.2d 44, 53, 236 P.2d 396, 402, it was held not prejudicial error to light matches and throw them toward the back of the courtroom to illustrate that matches so thrown would continue to burn. "The experiment was made for illustrative purposes, no claim was made that the conditions were the same, and no prejudicial error appears." In People v. Glenn, 96 Cal.App.2d 859, 867, 216 P.2d 457, the court held it was proper to use a chart of the 12 alleged thefts for purposes of illustration in the argument. (The court relies on the following language from People v. Kynette, 15 Cal.2d 731, 757, 104 P.2d 794, 808: "Counsel may illuminate his argument by illustrations which may be as various as the resources of his talents." The language is not actually in point, for "illustrations" in People v. Kynette referred to similes and verbal illustrations, not pictures.)

It appears that it was proper to use the inspector as an illustration, and less expensive than a mannequin or a series of pictures.

IV. Were Errors Committed In the Giving and Refusing of Instructions?

[10] Defendant contends that CALJIC No. 28 should have been given: "When the case which has been made out by the People against a defendant rests entirely or chiefly on circumstantial evidence, and in any case before the jury may find a defendant guilty basing its finding solely on such evidence, each fact which is essential to complete a chain of circumstances that will establish the defendant's guilt must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt."

In People v. Watson, 46 Cal.2d 818, 831, 299 P.2d 243, where the evidence was all circumstantial, it was held error not to give CALJIC No. 28, but not prejudicial error because the jury was instructed on reasonable doubt (CALJIC No. 21), the applicable law when evidence is susceptible of two constructions (CALJIC No. 26), and the principle that circumstantial evidence must be inconsistent with any other rational hypothesis (CALJIC No. 27). Here, the jury was given an instruction on reasonable doubt which was substantially the same as CALJIC No. 21, with the additional sentence that the presumption of innocence "attaches at every stage of the case and to every fact essential to a conviction" (CALJIC No. 26 and CALJIC No. 27). If the omission of CALJIC No. 28 is not prejudicial when all the evidence is circumstantial, it would clearly not be prejudicial here where the only evidence that could be characterized as "circumstantial" is whether or not defendant shot while Mahan was lying on the floor.

[11] Defendant objects to the giving of CALJIC No. 625a stating that the privilege of defense ends after the danger ends and CALJIC No. 626 (a person is not justified in using a deadly weapon in self-defense "if he is assaulted with fists, but without intent to kill or do great bodily harm, and if the assault is not likely to produce great bodily injury and if the one thus attacked is not deceived as to the character of the assault"). These instructions embodied the prosecution's theory of the case, and find support in the evidence. No error appears in giving them.

[12] Defendant contends that CALJIC No. 626a should have been given: "However, although an assault may be made with only hands or fists, yet the force used may be such as is likely to produce great bodily injury, and in such a case the person attacked may resist the attack with whatever force would be deemed necessary by a reasonable person in the same or a similar situation. A person who thus resists such an attack is not guilty of assault in so doing." The jury was given the following instruction before they began their deliberations: "You are instructed that for a man to avail himself of his right of self-defense, it is not necessary that he shall be in actual danger of death or of receiving great bodily harm. It is sufficient that appearances on the part of his adversary were such as to arouse in his mind, as a reasonable man, that he was about to suffer death or great bodily harm. He may act upon such appearances with safety, and if without fault or carelessness he is misled concerning them, and defends himself correctly, according to what he supposes the facts to be, he is justified, although they were in truth otherwise, and though you should further find or believe from the evidence that he was mistaken in his judgment as to such actual necessity at such time and really had no occasion for the use of extreme measures. If you believe from the evidence here that the defendant acted in self-defense from real and honest conviction as to the character of the danger induced by the existence or reasonable circumstances, or if you have a reasonable doubt as to his [sic] whether he did or did not, then it will be your duty to find that his said act was justifiable, even though you might further believe from the evidence that he was mistaken as to the extent of the danger, and it would then be your duty to find him not guilty." The jurors returned for further instructions and CALJIC No. 626a was given to them.

[13] Defendant also contends that CALJIC No. 601, the definition of assault, should have been given as applied to Mahan. This would appear to be unnecessary.

[14] Defendant complains of the failure to give an instruction that oral admissions of a party should be viewed with caution. The court did not instruct on admissions and the jury could have given effect to defendant's prior statements only as impeachment. Moreover, it was stipulated that the "questions asked of the witness Caldaralla by myself [the prosecutor], and the answers given as read by myself [the prosecutor], were questions asked by Inspector Asdrubale of Mr. Caldaralla, and those were the answers that he gave on the night of June 22nd and the morning of June 23rd at Southern Police Station, with the various people present."

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Division 3, California.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing
Sept. 12, 1958.

Hearing Denied Oct. 22, 1958.

Action by manufacturer to enjoin former employee, presently working for competitor and competitor, from using certain machinery which was a trade secret of manufacturer and for damages. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Harold C. Shepherd, J., entered judgment enjoining former employee and competitor and they appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Nourse, J. pro tem., held that evidence sustained finding that former employee, a disabled veteran who was being given on job training by manufacturer, upon termination of employment disclosed to competitor, manufacturer's trade secrets, but judgment would be modified to limit provisions of injunction.

Judgment as modified, affirmed.

I. Injunction ¶128

In proceedings to enjoin former employee and plaintiff's competitor from using trade secret of plaintiff, evidence sustained finding that former employee, a disabled war veteran undergoing on-job training at plaintiff's plant under contract with Veterans Administration, did, upon leaving employment, become employed by competitor to which he disclosed plaintiff's trade secret. 38 U.S.C.A. § 701; Veterans' Regulation No. 1(a), pt. 7, 38 U.S.C.A. following section 745.

2. Master and Servant ⇨60

Where disabled employee was given on-job training with manufacturer under terms of contract with Veterans Administration, irrespective of whether there was an express agreement upon employee's part, duty was implied in contract of employment not to disclose trade secrets of manufacturer. 38 U.S.C.A. § 701; Veterans' Regulation No. 1(a), pt. 7, 38 U.S.C.A. following section 745.

3. Master and Servant ⇨60

Every employee is under implied obligation not to divulge or use confidential information which he acquires by reason of his employment as such information is property of employer, and employee holds that property in trust for employer and cannot use it in violation of his trust.

4. Trusts ⇨101

Where employee, upon termination of employment with manufacturer, entered into employment with manufacturer's competitor and disclosed manufacturer's trade secrets, since former employee could not use or divulge trade secrets of manufacturer without violating his trust, competitor could not with knowledge of that trust, make use of manufacturer's secrets and when it attempted to do so it became a constructive trustee of that property.

5. Master and Servant ⇨60

Employee procuring on-job training from employer having contract with Veterans Administration, upon completion of training, may use in his trade all of the skills that have been taught to him but may not so use those skills as to violate his trust with respect to employer's trade secrets. 38 U.S.C.A. § 701; Veterans' Regulation No. 1(a), pt. 7, 38 U.S.C.A. following section 745.

6. Master and Servant ⇨60

It is not necessary in order that a process of manufacture be a trade secret that it be patentable or be something that could not be discovered by others by their own labor and ingenuity.

7. Master and Servant ⇨60

Character of trade secret, if important to business, is not material but it must, as term implies, be kept secret by one who claims it.

8. Master and Servant ⇨60

Where employer before commencing development of certain machines attempted to learn of any machine which would produce the results he desired and which were being accomplished by a competitor, but was unable to find any machine or plans for them to guide him, and thereafter by system of trial and error was able by combining various parts to produce results desired, and means of producing results were embodied in machines which he developed, and these means he kept secret, such machines clearly constituted trade secrets which employee was bound not to divulge.

9. Injunction ⇨109

Where manufacturer brought action to enjoin competitor from using trade secrets embodied in machines which manufacturer's former employee disclosed to competitor, fact that manufacturer might have infringed upon a certain patent was a matter between manufacturer and patentee as was matter of whether manufacturer had appropriated another's trade name, and did not present matters of affirmative defense on behalf of competitor.

10. Injunction ⇨189

Where manufacturer's trade secrets embodied in machines for producing certain types of tape were disclosed to competitor by manufacturer's former employee, manufacturer's sole right was to a decree which would protect it against wrongful use of its trade secrets and it had no right to enjoin competitor from production through proper means of the articles which manufacturer's machines were designed to produce, and since evidence disclosed that others had assembled machines producing the same results as manufacturer's, competitors were free to acquire such machines and to use them in production in order to obtain same results as procured by manufacturer. Sherman Anti-Trust Act, §§ 1, 2, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1, 2.

11. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names and Unfair Competition ⇨93(3)

In manufacturer's action to enjoin competitor from using trade secrets embodied in manufacturer's machines and for other relief, evidence failed to sustain finding that picture used by competitor in brochure advertising product had acquired a secondary meaning in the minds of public indicating and designating manufacturer as source of products in connection with picture with which it was used.

12. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names and Unfair Competition ⇨71

In order that a name or symbol may be said to have acquired a "secondary meaning" and as such become property of person using it, it is necessary that it shall have been so used as to identify the articles, in connection with which it is used, in minds of purchasers thereof as product of person using the name or symbol.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Secondary Meaning".

13. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names and Unfair Competition ⇨93(3)

In manufacturer's action to enjoin competitor from using trade secrets embodied in machines and for other relief in connection with competitor's sale of products, evidence failed to disclose that competitor had sold their products under representation that they were the same as manufacturer's. NOURSE, Justice pro tem.

Defendants appeal from a judgment enjoining them from using, assembling, or manufacturing certain machinery which was a trade secret of the plaintiff; ordering them to dismantle the machines assembled by them that embodied plaintiff's trade secret and decreeing that the plaintiff is entitled to damages, both compensatory and punitive, to be fixed upon an accounting hereinafter to be had.

Prior to June of 1954 both the plaintiff and the defendants Gevirtz, doing business as copartners under the name of Printed Cellophane Tape Company, hereinafter called "Tape Company," had engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling pressure-sensitive adhesive tape for industrial uses.

In the spring of 1954 Homer G. Buck, one of the partners of plaintiff partnership, hereinafter called "Buck," learned that a competitor, whose manufacturing operations were conducted in the eastern United States, was manufacturing and selling overlapping masking discs and die-cut masks of pressure-sensitive tape for use by manufacturers in masking certain parts of apparatus which they desired to shield from abrasives or paint. Desiring to produce a similar product Buck commenced experiments for the purpose of constructing machines or apparatus which would produce die-cut masks and overlapping masking discs. While Buck was in the process of developing these machines the defendant Robert Black, hereinafter called "Black," entered plaintiff's employ as a part-time employee and rendered some aid to Buck in the assembly of the machines upon which Buck was working.

Black was a disabled veteran of World War II and was entitled to the benefits of Public Law 16, 78th Congress. 38 U.S.C.A. § 701; Veterans' Regulation No. 1(a), pt. 7, 38 U.S.C.A. following section 745. On May 1st plaintiff, hereinafter called "By-Buk," entered into a contract with the Veterans Administration under which it undertook to accept "from time to time and within its own discretion in each case, disabled veterans of World War II for a course of training on the job" which would render each employable as a "Die Maker (Steel Rule)."

By the contract it agreed to provide competent instruction to each trainee accepted. The agreement further provided that it might be terminated by the establishment or the Veterans Administration on 15 days' notice and that each veteran accepted for training would be under the control and supervision of By-Buk and subject to the same rules and regulations "governing the conduct of other comparable employees." (Italics ours.) On the same date Black entered plaintiff's employ to be trained as a die maker.

At about that time there was prepared on a form of the Veterans Administration a schedule of the skills in which Black was to be trained, the time allotted to instruction in each skill and a statement of the wages to be paid; the starting wage being $1.50 an hour and increasing in 6-month steps of $.25 an hour.<sup>1</sup> After May 1st Black continued to work with Buck on the assembling of the two machines and after their completion he operated the machines at times for the purpose of producing die-cut masks and overlapping discs. Buck, on several occasions both before and after May 1st, told Black that the processes of die-cutting masks and overlapping discs which were embodied in the machines were not to be disclosed to others and plaintiff at all times endeavored to prevent others from examining the machines and to keep its processes of producing the die-cut masks and overlapping discs secret.

Black continued in his employment with By-Buk until June 1954 and during the period of his employment By-Buk gave him training in the various skills which it had undertaken to teach him.

On June 30, 1954, Black terminated his employment with the plaintiff and in August entered the employ of defendant Tape Company. Upon entering the employ of Tape Company Black disclosed to Tape Company and defendants Gevirtz plaintiff's methods of producing die-cut masks and overlapping discs and, under their instructions, constructed two machines which were substantially copies of plaintiff's machines.

Upon the completion of these machines defendant Tape Company commenced the production of die-cut masks and overlapping discs and sold these articles to the trade in competition with the die-cut masks and overlapping discs produced by plaintiff. In producing these it used materials similar to those used by plaintiff. In its brochures sent to the trade in soliciting the sale of overlapping discs plaintiff had used a picture showing a roll of overlapping discs and the hands of a person removing the discs from the carrier tape. It advertised its overlapping discs under the name of Kwiky Dots. In its brochures defendant Tape Company used substantially the same picture of the hands removing the overlapping dots from the carrier as did the plaintiff<sup>2</sup> but gave its product the name of Pee-Cee Tapes.

[1] The court found the facts in substantial accordance with the facts we have stated. Each of the facts we have stated is supported by substantial evidence. Other findings of the trial court which are attacked by appellant will be noted later in our discussion of the case.

Under numerous headings defendants and amicus curiae attack the judgment of the trial court as impairing the purposes of the Veterans Administration training statutes and regulations (Public Law 16, and regulations adopted thereunder) and as being in contravention of the contract entered into by plaintiff with the Veterans Administration.

Boiled down, it is apparently defendants' contention that Black was not an employee of the plaintiff but that plaintiff had sought to teach him as a student its business and that therefore upon terminating his relationship with plaintiff he was entitled to put to use any knowledge that he had acquired of plaintiff's business and processes

1. By agreement this wage schedule was not strictly adhered to.

2. Defendants ceased the use of this picture prior to the commencement of the action.

of manufacturing. We see no merit in these contentions.

[2,3] Plaintiff's undertaking with the Veterans Administration was to train Black, as its employee, in certain skills in order that he might be qualified for employment as a die maker. By the express terms of the contract between plaintiff and the Veterans Administration any person employed by plaintiff and whom it agreed to train was subject to the same obligations, rules and regulations as any other employee. Irrespective of whether there was an express agreement on Black's part (which defendants and their amicus curiae in their brief choose to term a "secret agreement") not to divulge the means by which plaintiff was able to produce its die-cut masks and overlapping discs, that duty was implied in the contract of employment. Every employee is under the implied obligation not to divulge or use confidential information which he acquires by reason of his employment. Such information is the property of the employer and the employee holds that property in trust for the employer and cannot use it in violation of his trust. Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, 165 Cal. 95, 100-102, 130 P. 1180, 44 L.R.A., N.S., 1159; Riess v. Sanford, 47 Cal.App. 2d 244, 246-247, 117 P.2d 694; Stone v. Goss, 65 N.J.Eq. 756, 55 A. 736, 63 L.R.A. 344; Irving Iron Works v. Kerlaw Steel Flooring Co., 96 N.J.Eq. 702, 126 A. 291; 28 Am.Jur. § 111, p. 304. The proposition is well stated in the work last cited, as follows: "The disclosure by an employee of trade secrets and other confidential information obtained by him in the course of his employment is a breach of trust, and it is well settled that a court of equity will restrain any threatened disclosure or use thereof to the detriment of the employer. The character of the secrets, if peculiar and important to the business, is not material. They may be secrets of trade, secrets of title, secrets of process of manufacture, or any other secrets of the employer important to his business. * * *

"Injunctive relief against disclosures of trade secrets and other confidential information obtained by an employee is undoubtedly available to the employer, where the employee has expressly agreed not to disclose the trade or business secrets. Such an agreement is not an unlawful restraint of trade unless it is more extensive than is reasonably required to protect the master's interests. But an express negative covenant not to make use of trade secrets or processes is not indispensable to the granting of the relief. It is sufficient if from the circumstances of the case and the relation of the parties as employer and employee an agreement to that effect may be implied from the confidential relation. In fact, it is said that in the case of an employee such an obligation exists in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary."

[4,5] The obligation not to violate the duty of confidence, being implied by law, there was nothing secret about it. Knowledge of it was imputed to the Veterans Administration and if they desired to exempt a trainee from such obligation they undoubtedly would have expressed it in the contract. To express it, however, would be to defeat the very object of the contract for it is impossible to envision an employer who would accept an employee who was, in effect, licensed to steal its secrets. As Black could not use or divulge the secrets of plaintiff without violating his trust, Tape Company could not with knowledge of that trust make use of plaintiff's property (its secrets), and when it attempted so to do, it became a constructive trustee of that property. Irving Iron Works v. Kerlaw Steel Flooring Co., supra, Civ. Code, § 2243. There is no conflict between the federal statute providing for the training of disabled veterans in a trade and the law of this State which makes it the duty of an employee not to divulge the secrets of his employer. The employee under training may upon completing his training use, in his trade, all of the skills that have been taught him but may not so use those skills as to violate his trust.

The judgment here does not enjoin the defendant Black from using all of the skills which he learned under the training of By-

Buk. It only enjoins him from divulging the secrets of plaintiff which he acquired while being trained in the skills necessary to his contemplated trade.

Of the numerous cases cited by defendants and amicus curiae only two are even remotely in point. Young v. Hampton, 36 Cal.2d 799, 228 P.2d 1, 19 A.L.R.2d 830, cited by counsel is not controlling here. There the contract sought to be enforced by the plaintiff was one entered into in direct violation of a federal statute and if enforced would have defeated the very purposes of the statute. That is not the case here as we have heretofore pointed out.

In Orkin Exterminating Co. of South Ga. v. Dewberry, 204 Ga. 784, 51 S.E.2d 669, the plaintiff-employer sought to enforce, against an employee whom it accepted for on-the-job training, a contract by which the employee agreed not to engage in the trade or business as to which the plaintiff had undertaken to train him at any place in the State of Georgia excepting a very small portion thereof for a period of one year after the termination of his employment. The Supreme Court of Georgia properly held, not only that the contract was void as in restraint of trade, but, that its effect was to defeat the very purposes of the training contract. Such is not the case here. In the present case Black was free to, and under the express terms of the decree here, is permitted to, use all of the skills as to which he was trained by plaintiff. Plaintiff did not undertake to train Black to enter into the business of manufacturing and selling the articles which it was engaged in manufacturing and selling, but only to train him as a die maker. This trade he is free to follow.

[6] It was stipulated at the trial that all of the component parts of the machines developed by plaintiff were standard parts which could be procured by anyone in the open market and defendants therefore contend that the finding of the trial court that the machines were unique or unusual is unsupported by the evidence. In making this assertion defendants misconceive what constitutes a trade secret. It is not necessary in order that a process of manufacture be a trade secret that it be patentable or be something that could not be discovered by others by their own labor and ingenuity. Restatement, Torts, Vol. 4, section 757, Comment b, page 5, defines the term as follows: "A trade secret may consist of any formula, pattern, device or compilation of information which is used in one's business, and which gives him an opportunity to obtain an advantage over competitors who do not know or use it. * * * Generally it relates to the production of goods, as, for example, a machine or formula for the production of an article."

[7] The character of the secret if important to the business is not material but it must, as the term implies, be kept secret by the one who claims it. Riess v. Sanford, supra, 47 Cal.App.2d 244, 246, 117 P.2d 694; Restatement, Torts, Vol. 4, § 757, Comment b, pp. 5, 6.

[8] Under the evidence here plaintiff's machines clearly were trade secrets within the definition above quoted. The evidence shows that Buck, before commencing the development of the machines in question, attempted to learn of any machines which would produce the results which he desired, i. e., the same results which had been accomplished by an eastern competitor, but was unable to find any machines or plans for machines to guide him and that thereafter he, by a system of trial and error, was able, by combining various parts, to produce the results which he desired. The means of producing this result were embodied in the machines which he developed and these means he kept secret.

The evidence further shows without conflict that the defendant Tape Company did not and was unable to produce the products in question until, through the information divulged to it by Black, it copied plaintiff's machines. It is undoubtedly true that if Tape Company had used the same thought, labor and ingenuity which were used by plaintiff it might have been able to secure the same results that plaintiff did. But this fact does not destroy plaintiff's right not to have its processes wrongfully disclosed to others and used to its detriment. As said by the court in Herold v. Herold China & Pottery Co., 6 Cir., 257 F. 911, 913: "[S]ecret formulas and processes * * * are property rights which will be protected by injunction, not only as against those who attempt to disclose or use them in violation of confidential relations or contracts express or implied, but as against those who are participating in such attempt with knowledge of such confidential relations or contract, though they might in time have reached the same result by their own independent experiments or efforts." Or, as said by Mr. Justice Holmes in Board of Trade of City of Chicago v. Christie Grain & Stock Co., 198 U.S. 236, 25 S.Ct. 637, 639, 49 L.Ed. 1031: "The plaintiff has the right to keep the work which it has done, or paid for doing, to itself. The fact that others might do similar work, if they might, does not authorize them to steal the plaintiff's."

There is likewise no merit in defendant's claim that the trial court erred in permitting Buck to answer the question: "Were all these features that you have just testified to novel with you; in other words, were they new as far as you knew?" Defendants claim that the question of novelty was one to be determined upon the testimony of experts only and that the question called for expert testimony which the witness was unqualified to give.

We have not been cited to any authorities which hold that, in cases of this character, novelty can only be proven by expert testimony and in our opinion that is not the fact. It is further our opinion that novelty, in the sense that plaintiff's process was conceived by him and was unknown to others, was proven by the testimony of Buck as to his research and his trial and error methods of developing the machines in question. Further, the question did not call for any opinion of the witness as to whether or not the machines were novel, but only as to his knowledge as to the existence of like machines.

As an affirmative defense defendants pleaded in general terms that the plaintiff came into court with unclean hands and was therefore not entitled to equitable relief. The trial court found that the allegations of this affirmative defense were untrue. Defendants now assert that this finding is contrary to the evidence. They assert that the evidence established that plaintiff breached the contract between it and the Veterans Administration in failing, on May 1, 1954, to increase Black's pay to $2.00 per hour and that the evidence further showed without conflict that plaintiff had copied from the patent of a competitor, Hulslander, in producing and selling die-cut masks and overlapping discs and in that he had, by using the word "Kwiky" in connection with his product, appropriated a trade mark of another manufacturer (one Brady) who had for many years been using the registered name "Quik." Insofar as the breach by plaintiff of his contract with the Veterans Administration is concerned, it is sufficient to say: first, that the trial court found on conflicting evidence that the relationship between Black and the plaintiff was terminated by Black for the purpose of entering into another occupation; second, that under the contract with the government, Black was not obligated to stay in plaintiff's employ and that plaintiff was not obligated to continue with his training but might terminate his training at any time on 15 days' notice to the government. Further, plaintiff is not seeking to enforce the contract with the government or the contract of employment made with Black but is seeking only to restrain a tortious act of Black in wrongfully using plaintiff's property.

[9] As to the other acts which it is alleged render plaintiff's hands unclean, it is sufficient to say that they are entirely disconnected with the subject matter of this action or the injury which the decree of the trial court seeks to remedy. Whether plaintiff has infringed upon the patent of Hulslander (this patent does not cover any process or machinery for the production of die-cut masks or overlapping discs but only the products themselves) is a matter between plaintiff and Hulslander and the same is true as to the question of whether plaintiff has appropriated Brady's trade name. Any wrong done in either case was done to the owner of the patent or the trade mark and with these wrongs defendants have no concern. Bradley Co. v. Bradley, 165 Cal. 237, 131 P. 750; Germo Mfg. Co. of Missouri v. McClellan, 107 Cal.App. 532, 290 P. 534.

The defendants assert that the trial court erred in excluding evidence offered by the defendants that as of the time of trial defendants had made certain improvements and changes in the machines as originally built by them and which copied plaintiff's machines. They base their claim of error upon the proposition that equity acts upon conditions as they exist at the time of trial and not necessarily at the commencement of the action. There can be no doubt of the truth of the proposition stated but it is not applicable here for defendants cannot escape responsibility by showing that they have improved upon or modified plaintiff's process. Even though they may have modified or improved the plaintiff's process they are still wrongfully using its property. (See Restatement, Torts, Vol. 4, § 757, Comment c, p. 9.)

[10] Defendants assert that certain provisions of the decree are uncertain and so broad as to render the decree invalid as in restraint of trade in contravention of the Sherman Anti-trust Act (15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1, 2) and of the statutes of this State against contracts in restraint of trade. With this contention we are in agreement. Plaintiff's sole right was to a decree which would protect it against the wrongful use of its trade secrets. It had no right to enjoin the defendants from the production through proper means of the articles which its machines were designed to produce. It is clear from the evidence that others than the plaintiff had assembled machines which would produce the same results as plaintiff's and defendants were free to acquire such machines and to use them in the production of die-cut masks and overlapping discs and the court could not by decree limit this right. The decree here, however, enjoins plaintiffs from acquiring and using any machine which is similar to the machines manufactured and used by plaintiff irrespective of whether such machines may have been solely the product of the ingenuity of some third person and irrespective of the fact that such machines may have been manufactured and in use prior to the time plaintiff conceived his method of producing the articles in question.

The fact that the decree is too broad in its terms does not require a reversal of the judgment but only a modification of the injunctive provisions of the decree. What these modifications should be we will hereinafter indicate.

All of the assignments of error with which we have heretofore dealt concern the injunctive relief given by the decree. While there are other assignments of error addressed to the injunctive features of the decree which have not been discussed by us in detail, they are either covered by the assignments which we have disposed of or contain so little substance as not to require discussion.

The remaining assignments of error pertain only to those portions of the judgment which decree that the plaintiff is entitled to an accounting and to both compensatory and punitive damages.

We now address ourselves to these assignments of error.

The trial court found that the picture showing a roll of tape being unwound and discs detached therefrom by two hands, had acquired a secondary meaning in the minds of the buying public indicating and designating plaintiff as the source of the products in connection with which said picture appears. It further found that the defendants had sold substantially large quantities of die-cut masks and overlapping discs to customers and prospective customers of plaintiff as the same as plaintiff's product under a different name, and that the defendants patterned their entire scheme of doing business after that of plaintiff. As the court did not, by its decree, enjoin the defendants from the use of said picture or from the sale of any products other than those produced by the machines which defendants had wrongfully constructed as copies of plaintiff's, and as it did not enjoin the defendants from continuing their scheme of business, we assume that these findings were made as a basis for later assessing damages.

Asserting that none of these findings are supported by the evidence, defendants have, in conformance with the rules on appeal, directed our attention to the evidence bearing upon the issues thus found by the court. Plaintiff does not assert that there is other evidence than that specified by defendants except that it directs attention to excerpts from the testimony of the witness Jenkins and to plaintiff's Exhibit No. 14, the brochure adopted by the defendants, a copy of which is attached to the amended complaint as Exhibit No. 3. A careful study of the evidence to which our attention has been directed as well as our independent examination of the transcript of oral proceedings and the exhibits, fails to disclose any evidence which would support any of these findings.

[11, 12] The finding that the picture in question had acquired a "secondary meaning" finds no support in the evidence. In order that a name or a symbol may be said to have acquired a "secondary meaning" and as such become the property of the person using it, it is necessary that it shall have been so used as to identify the articles, in connection with which it is used, in the mind of the purchasers thereof as the product of the person using the name or symbol. Morse-Starrett Products Co. v. Steccone, D.C., 86 F.Supp. 796; Selchow & Righter Co. v. Western Printing & Lithographing

Co., 7 Cir., 142 F.2d 707; Restatement, Torts, Vol. 3, § 716, Comment b, p. 560.

Here the evidence shows without conflict that pictures of human hands being used to detach one material from another, had been used not only by defendants but others long prior to the use of such a device or symbol by the plaintiff. There was an entire lack of evidence that any members of the buying public associated the symbol with overlapping discs produced by the plaintiff or that the symbol was used for any other purpose than to show the facility with which the overlapping discs could be removed from the carrier tape and this would apply to such articles manufactured by other persons. The evidence shows, without conflict, that such discs had been manufactured by others than the plaintiff prior to his production and in fact that he developed the machines in question in order to produce overlapping discs similar to those that had theretofore been manufactured by another.

[13] The finding that defendants had sold their products under the representation that they were the same as plaintiff's has no foundation in the evidence. The defendants offered their goods as that of their own manufacture and under an entirely different name from that used by the plaintiff and the fact that defendants' goods were of the same design and to be used for the same purpose as plaintiff's does not, under the facts here, constitute any basis for an award of damages. The finding is, however, for practical purposes, immaterial for the defendants remain liable in damages for the sale of die-cut masks and overlapping discs produced by them by means of the machines which they constructed through the use of plaintiff's trade secrets.

The finding that the defendants "patterned their entire scheme of doing business after that of plaintiff" is without support in the evidence. The only evidence plaintiff points to is the brochure published by the defendants, but a comparison of this brochure with that of the plaintiff convincingly demonstrates that there was no copying by defendants and nothing in defendants' brochure that would enable them to palm off their goods as those of the plaintiff or which would lead any member of the buying public to believe that defendants' goods were the goods of, or the same as those of, the plaintiff.

It may be said in passing that the defendants have the right to produce die-cut masks and overlapping discs and to use in that production the same materials as used by the plaintiff so long as their production is by proper means and without the use of plaintiff's trade secrets and so long as they are not offered to the public in such a manner as to lead the buying public to believe that defendants' goods are those of the plaintiff. Die-cut masks and overlapping discs were not trade secrets of the plaintiff and the plaintiff had no property right in them as such.

The fact that the findings above mentioned are unsupported by the evidence does not require a reversal of the judgment inasmuch as the issue of damages is yet to be adjudicated.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, we substitute the following findings of fact for those made by the trial court:

Paragraph 8 of the findings is deleted and in lieu thereof we find:

"VIII. That on or about the 24th day of August, 1954, and in spite of such knowledge and in derogation of plaintiff's said rights, the defendants and each of them, acting in concert and for the benefit of defendants and not plaintiff, wrongfully, improperly and unlawfully copied and appropriated plaintiff's secrets pertaining to said machinery and equipment processes as included in all of the machines particularly described in Paragraph II hereof and in connection therewith defendant Black disclosed all of the details as to the methods of building and operating said machines.

"That during said period and thereafter defendants, through the use of the machines assembled by and containing the trade secrets of the plaintiff, produced and sold substantial quantities of die-cut masks and overlapping discs to customers and prospective customers of the plaintiff."

Paragraph 9 of the findings is deleted and in lieu thereof we find:

"IX. That it is untrue that the defendants have patterned their entire scheme of doing business after that of the plaintiff. That it is true that the defendants have used and distributed a sales brochure, a true and correct copy of which is attached to plaintiff's first amended complaint, marked Exhibit 3, but it is further true that the said brochure does not copy or simulate the brochure of the plaintiff and that the defendants did not thereby mislead the buying public or any member thereof."

Paragraph 10 of the findings is deleted and in lieu thereof we find:

"X. That the defendants and each of them will, unless enjoined, without the permission or consent of plaintiff and against plaintiff's will, appropriate to their own uses and purposes the machines and processes of manufacture described in Paragraph II of these findings, and plaintiff will suffer great and irreparable damage for which there is no adequate or speedy remedy at law."

The judgment appealed from is modified to read as follows:

"It is Now Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed

"1. Defendant Printed Cellophane Tape Company, a partnership, Sydney Gevirtz, Don Gevirtz and Robert Black, and each of them are ordered to dismantle the two machines constructed by them for the manufacture of overlapping discs and die-cutting masks and they, and each of them, are enjoined together with their agents, servants and employees, from rebuilding said machines or from disposing of any of said machines or machinery, or any machinery or equipment embodying the combination of ideas, structures, techniques or originalities of plaintiff or modification thereof or substitute therefor, except that the punch press units without the other features added thereto by defendants may be disposed of if defendants so desire; and, each of the defendants is forever enjoined from revealing to others the inventions and processes of plaintiff as contained in the machines so dismantled.

"2. The defendants Cellophane Tape Company, a partnership, Sydney Gevirtz, Don Gevirtz and Robert Black, and each of them is hereby permanently enjoined from manufacturing, using or placing in use, directly or indirectly, any and all machines substantially similar to the machines which they are, by Paragraph 1 of this decree, ordered to dismantle.

"3. Defendants Printed Cellophane Tape Company, a partnership, Sydney Gevirtz, Don Gevirtz and Robert Black, and each of them, are enjoined permanently from selling or disposing of any and all overlapping discs or die-cut discs heretofore manufactured and produced by the overlapping machine and die-cutting machine hereinbefore referred to.

"4. Defendants and each of them are ordered to give an account of all of the sales made by defendants of the products made on the overlapping machine and die-cutting machine heretofore described so that damages relating thereto may be determined.

"5. Plaintiff is entitled to a judgment awarding damages against the defendants and each of them, the total amount thereof to be determined following the accounting hereinbefore ordered.

"6. Plaintiff is entitled to a judgment awarding punitive damages against the defendants and each of them, the amount thereof to be determined following the accounting heretofore ordered.

"7. The defendant Robert Black is not enjoined from using any of the skill, knowledge or information obtained by him as to the making of dies, the use thereof, the operation of a punch press or other machine, which skill, knowledge or information was obtained by him while under training by the plaintiff, so long as his use thereof does not involve the use of the trade secrets of the plaintiff as to the manufacture or assembly of machines or devices for the production of overlapping discs or die-cut discs.

"8. Plaintiff is awarded its costs of suit incurred herein against the defendants and each of them in the amount of $596.85."

The judgment as above modified is affirmed. Each party to bear his own costs on appeal.

Albert TEITELBAUM et al., Defendants, Albert Teitelbaum, Defendant and Appellant.
Cr. 5926.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

Aug. 26, 1958.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 15, 1958.

Hearing Denied Oct. 22, 1958.

Prosecution for conspiracy to commit grand theft, attempted grand theft, and the filing of a false and fraudulent insurance claim, and for presentation of a false and fraudulent insurance claim. The Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Orlando H. Rhodes, J., entered judgment of conviction and denied defendants motion for a new trial, and defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Nourse, J. pro tempore, held that fact that during trial, conferences were held between court and counsel at the bench, and in chambers, did not mean that defendant was denied a public trial, since the term "public trial" as used in section of constitution guaranteeing right thereto, consists of proceedings for impanelment of the jury, opening statements of counsel, presentation of evidence, arguments, instructions to the jury, and return of the verdict, and not to questions of law which do not involve matters for consideration of the jury.

Order denying appellant's motion for new trial and judgment affirmed.

1. Grand Jury ☞8

Rule of Superior Court of County of Los Angeles pertaining to how the grand jury shall be drawn, was not in violation of the Code of Civil Procedure merely because it did not provide for the preparation of a list of qualified competent persons by a jury commissioner, or because the rule requires that a person nominated by a judge shall be personally known to him, in view of fact that the Code of Civil Procedure does not require preparation of a list of persons by a jury commissioner, but merely permits use of his services, and in view of fact that the Code of Civil Procedure does not require a prospective grand juror to be selected at random from the body of the county. West's Ann.Code Civ.Proc. §§ 198, 199, 204, 204a, 204b, 204d.

2. Grand Jury ☞40

Where during time grand jury was in session and considering evidence produced before it, as result of which it returned indictment against defendant, one of the grand jurors, during recess in the proceedings requested and secured certain documents, failure to include such documents in the record of the grand jury proceedings did not deprive defendant of his right to a full and complete transcript of all the proceedings before the grand jury in view of fact there is no proof that such document was a part of the record. West's Ann.Penal Code, § 995.

3. Indictment and Information ☞10.1(4)

If grand jurors examined a document requested by one of them outside of formal proceedings, and without such document being introduced into evidence, that fact would not affect validity of indictment returned by the grand jury, or the jurisdiction of the court to proceed under it, where evidence received before the grand jury and contained in the record of its proceedings was sufficient to uphold the indictment.

4. Indictment and Information ☞10.1(4)

Where a member of a grand jury requested and received a certain document outside of the formal proceedings of the grand jury, perusal of such document by such member only could not void indictment returned by the grand jury by more than twelve jurors.

5. Indictment and Information ☞196(5, 6)

Any uncertainty in an indictment charging defendant with presentation of a false and fraudulent insurance claim, in failing to name the insurers, or to set forth claim allegedly made, would be deemed waived by defendant by his failure to demur.

6. Criminal Law ☞635

Fact that during criminal prosecution, conferences were held between court and counsel at the bench, and in chambers, did not mean that defendant was denied a public trial, since the term "public trial" as used in section of constitution guaranteeing right thereto, consists of proceedings for impanelment of the jury, opening statements of counsel, presentation of evidence, arguments, instructions to the jury, and return of the verdict, and not to questions of law which do not involve matters for consideration of the jury. West's Ann. Const. art. 1, § 13; West's Ann.Pen.Code, §§ 686, 1043.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Public Trial".

7. Criminal Law ☞635

Where neither defendant in criminal prosecution, nor his counsel, had any objection to conferences at the bench between court and counsel, or to similar conferences in chambers, defendant would be deemed to have waived right to have the public present at such conferences. West's Ann. Const. art. 1, § 13; West's Ann.Pen.Code, §§ 686, 1043.

8. Criminal Law Ⓒ636(1)

Right of a defendant in a criminal prosecution, under statute and the constitution, to appear in person with his counsel is not violated unless defendant is prevented from being present during the presentation of matters before the triers of fact or such other times as his absence would not afford a fair and just hearing, and absence of a defendant from conferences held between court and counsel at the bench and in chambers would not be deemed to have deprived defendant of any of such constitutional or statutory rights. West's Ann.Const. art. 1, § 13; West's Ann.Pen. Code, § 1043.

9. Criminal Law Ⓒ636(2)

Where defendant in criminal prosecution was, at time of trial, on bail, and not under restraint, and was free to, of his own volition, attend any conferences which occurred between court and counsel at the bench, or in chambers, but defendant made no attempt to do so, and his absence from such conferences was of his own volition, and not by reason of any action of court, defendant, by failing to personally assert, or to assert through his counsel, his desire to be present, waived his right to be present at such conferences.

10. Criminal Law Ⓒ531, 736(2)

In criminal prosecution, admission into evidence of a statement of another, as to a confession made by defendant, was not improper even though there was no direct testimony that defendant's statement was free and voluntary, but in view of the evidence, question of whether the confession was voluntary was one for the court and the jury.

11. Criminal Law Ⓒ519(3)

Fact that a defendant in a criminal prosecution was under arrest and that his confession was made in response to a question asked by officers while he was under restraint, did not, in and of itself, prove that defendant's confession was not free and voluntary, but was merely a circumstance to be taken into consideration by the trial court and jury in determining that question.

12. Criminal Law Ⓒ519(3), 522(1)

Where a confession is coerced either through threats, force, violence or psychological coercion through constant and prolonged questioning, the defendant is deprived by his constitutional rights if the confession is received in evidence, but the fact that a confession was received while a defendant was under arrest and prior to the time he had been taken before the committing magistrate did not, in and of itself, establish such coercion. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

13. Courts Ⓒ97(1)

Rules laid down by the Supreme Court in certain federal cases are applicable only in a federal court and do not purport to establish any constitutional limitations upon the right of state courts to receive voluntary confessions made during the time that a defendant may be illegally detained.

14. Criminal Law Ⓒ519(3, 8)

In a criminal prosecution, testimony of a witness that defendant admitted the truth of certain incriminating statements, was properly received as evidence of a confession of crime charged, even though defendant made such admission while under arrest, and prior to the time he had been taken before a committing magistrate.

15. Criminal Law Ⓒ1170½(5)

Witnesses Ⓒ277(4)

In criminal prosecution, where defendant on direct examination testified he was present and listened to a person's recitation in police chief's office as to certain actions of defendant upon which prosecution was based, question asked defendant on cross-examination concerning a certain person was proper cross-examination inasmuch as another witness testified that during conference in the chief's office such person's name was mentioned, and in any event, defendant was not prejudiced by the question or answer thereto, since evidence offered by defendant showed that he had business connections with the person named in the cross-examination question.

16. Insurance  $\S$ 31

Statute providing that it is unlawful to present or cause to be presented any false or fraudulent claim for the payment of loss under a contract of insurance, does not proscribe only the filing of a false written proof of loss, but proscribes the presentment of any false demand under a policy of insurance irrespective of the form of that demand. West's Ann.Insurance Code,  $\S$  554, 556(b).

17. Insurance  $\S$ 555

Provisions of a policy of insurance requiring the insured to present proof of loss are for the benefit of the insurer and may be waived. West's Ann.Insurance Code,  $\S$  554.

18. Criminal Law  $\S$ 800(2), 824(2)

In prosecution for conspiracy to file a false and fraudulent insurance claim, and for presentation of a false and fraudulent claim for the payment of a loss under a contract of insurance, trial court did not err in failing to instruct jury as to the meaning of the word "claim" in view of fact the word "claim" is one of common meaning, and defendant did not request any instruction defining that meaning. West's Ann.Insurance Code,  $\S$  556.

19. Conspiracy  $\S$ 47

Direct evidence is not necessary to establish a conspiracy, for a conspiracy may be, and often must be, established by circumstantial evidence, and an express agreement need not be proved, but the conspiracy may be supplied from the acts of the conspirators in carrying out a common purpose to an unlawful end.

20. Criminal Law  $\S$ 511(1), 517(4)

In prosecution for conspiracy to commit, among other things, filing of a false and fraudulent insurance claim, and for presentation of such a claim, uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice as to activities of defendant in furtherance of such conspiracy, together with filing of a false claim by defendant, was sufficient to establish the corpus delicti, and the corpus delicti being established, confession of defendant was admissible in evidence and constituted sufficient corroboration of accomplice's testimony to sustain defendant's conviction.

In prosecution for presenting a false and fraudulent insurance claim, and for conspiracy to file such a claim, trial court erred in denying offer of counsel for defendant to prove by a witness that when defendant handed a list of allegedly stolen furs to a witness he told the witness that it was a list for the police and that an insurance adjuster had asked for it and he was to give it to him as soon as possible, since defendant was entitled to show absence of intent to make a claim and such statements were verbal acts within exception to rule against hearsay, although, in view of evidence showing defendant furnished other lists of furs lost in alleged robbery directly to the police, and made no offer to prove that list in question was delivered to the insurance company for use of the police, error would not be deemed prejudicial. West's Ann.Insurance Code,  $\S$  556; West's Ann.Const. art. 6,  $\S$  4½.

22. Criminal Law  $\S$ 656(1)

In criminal prosecution, action of the court in describing a gesture demonstrated by a witness which defendant had allegedly made, by stating that the witness placed his fourth finger of his right hand across his lips, a sign usually indicating "keep quiet," did not invade the province of the jury, since court did not instruct the jury as to what interpretation they should place upon the testimony of the witness as to the gesture he demonstrated, but only that the gesture had a common meaning.

23. Criminal Law  $\S$ 781(2)

In criminal prosecution, instruction to the effect that if jury should find that there was an occasion when defendant, under conditions which fairly afforded him an opportunity to reply, failed to make a denial in the face of an accusation directed to him, that the circumstances of his silence and conduct might be considered against him, as indicating an admission that the accusation made was true, was not improper in view of evidence of defendant's admission of certain incriminatory statements made in his presence.

24. Criminal Law §516

In order for a statement to be a "confession" it must admit all the elements of the crime charged.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Confession".

25. Criminal Law §781(4)

Where defendant was charged with conspiracy to, among other things, file a false and fraudulent insurance claim, and with the presentation of a false and fraudulent claim, and statements made by a person in presence of defendant while in custody of the police, and allegedly admitted by defendant, contained nothing as to a filing of any claim by defendant, or the preparation of any paper in support of a claim, but related only to conspiracy count of indictment, defendant's alleged admission of the truth of such person's statement could not constitute a confession as to the crime charged in such count, and court therefore properly charged the jury as to the distinction between confessions and admissions and that an admission might be considered by them even though not voluntary. West's Ann. Insurance Code, § 556.

26. Criminal Law §810

In prosecution for conspiracy to, among other things, file a false and fraudulent insurance claim, and for presenting a false insurance claim, charge on necessity of corroboration of testimony of an accomplice, and charge that if conspiracy or substantive crime charged were committed by anyone, then a witness who testified as to his participation therein was an accomplice as a matter of law, were not error on theory that such instructions were contradictory, or compelled jury to find witness in question was an accomplice, in view of fact such instructions read together did not compel a finding that witness in question was an accomplice, and therefore they were not confusing in such regard.

Where defendant was charged with conspiracy to commit grand theft, and attempted grand theft, and evidence showed object or subject of conspiracy was to wrongfully and fraudulently obtain money from defendant's insurers by staging a fake robbery, and then making a false claim, if the conspirators had accomplished their purpose, they would have been guilty of grand theft, and therefore, trial court did not err in instructing on meaning of terms theft, and grand theft.

28. Conspiracy §48

Criminal Law §772(2)

Conspiracy to attempt grand theft is a crime, and in prosecution for conspiracy to commit grand theft, and attempted grand theft, trial court did not err in defining attempt and instructing that a person who conspires to commit grand theft is guilty of a crime, and that a person who conspires to attempt grand theft is guilty of a crime.

29. Criminal Law §770(1)

In criminal prosecution, all that is required is that instructions given by the court properly instruct on all phases of the law applicable in the case and fully, fairly and correctly advise as to the kind, quality and degree of proof required for a defendant to be convicted under the indictment.

30. Criminal Law §829(11)

In prosecution for conspiracy to file a false and fraudulent insurance claim, and for presenting a false insurance claim, trial court did not err in failing to instruct on effect jury should give testimony of a witness who allegedly made an accusatory statement in defendant's presence, in view of fact an instruction was given by the court which fully stated the law as to the rules which should guide the jury in determining the effect of defendant's conduct in relation to an accusatory statement made to him or in his presence.

31. Criminal Law §829(15)

In criminal prosecution, trial court did not err in refusing requested instruction to the effect that if certain circumstantial evidence was susceptible of two interpretations, each of which appeared to be reasonable, it was duty of jury to reject interpretation pointing to guilt, and adopt that which pointed to innocence, in view of fact court instructed jury that they were not permitted on circumstantial evidence alone to find defendant guilty unless the proved circumstances not only were consistent with the hypothesis that defendant was guilty, but were irreconcilable with any other rational conclusion.

32. Criminal Law §829(10)

In criminal prosecution, trial court did not err in refusing to instruct jury that unless they found beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant admitted the truth of certain statements made by an alleged accomplice in a conference before chief of police, jury was required to return a verdict for acquittal, even though such instruction contained a correct statement of the law, in view of fact court instructed jury that a conviction could not be had upon testimony of an accomplice unless such testimony was corroborated by other evidence, and in view of fact jury was instructed as to when corroboration of an accomplice was sufficient, and as to how they were to determine whether corroborative evidence was sufficient, and that testimony of an accomplice was to be viewed with distrust.

In prosecution for conspiracy to file a false and fraudulent insurance claim, and for presenting a false insurance claim, although district attorney was guilty of misconduct in asking a witness as to whether he was aware of the fact that a New York store advertised entire stock of defendant's store as being for sale, so that jury would draw inference that allegedly stolen furs had been placed in hands of New York store without the transaction having been entered on defendant's books, error was not prejudicial in view of fact defendant offered no direct evidence to controvert testimony of a witness as corroborated by confession of defendant that alleged fur robbery was fake and no furs were stolen, and in view of fact jury found that claimed robbery did not occur, since it therefore was immaterial whether furs claimed to have been stolen were in the hands of the New York store or otherwise had been disposed of.

Morris Lavine, Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., and Herschel T. Elkins, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

NOURSE, Justice pro tem.

Appellant having been convicted on both counts of an indictment charging him in count I with conspiracy to commit grand theft, attempted grand theft, and the filing of a false and fraudulent insurance claim in violation of section 556, Insurance Code; and in the second count with the violation of section 556 of the Insurance Code (the presentation of a false and fraudulent claim for the payment of a loss under a contract of insurance and the preparation and making of a writing with intent to present the same in support of such claim) appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

In the indictment Clifford Vanderwyst also known as Weiss, and one Claude Wilson were named as coconspirators. At the opening of the trial, appellant's motion that he and Wilson be tried separately, was granted and after the jury was impaneled the People dismissed the action as against Weiss pursuant to the provisions of section 1099 of the Penal Code. The indictment was not dismissed against Wilson until after appellant's motion for a new trial was denied.

The facts as shown by the evidence offered by the People are: About 7:00 p. m. on December 27, 1955, the police were called to appellant's place of business as a result of an A.D.T. alarm. After appellant had related the details of a robbery<sup>1</sup> Captain Huff of the Beverly Hills Police Department asked the appellant:

"Al, besides the furs, was there anything else taken, either your money or Stan's money, or some of the company's money?" And the appellant replied: "No, nothing else. They seemed to know exactly where to go and what to do."

On the 28th of December, and prior to an inventory being taken of the furs in the fur vault, the appellant reiterated the fact that nothing but furs had been taken.

Appellant was insured against theft in three companies, the total amount of insurance being the sum of $350,000.

A Mr. Gaebel was an insurance adjustor representing the three insurers.

Following the alleged robbery there were prepared under the appellant's direction, two lists of the furs alleged to have been missing. These did not purport to be accurate but were subject to correction; they were furnished to the Beverly Hills Police Department. In the first week of February, 1956, the appellant stated to Gaebel that he had finally completed a list of the furs stolen in the robbery. The appellant offered this list to Gaebel. Gaebel asked that it be mailed to him together with a number of copies. A few days later Gaebel received by messenger, 10 copies of this list. This list (People's exhibit No. 10) contained a description of in excess of 280 fur garments with a statement after each, of its value. It was not signed. On February 8th, officers of the Beverly Hills Police Department stated to appellant that they had been advised that Gaebel had the final list and asked appellant if that was the "whole works" and stated to him that inasmuch as it did not have the manufacturer's numbers of the garments on it, it was of no use to the police. The appellant stated that the list, exhibit No. 10 was the final list for the insurance company and was not for the police department, and if they wanted a copy of it they could get it from one of the insurance companies.

About February 10th, Weiss surrendered himself to the Beverly Hills Police. Prior to 9:00 a. m. on February 14th, an officer of the Beverly Hills Police Department picked up the appellant and an employee of appellant's by the name of Somper, at appellant's place of business in Beverly Hills, telling them that they had under arrest a man they were informed had "pulled your robbery" and that they would like to have the appellant look at him and see if he could be the man. On arrival at the police station, appellant and Somper were separated and Somper was placed under arrest. The appellant was taken into a corridor, at the end of which was a cell in which Weiss was seated. The officer accompanying appellant, asked appellant if he could identify Weiss. Appellant answered that Weiss was of the general build and description but he was not positive. By prearranged plan, the officer then left the area, leaving appellant and Weiss alone. They were, however, in the view of another officer who was peering through an aperture in the wall. As soon as appellant and Weiss were alone, Weiss motioned the appellant to approach him. Appellant made no verbal reply but made a motion, placing the forefinger of his right hand vertically against his lips and then held his right arm against his body and moved it away from his body, making this motion several times.

Appellant then left the corridor and rejoined the officer who had accompanied him (Lt. Borders.) At this time he was placed under arrest and was immediately taken to the office of the chief of police where there were present, in addition to appellant, Weiss, Chief of Police Anderson, Lt. Borders and Captain Huff. Appellant was again asked if he was positive he had not seen Weiss and appellant replied: "I told you upstairs I never seen him. * * * It looks like the man. They are general in build but he is not the man." Weiss was then asked if he had seen appellant before. He replied that he had at appellant's fur store on the night of the alleged robbery when he talked to appellant in his office.

In response to questions by Lt. Borders, Weiss in the presence of appellant, stated that he had met one Woody Wilson in the first part of November through a person known as Billy Layton; Layton had told him that he had a friend who was looking for someone to pull a phoney robbery; Wilson told him that he had a furrier friend who wanted to pull a phoney insurance bit, that it was a walk-in walk-out proposition where no one would get hurt; on November 30th he (Weiss) and Wilson had, pursuant to a prearranged plan made by Layton, gone to appellant's fur store with the understanding that there would be but one employee present, who would be expecting to receive some packages; they carried with them two suit boxes and they were admitted to the store by a colored employee; it was Weiss's job to hold this colored employee while Wilson went into the vault to move the furs from one part to another; they were not successful because when they arrived at the store a colored woman was also there, who started to scream and the colored man ran for the alarm button, whereupon Wilson and Weiss fled; Wilson had contacted him after Christmas stated that the date would be December 27th and that the colored man had been sent out of town; Wilson told him he should go to appellant's store at 10 minutes to 6:00 where he would be met by appellant in the front of the store and that appellant would carry the ball from there on; he was instructed to represent himself as an insurance agent and to talk about insurance policies when he went into the store; he did go to appellant's store at 10 minutes to 6:00 p. m. and pretended to identify himself and appellant took him into his office; there he and appellant talked about fur auctions and appellant left the office and came back with a large mink coat stating that "They can't close the vault until I get this back;"

appellant again left the office and came back and whispered: "The office help is leaving;" thereafter a woman stuck her head in the door and stated that she was leaving for the day; he pointed to his watch and remarked that it was 6:25 and said: "It's too late to take it now;" appellant replied: "No, I had the A.D.T. set up from 6:30 to 7:00 o'clock;" immediately thereafter, appellant called to a man by the name of Stan and asked if everybody had gone; Stan answered: "Yes;" appellant said to Weiss: "Get ready;" he, Weiss, then removed from the briefcase that he carried, some gloves and a toy pistol; appellant then told Stan to come in and when Stan came to the door of the office, appellant said: "Stan this is a hold-up. We are insured. Don't start anything;" thereafter he directed Teitelbaum to tape Stan's arms behind him and appellant did; they marched Stan to a closet where he was left on the floor; they then went into a corridor on the south side of the building and appellant directed him to go back and close the door to the closet where they had left Stan; after doing this, he proceeded to the fur vault where appellant was arranging furs "vacating racks and moving them to another position;" he asked appellant if he could help but was told to go and look out the back window; he did and shortly thereafter appellant came to where he was standing and took him to the rear door and opened it, told him to go out that way when he left; they then proceeded to a closet and that appellant gave him a secretary containing some money; he asked appellant how much it contained and he said "$2,500.00" in $100 bills; appellant also gave him a watch and told him to put it in his pocket; he then took appellant to a closet on the south side of the building and taped him and then left the premises by the rear door.

Borders then said to appellant: "Al, that's the story. Is it true or not?" Appellant answered: "Yes, it was a stupid thing." Borders then asked appellant if he would like to tell his side of the story and he said: "No, I will wait until my attorney gets here."

Appellant was not advised that he was entitled to a lawyer or that he had a right not to be present when Weiss was questioned, or that anything he said might be used against him.

The People did not offer any direct testimony that no promise of immunity was made to appellant prior to the occurrence in the office of the chief and that no threats had been made against him or any force or violence used upon him, but the evidence did disclose, without contradiction by appellant, each act and occurrence which took place between the time the appellant was picked up at his store and the interrogation of Weiss in appellant's presence in the office of the chief.

At the trial, the accomplice Weiss testified that at 5:50 p. m. on December 27th, 1955, he entered the appellant's fur shop carrying a tan briefcase; he was dressed in a blue shadow-striped suit, and wore horn rimmed spectacles and a gray hat; the brim of the hat was turned down in front and he kept his head down so that his face could not be seen so well; when he entered the store there were some girls there and the appellant; he was stopped by one of the girls and he asked to see Mr. Albert Teitelbaum; he showed them a secretary and said he was from an insurance company; the appellant jumped up and came over to him and he gave appellant a name which he could not remember; he and appellant went into appellant's office and sat there until 6:25 or 6:30 p. m. During the time they were there, they discussed fur auctions and appellant talked in an average voice; while he and appellant were sitting in the office, appellant left the room and came back with a full-length black mink coat which he showed him and stated that they would have to leave the vault open; he asked the appellant how long he should stay there; the appellant answered that the A.D.T. would not come on until 7:00 o'clock that night; he took gloves and a toy pistol out of his briefcase, put on the gloves and held the pistol pointed at the appellant; at that time all of the employees except Al Stan had left the premises; appellant called Stan into the office. When Stan came in, he (Weiss) had the pistol pointed at Teitelbaum and told Stan if he did not follow Mr. Teitelbaum's instructions that they would both get hurt; Teitelbaum taped up Stan and they walked him into a little cubby hole on the north side of the building and made him lie down; he and appellant then walked back to the office and toward the fur vault and appellant told him to go back and close the door on Al Stan, which he did; he then went over to the fur vault and stepped inside and asked appellant if he wanted him to help to rearrange the furs; that appellant replied that he did not, and so he walked back to near the office; when he went into the vault, appellant was rearranging the furs; while waiting for appellant to come out of the fur vault, he looked out of the back window into the alley and saw somebody walking from the parking lot toward the back end of the store; this person turned down the alley and out of sight, but the same party came back and went into the parking lot and got into a car and pulled out; appellant came back from the fur vault and gave him a brown secretary with $2,500 in it and a wrist watch. This took place in the back end of the store; the appellant then said that he, Weiss, was to tie him up and they went into an alcove on the south side of the store where there was a big rack and appellant sat down on the floor and straddled his legs around the steel bar of the rack; he taped appellant's feet around the bar and appellant then put his hands around the bar and he, Weiss, taped his hands; he asked appellant how he was going to get loose and he said he would get loose when the A.D.T. came when no buzzer rang; he then went out of the back door carrying the briefcase which contained the remainder of the adhesive tape and the toy pistol; he threw his gloves in the trash can at the edge of the building; he took nothing with him from this store that he had not brought in except the watch and the wallet with the money in it; at the time appellant handed him the $2,500 and the wrist watch, he asked appellant if all the money was there and appellant answered: "See Woody;" he knew a person who had the nickname of "Woody" and that that person was Claude "Woody" Wilson; he threw the wrist watch that the appellant gave him, away at about Olympic and La Cienega, someplace in that district; that was about 6:45 p. m.; after leaving the fur shop he met Woody and gave him $1,000 to give to William Layton.<sup>2</sup>

Weiss further testified that he voluntarily surrendered himself to the Beverly Hills Police station and was placed in a cell there; on the third or fourth day after he surrendered he saw the appellant at the station; at that time he was in a cell; there was a hallway or corridor leading to this cell; when he first saw appellant, Lt. Borders was with him; the Lieutenant asked appellant if he could identify the witness; that appellant said that the witness was of the general build and description but he was not positive; Lt. Borders walked out of the area and that he, the witness, motioned the appellant to come over to his cell; after he had made this motion, the appellant placed his fourth finger of the right hand across his lips; appellant also twice made the motion with his hand commencing near his person and then extending it away from his person;<sup>3</sup> after this occurrence he was taken to Chief Anderson's office. On cross-examination the witness admitted having been convicted of a number of felonies.

The witness Walge testified: that on December 27, 1955, he was employed as a chauffeur by Mario Lanza and that on the early evening of that day, he drove Lanza into the alley in the rear of appellant's fur store. It was then between 6:30 and 7:00 o'clock, and dark. He parked his car in the lot to the rear of appellant's store and that there were two other cars there, a station wagon and a white Oldsmobile. These he knew to be the property of appellant. He saw no other vehicles; after parking he got out of the car and knocked on the rear door of Teitelbaum's store. He knocked several times and that Lanza got out and they both knocked. There were lights inside the store but there was no response to their knocking; Lanza pounded upon the metal rain cover of the door with a palm frond; the witness then walked around to the front of the store and although the lights were on, he could not see anyone in the store; he knocked upon the window; he then returned to the parking lot and drove the car with Mr. Lanza and one Esther Collins, around to the front of the store; he then got out of the car and walked to the front of the store and knocked on the window but there still was no response; he returned to the car and while waiting in the car, he was facing the front of the store and saw several faces in a three-way mirror; the car was parked diagonally, facing the front of the store; on seeing these faces, he got out of the car and walked back to the window and knocked again and at that time appellant and Al Stan were walking toward him. They came within 10 feet of where he was standing outside of the window; appellant was in the lead as he and Stan came down a narrow passage and that as appellant came toward him he made "this motion like this, which I assume was, Get out of here, or—Go away." (This gesture was described by the court as follows: "the witness placed both palms shoulder height near his body and moved them away from his body two

2. The People attempted to question the witness relative to the occurrence on November 30, 1955, which the witness had described in the statement made in the presence of the appellant in the office of Chief Anderson, but objections of the appellant to this testimony were sustained on the grounds that there was no proof of the existence of a conspiracy at that time.

3. Weiss's testimony as to the gesture made by himself and appellant was corroborated by the witness Cork, who observed this occurrence through an aperture in the wall of Weiss's cell.

or three times;") that after this happened Lanza got out of the car and Stan opened the door and admitted Lanza and locked it again. The witness returned to the car and sat down and shortly after, Stan came back and opened the door and admitted Lanza and Collins.

The People further proved that after the return of the indictment here, the appellant made a claim against an insurance company other than one of those that covered the furs in his store, for the loss in the alleged robbery of a wrist watch of a claimed value of $500.

On behalf of the defense, Al Stan testified that he is the appellant's uncle, having been employed by the appellant for many years; a little after 6:00 o'clock on December 27 he was called into appellant's office and was met by a man with a .45 automatic; he knew it was a .45 automatic because he had had experience with them while in the police reserve; the man with the gun told him to put his hands behind his back and told appellant to bind them with adhesive tape; the tape broke a couple of times and when it would the man with the gun poked appellant with it; he then told him to walk forward and the appellant to follow him; they took him into a closet where the man with the gun told him to lie down and then told appellant to bind his legs with adhesive tape, which appellant did; he was not bound to anything; he was unable to state how long he was in the closet<sup>4</sup> but that he did get into a sitting position and freed himself from the tape; while in the closet he heard nothing going on outside until he heard a pounding upon the back door; he then opened the closet door and found the appellant standing on the other side of the door; he was positive Weiss was not the man with the gun; the man with the gun was about as tall as Weiss but a little heavier, probably 15 pounds heavier; the man with the gun looked like Orson Welles did 20 years ago. He further testified that the man with the gun was wearing horn rimmed glasses.

Eleanor Eldridge testified that she had been employed by the appellant for 8½ years; between 5:30 and 6:00 o'clock on the evening of December 27, 1955, she was sitting on the sofa in the appellant's place of business next to appellant, and that there was also present another employee named Treitler and a customer named Hebard; a few minutes before 6:00 a man came in the front door of the store; she could not remember whether or not he had on a hat. Her recollection was that he wore a dark suit, she thought it was brown; the man said he wanted to discuss insurance with Mr. Teitelbaum and Mr. Teitelbaum invited him into his office; she left the premises about 6:15 by the rear door; her car was parked in the parking lot; she backed out and it was very dark; as she backed out she saw a truck which was parked on the wrong side of the alley; it was a van type truck, parked without lights; she related seeing this truck on being questioned by the police. She further testified that she was in the fur vault many times on December 27th, the last time about 5:30 on that day; at that time none of the racks was empty; she next entered the fur vault in the early afternoon of December 28th and at that time there were several empty racks; about half the racks were empty; that it was customary to keep the furs about two to three inches apart on the racks.

She testified that Weiss was not the man whom she saw enter the store at about 6:00 o'clock on the 27th; the first time she ever saw Weiss was in the Beverly Hills police station on the 14th of February; she went there with police officer Cork and Mrs. Brodkin; she and Mrs. Brodkin were taken to a room where Weiss was sitting; Weiss was then handcuffed in front and was asked by the officer to pull his hat down; Weiss was then wearing a blue pin-striped suit; the officer then asked Weiss to identify the women but he was unable to do so except on direct questioning as to their identity.

4. On cross-examination he admitted testifying before the grand jury that he was in the closet 15-20 minutes and that he then believed that estimate was correct.

The witness Brodtkin testified that she was employed by appellant as a bookkeeper; that sometime after 6:00 on the evening of December 27, 1955, she left her place of employment and at that time saw a man sitting with Mr. Teitelbaum in his office. She did not get a good look at him, only the back of his head. She said she was taken to the station on the 14th of February by officer Cork. She there saw Weiss who had his hat on, and was asked to pull his hat down in front, which he did; but neither she nor Mrs. Eldridge was asked to identify Weiss; it was officer Cork and not Lt. Borders who took her in to see Weiss.<sup>5</sup>

A number of other witnesses testified that on the 27th day of December 1955, there were no empty racks, but on the 28th there were many empty racks; their estimation as to the number of furs missing being from 50 per cent to 90 per cent.

The appellant also introduced the testimony of accountants, whose testimony, based upon the records of the appellant, showed that a large number of furs which had been purchased by, or consigned to appellant prior to December 27th, were unaccounted for and missing on December 28th.

The appellant took the stand on his own behalf but was not examined as to any matters other than the occurrences in the office of the chief of police on February 14th. He testified that at the beginning of the conversation in which Weiss related his story under the questioning of Lt. Borders, he interrupted with the statement that Weiss was a "damned liar" and interrupted them on several other occasions during the course of Vanderwyst's interrogation and was told by the chief of police to keep quiet. That on one occasion he stated Weiss' story was "a lot of hokum." He denied that at the end of the interrogation of Weiss, Borders said to him: "Al, that's the story. What about it?" and denied that he said "Yes, it was a stupid thing."

[1] Appellant asserts that the grand jury which returned the indictment against him was not legally constituted and that therefore the indictment was void, and the superior court was within jurisdiction to try him under it.

The grand jury which returned the indictment here was selected through a procedure provided by Rule 16 of Rules of Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles. (See McKinney New California Digest, volume 1A, pages 175, 176.)

Appellant's contention that the jury was illegally constituted, is premised upon the invalidity of this rule as being in violation of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure as to the qualifications of grand jurors and as to the mode of their selection. Appellant does not contend that any of the grand jurors was an unqualified person, nor does he assert that there was any exclusion from the panel from which the grand jury was selected of persons of his race, religion, area of residence, political persuasion or any other condition which conceivably would be of detriment to him.

In substance, Rule 16 provides as follows:

The grand jury shall be drawn and impaneled each calendar year in the Master Calendar Department of the Criminal Division of the court. On or before the first Monday in November of each year, each judge shall place in the hands of the presiding judge as nominees<sup>6</sup> for the grand jury for the ensuing year, the names of two persons whose age, residence and occupation shall be stated and who are personally known to the judge submitting such names, and who have no affiliations known to the nominating judge which would preclude them from serving with complete impartiality if chosen, and who are legally qualified to act as grand jurors. The presiding judge shall cause a copy of the entire list of nominees to be placed in the hands of each judge of the court and copies furnished to the press, and shall cause the list to be filed with the secretary of the court and open to public inspection. That the presiding judge shall appoint a "committee on grand jurors" to whom objection to any nominee may be communicated by any judge or other person. The names of the members of this committee shall be published with the list of nominees. Each judge shall make an investigation of the prospective grand jurors and may communicate to the committee on grand jurors his objections to any nominee. Any judge nominating a person as a prospective grand juror may withdraw the name of his nominee.

5. Both Cork and Borders testified to the contrary.

6. All emphasis herein is ours unless otherwise noted.

On or before December 31st, the committee on grand jurors shall present the presiding judge with a written report concerning each nominee. It shall set forth therein all objections received from any judge to any nominee. Before the 10th of January the presiding judge shall call a meeting of the judges. At that meeting the report of the committee on grand jurors shall be presented to and considered by the judges, and those nominees who are approved by a majority of the judges shall constitute the grand jury list, and this list shall be filed with the county clerk and made a public record.

Appellant attacks this rule upon the following grounds: (1) That the rule violates sections 204b and 204c of the Code of Civil Procedure in that it does not provide for the preparation of a list of qualified and competent persons by the jury commissioner and (2) that the rule violates the provisions of sections 198 and 199 of the Code of Civil Procedure in that it requires grand jurors nominated to be personally known to the nominating judge. (3) That the requirement of the rule that a person nominated by a judge shall be personally known to him, constitutes a systematic and illegal exclusion of a large segment of the people of the county as grand jurors. These contentions cannot be sustained.

The power and the duty of the superior court as to the selection of grand jurors is set forth in section 204 of the Code of Civil Procedure. So far as pertinent here, that section reads: "In the month of January in each year it shall be the duty of the superior court in each of the counties of this State to make an order designating the estimated number of grand jurors * * *; and immediately after said order designating the estimated number of grand jurors shall be made, *the court shall select and list the grand jurors required by said order to serve as grand jurors in said superior court during the ensuing year, * * ** and said selections and listings shall be made of men and women suitable and competent to serve as jurors, as set forth and required in Sections 205 and 206 of this code, * * *"

"In counties and cities and counties having a population of 80,000 inhabitants or over, such selection shall be made by a majority of the judges of the superior court; * * *"

By section 204a, the majority of judges of a superior court in counties having a population of over 60,000 may appoint a jury commissioner "*to assist the judges thereof in making selections of * * * grand jurors.*" By section 204b it is made the duty of the jury commissioner "pursuant to written rules or instructions adopted by a majority of the judges of such court" to furnish the judges of the court a list of persons qualified to serve as grand jurors. Section 204d provides that pursuant to the rules and instructions adopted by a majority of judges of the court, the jury commissioner shall return to the judges a list of persons recommended by him for jury duty, but further provides that the judges shall not be bound to select any names from said list, but may, if in their judgment "the due administration of justice requires, make all or any selections from among the body of persons in the county * * * suitable and competent to serve as jurors regardless of the lists returned by the jury commissioner."

Sections 204a and 204b and 204d in no wise affect or limit the duty of judges of the superior court to select and list the persons from which grand jurors shall be drawn pursuant to the provisions of sections 209 and 211 of the Code of Civil Procedure. They do not require, but merely authorize the appointment of a jury commissioner. They do not require that a jury commissioner, if appointed, must take any part in the selection of the list of persons to serve as grand jurors, but merely authorize the judges of the court to request his assistance if they are so advised and to adopt rules to guide him in the performance of this duty if it be required of him.

The Superior Court of Los Angeles County did appoint a jury commissioner but it did not require of him any assistance in the selection of the grand jury list, but chose to perform these duties without the assistance of the jury commissioner.

Rule 16 constitutes merely the procedure adopted by a majority of the judges of the court to govern them in carrying out, in an orderly manner, the duties imposed on them by section 204, and the power to adopt such a rule cannot be doubted.

The provisions of the rule that a judge shall only nominate a person personally known to him, for consideration by a majority of the judges, is not mandatory but must be construed as advisory only, as the judges could not by rule control the action of any individual judge upon a matter addressed to his discretion. But assuming that it is mandatory and that no judge could legally submit for consideration the name of a person not personally known to him, it still does not contravene any statutory provisions as to the selection of grand jurors, for the persons selected must not only be personally known to the judge, but must, by the provisions of the rule, be legally qualified to act as grand jurors and therefore must be persons who meet the requirements of sections 198 and 199 and 205 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There is nothing in section 204 that requires that the prospective grand juror be selected at random from the body of the county. Further, the list of nominees does not constitute the grand jury list. That list is only constituted when a majority of all of the judges have approved the names to be contained upon the list.

Appellant places great reliance upon the case of Bruner v. Superior Court, 92 Cal. 239, 28 P. 341. It has no application here. In that case the person who summoned the jury to act on a special venire from which the grand jurors were to be selected, had no power to act, the order appointing him elisor being void. Here there is no question of the power of the judges to act, but to the contrary, they were the only persons who could act.

[2] During the examination of the witness Gaebel it was developed that during the time the grand jury was in session and considering the evidence produced before it, as the result of which it returned the indictment here, one of the grand jurors, during a recess in the grand jury proceedings, requested certain information from the witness Gaebel; Gaebel procured a certain document, handed it to a secretary at the rooms where the grand jury was in session and she in turn handed it to the juror. It was stipulated that such a document is not one of those incorporated in the transcript of the grand jury proceedings which was furnished to the appellant. It was further stipulated, at the proceedings had upon the appellant's motion under section 995 of the Penal Code, that more than 12 of the grand jurors voted for the return of the indictment.

It is appellant's contention that the failure to include the document furnished to the grand juror in the record of the grand jury proceedings deprived him of the right given him by section 995 of the Penal Code, to a full and complete transcript of all the proceedings before the grand jury. There is no merit in this contention.

There was no evidence that any of the grand jury, other than the one to whom it was furnished by the witness Gaebel, ever viewed the document, or that it was considered by the grand jury in returning its indictment. There was no proof that it was a part of the record. It is presumed that the law was obeyed and that all evidence received before the grand jury was incorporated in its record. Code Civ.Proc. § 1963, subds. 15 and 33.

[3] Assuming that all of the grand jurors examined the document outside of the formal proceedings and without it being introduced in evidence, still that fact would not affect the validity of the indictment or the jurisdiction of the court to proceed under it, for the evidence received before the grand jury and contained in the record of its proceedings was sufficient to uphold it. McFarland v. Superior Court, 88 Cal.App. 2d 153, at pages 158-159, 198 P.2d 318, at pages 321-322.

[4] There was, however, no proof that any grand juror, other than the one to whom the document was handed, examined it, and as it was stipulated that more than 12 jurors voted to return the indictment, the perusal of the document by one could in no event void the indictment.

There is no showing made and in fact no claim made by appellant, that failure to incorporate the document in question in the record of the proceedings of the grand jury, adversely affected him in preparing for trial. The document was not produced at the trial and the appellant was therefore not called upon to meet any probative force that it might have had.

[5] Appellant further asserts that count I of the indictment was insufficient to state an offense against the laws of the State of California in that it failed to set forth the name of the person upon whom the theft was conspired to be committed and the amount involved, or set forth the false and fraudulent claims filed or the amount alleged to have been claimed.

He further asserts that count II of the indictment fails to state a public offense in that it failed to name the insurers or to set forth the claims made.

Both counts of the indictment fully meet the requirements of section 950 of the Penal Code. If there was any uncertainty in either count or if the second count as claimed, charged two crimes without separately stating them, which it did not, any such deficiency was waived by the appellant by failing to demur to the indictment. People v. Pierce, 14 Cal.2d 639, at pages 643-646, 96 P.2d 784, at pages 785-787; People v. Yant, 26 Cal.App.2d 725, at pages 729-730, 80 P.2d 506, at pages 507-508; People v. Brac, 73 Cal.App.2d 629, at pages 634-635, 167 P.2d 535, at pages 537-538.

[6] During the trial of this action which consumed nearly three weeks, conferences were held at the bench, out of the hearing of the jury on 26 occasions, and eight conferences were held between court and counsel in chambers. In addition, other off-record conferences were held at the bench. As no affidavits were filed on the motion for new trial that these concerned matters involved in the trial of the action, we assume they did not. Appellant, though in the courtroom, was not present at any of the conferences between court and counsel at the bench, nor was he present in chambers during the proceedings there.

Appellant asserts that by reason of the fact that the conferences between counsel and the court, out of the presence of the jury, were not heard by the members of the public who attended the trial, he was denied a public trial as guaranteed by section 686 of the Penal Code and by article I, section 13 of the Constitution of this State. He further contends that proceedings had at the bench and in chambers, when he was not personally present were in violation of his right to appear and defend the action in person as guaranteed by section 1043 of the Penal Code and by the article of the Constitution of this State last mentioned.

We find no merit whatsoever in the contention that the trial was not a public one. No member of the public was barred from the court room or from the proceedings had during the time the jury was entitled to be present and to itself hear the proceedings. We have carefully scrutinized the transcript as to each of the occurrences of the 34 conferences which we have mentioned above and find that in each instance the matters as to which the conferences were had between court and counsel, were matters which could not have been properly heard in the presence of the jury. In each instance the subject matter of the conferences between court and counsel was a question or questions of law, and not matters advanced for consideration of the triers of fact.

The trial of the action, so far as the term "public trial" is concerned, consists in the proceedings for the impanelment of the jury, the opening statements of counsel, the presentation of evidence, the arguments, the instructions to the jury and the return of the verdict, and from none of these proceedings was the public excluded. Thus appellant was not denied a public trial.

[7] Neither appellant nor counsel made any objection to the conferences at the bench or those in chambers and many of them were held at the request of appellant's counsel. Appellant thus waived the right he now claims, to have the public present at those conferences. People v. Tugwell, 32 Cal.App. 520, at pages 525, 526, 163 P. 508, at page 510.

[8] Appellant's contention that his absence from the conferences at the bench and in chambers deprived him of his right to be present at the trial and to defend, cannot be sustained. The absence of the appellant from the conferences held between court and counsel at the bench and in chambers did not, under the circumstances here, deprive him of any rights given him by the provisions of article I, section 13 of the Constitution "to appear and defend, in person and with counsel," or his right given him by section 1043 of the Penal Code to be personally present at the trial. In none of the instances of conferences at the bench or in chambers, were any matters presented to the court as to which appellant could have been of any aid to his counsel. Each of them concerned questions of law as to the admissibility of evidence and any knowledge appellant may have had of the facts which his counsel did not have, would have been of no aid to his counsel in the presentation of these questions of law.

In our opinion the rights of an appellant under section 1043 of the Penal Code or under article I of section 13 of the Constitution are not violated unless he is prevented from being present during the presentation of matters before the triers of fact or such other times as his absence would thwart a fair and just hearing.

In considering the appellant's right to be present at a trial under the provision of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, Mr. Justice Cardozo in Snyder v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 54 S.Ct. 330, 332, 78 L.Ed. 674, 90 A.L.R. 575; said in part: "Nowhere in the decisions of this court is there a dictum, and still less a ruling, that the Fourteenth Amendment assures the privilege of presence when presence would be useless, or the benefit but a shadow. * * * So far as the Fourteenth Amendment is concerned, the presence of a defendant is a condition of due process to the extent that a fair and just hearing would be thwarted by his absence, and to that extent only."<sup>7</sup> In United States v. Johnson, 3 Cir., 129 F.2d 954, at page 959, the court said: "The test, therefore, the jury, the triers of fact being absent from the courtroom, must be whether or not the appellant was damaged by not being present. * * * The question which was argued was purely one of law. * * * the trial court correctly resolved it. * * * As we have previously indicated, the right of a defendant to be present when the triers of fact are absent is not an absolute right, but one qualified by a condition that nothing occurs when he is not present which could put him in jeopardy. Only thus would his presence bear a relation 'reasonably substantial, to his opportunity to defend.'"

There is no reason why any different interpretation should be placed upon the statutes or provisions of our Constitution above mentioned than is placed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the Fourteenth Amendment.

[9] Appellant has failed to point out any occurrences had out of his presence which in any way affected him adversely and our own study of the record convinces us that his rights were not substantially impaired. As a matter of fact the appellant was not excluded from conferences held at the bench or in chambers. No order was made excluding him. He was, at the time of the trial, on bail and not under restraint and was free to, of his own volition, attend any of such conferences. He made no attempt so to do. His absence was of his own volition and not by reason of any action of the court and by failing to personally assert, or to assert through his counsel, his desire to be present, he waived his right to be present. People v. Tugwell, 32 Cal.App. 520, 525, 526, 163 P. 508; People v. Searle, 33 Cal. App. 228, at page 232, 164 P. 819, at page 821; People v. White, 20 Cal.App. 156, 128 P. 417; People v. Rogers, 150 Cal.App.2d 403, at pages 413, 415, 309 P.2d 949, at pages 955, 957; Snyder v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, at pages 106, 107, 54 S.Ct. 330, at pages 332, 333, 78 L.Ed. 674, at page 678, 90 A.L.R. 575; Deschenes v. United States, 10 Cir., 224 F.2d 688.

[10] Appellant asserts that the trial court erred in denying his motions to strike the testimony of the witness Borders, wherein that witness testified as to the statements made on the 14th day of February 1956, in the office of the chief of police, by Weiss in the presence of the appellant and wherein he related that appellant had, at the end of the interrogation of Weiss by Borders, stated in answer to the witness Border's question as to whether the statements of Weiss were true: "Yes, it was a stupid thing."

They first assert that this adoptive confession was received without any foundation being laid for it, in that, so they assert, there was no evidence offered that the statement was free and voluntary. It is seemingly appellant's position that because no witness was asked as to whether any force or violence was used, or promise of immunity or reward made, that a proper foundation was not laid for the receipt into evidence of the alleged confession. Appellant, however, has not cited any authority to uphold this contention nor have we, in our research been able to discover any cases which require such direct testimony in order that a proper foundation may be laid for the receipt of a confession, although we recognize that it is the common and probably the better practice to produce such testimony before offering the confession. We are satisfied that the evidence was sufficient to make it a question of fact for determination, first by the trial court and then by the jury, as to whether or not the confession was voluntarily given and to uphold the finding that it was voluntary.

The evidence discloses everything that occurred from the time the appellant was picked up at his place of business on the morning of the 14th of February, 1956, until the time appellant admitted the truth of Weiss' statements, and nowhere in the evidence is there any indication of any threats, force or violence or promises of immunity or reward. The appellant, when he took the stand did not assert that any violence had been used upon him or threats made to him or promises of immunity or reward given him. Under the evidence here, the question of whether the confession was voluntary was one to be determined by the trial court and the jury. People v. Chan Chaun, 41 Cal.App.2d 586, 590-591, 107 P.2d 455; People v. Burwell, 44 Cal.2d 16, at pages 30-32, 279 P.2d 744, at pages 751-753.

[11] The fact that the appellant was under arrest and that his confession was made in response to questions asked by the officers while he was under restraint, does not, in and of itself, prove that his confession was not free and voluntary, but was merely a circumstance to be taken into consideration by the trial court and jury in determining that question. People v. Rogers, 22 Cal.2d 787, 805, 141 P.2d 722; People v. Bigelow, 104 Cal.App.2d 380, at page 390, 231 P.2d 881, at page 888; People v. Chan Chaun, supra; Rogers v. Superior Court, 46 Cal.2d 3, 9-11, 291 P.2d 929.

Appellant asserts that the admission into evidence of the confession deprived him of his rights under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. He bases this contention upon the fact that the confession was made after his arrest and before he had been taken before a committing magistrate, there being opportunity so to do, and without his being advised of his right to counsel, and that his statements might be used against him.

[12] There can be no doubt that where a confession is coerced either through threats, force, violence or psychological coercion through constant and prolonged questioning, the defendant is deprived of his constitutional rights, if the confession is received in evidence, but the fact that the confession was received while the defendant was under arrest and prior to the time he had been taken before the committing magistrate, does not, in and of itself, establish coercion. Lisenba v. People of State of California, 314 U.S. 219, at pages 234-238, 62 S.Ct. 280, at pages 289-290, 86 L.Ed. 166, at pages 179-180; Rogers v. Superior Court, 46 Cal.2d 3, at pages 9-11, 291 P.2d 929, at pages 932-934; People v. Bashor, 48 Cal.2d 763, at page 765, 312 P.2d 255, at page 256.

There is nothing in the evidence here to show that appellant's confession was coerced, and as a matter of fact, appellant did not so assert, but to the contrary, denied the confession. We do not have here any evidence of any threats against the appellant, any force or violence used upon him, any prolonged questioning of him. We do not have a defendant weakened by prolonged confinement or constant questioning or one of impaired mentality, but on the contrary, a man of high intelligence, experienced in the affairs of life, whose confession was made within 30 minutes after his arrest and without any questions being propounded to him, other than whether the statements made by another which established his guilt, were true. It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that his confession was coerced, and while, as we have said, the fact that he was under restraint at the time of the confession is a fact to be considered in determining whether it was voluntary, his confinement does not establish the fact that it was not.

[13] Appellant asserts, however, that the mere fact that his confession was obtained before he had been arraigned or advised of his constitutional rights, in and of itself makes the confession inadmissible irrespective of whether his constitutional rights were invaded. He bases this contention upon the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332, 63 S.Ct. 608, 87 L.Ed. 819; Upshaw v. United States, 335 U.S. 410, 69 S.Ct. 170, 93 L.Ed. 100; Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449, 77 S.Ct. 1356, 1 L.Ed.2d 1479. The rules laid down by these cases are applicable only in a federal court and they do not purport to establish any constitutional limitation upon the right of the state courts to receive voluntary confessions made during the time that a defendant may be illegally detained. The Supreme Court of this State has expressly refused to adopt the rule laid down by the United States Supreme Court as an exclusionary rule in this State. See Rogers v. Superior Court, 46 Cal.2d 3, at page 10, 291 P.2d 929, at page 933; People v. Bashor, 48 Cal.2d 763, at page 765, 312 P.2d 255, at page 256.

[14] We hold, therefore, that the court did not err in denying the motion to strike the testimony of the witness Borders. His testimony that the appellant admitted the truth of the statements made by Weiss, was properly received as evidence of a confession of the crime of conspiracy charged by the first count of the indictment, and as an admission of the facts stated by Weiss insofar as they were pertinent to the proof of the crime charged in the second count of the indictment.

[15] Appellant asserts that he was compelled to be a witness against himself. He bases this assertion upon the fact that during cross-examination he was asked if the name "Claude Wilson, known as Woody Wilson" had been mentioned in his presence during the relation by Weiss in the chief's office, to which the appellant over his objection answered: "I'm not sure."

The appellant on direct examination had testified that he was present and listened to Weiss' recitation in the chief's office; and that he had at several times interrupted to deny Weiss' statements and had denied that he was asked if Weiss' statement was true or that he replied: "Yes, it was a stupid thing." The question asked concerning Woody Wilson was proper cross-examination inasmuch as the witness Borders had testified that during the conference in the chief of police's office that Weiss had related Wilson's connection with the conspiracy. But in any event, appellant was not prejudiced by the question or his answer thereto, as the evidence offered by him showed that appellant had had business connections with Claude Wilson.

It is asserted that the evidence fails to show that any claim was filed by appellant against the insurers under the policies of insurance issued by them, and that, therefore, there was no proof of the commission of the offense charged in either count of the indictment. This contention is based upon the claim that the itemized inventory delivered by appellant to Gaebel, the adjustor for all insurers, did not constitute a claim within the meaning of section 556 of the Insurance Code, and that in order for a claim to have been made it was necessary that a sworn proof of loss be filed.

Section 556 of the Insurance Code reads in part as follows:

"It is unlawful to:

"(a) Present or cause to be presented any false or fraudulent claim for the payment of a loss under a contract of insurance.

"(b) Prepare, make, or subscribe any writing, with intent to present or use the same, or to allow it to be presented or used in support of any such claim."

[16] The word "claim" is one of common meaning and is defined by Webster's International Dictionary, Second Edition, unabridged, as follows: "To ask for, or seek to obtain, by * * * right, or supposed right; to demand as due." It is to be assumed that the Legislature in using the word "claim" intended it to have its common meaning and intended to proscribe the presentment of any false demand under a policy of insurance irrespective of the form of that demand. Certainly it was not the intent of the Legislature to only proscribe the filing of a false written proof of loss for proofs of loss are made, not as a claim, but in support of a claim, and it is the making of the false proofs of loss which is in part the subject matter of paragraph (b) of section 556.

The purpose of the two paragraphs of the section is apparent. A claim of loss under a policy of insurance might not be false, yet the proof of loss presented in support of the claim be false. For example: Under a policy of fire insurance, the risk insured against, a loss by fire, might have occurred and a claim for some loss and the amount thereof be true, but the proof of loss might assert the loss of property which was not in fact destroyed or damaged by the fire, or falsely state the quality, character or value of the property destroyed.

[17] The provisions of a policy of insurance requiring the insured to present sworn proofs of loss, are for the benefit of the insurer and may be waived. Ins. Code, § 554; Hutchings v. Southwestern Automobile Ins. Co., 96 Cal.App. 318, 274 P. 79; Ruffino v. Queen Ins. Co., 138 Cal.App. 528, 33 P.2d 26, 883. It certainly would not be asserted that if an inventory, such as exhibit 10, had been filed with an insurer and the amount of the loss paid without any written proof of loss being filed, the insured could not be charged with grand theft and a violation of section 556 of the Insurance Code, if no loss had in fact occurred. Yet that would be the logical result of holding that the jury could not here find that by the presentment to the insurer of exhibit 10, the insured intended to make a claim of loss.

That there was ample proof from which the jury might find that a false claim of loss was made is clear. The witness Weiss testified that there was no robbery or theft of furs from appellant's premises on the night of December 27th. Appellant caused to be presented to the insurance companies, People's exhibit 10, which is an itemized list of more than 280 fur garments, with the value of each, and their total value set forth, and stated to the police that that list was the final list for the insurance company. It is evident that the jury might well find from this evidence that by presenting this itemized list, containing the value of each item of the property described, appellant intended it to be a claim for the payment of a loss under the policies, irrespective of the fact that in order to fix the liability of the insurers under the policies, it would be necessary for him to file a formal and sworn proof of loss in support of the claim.

[18] Appellant also complains that the court did not instruct the jury as to the meaning of the word "claim." A sufficient answer to this claim of error is that the word "claim" is one of common meaning and that the appellant did not request any instruction defining that meaning. People v. Allen, 138 Cal.App. 652, at page 659, 33 P.2d 77, at page 80; In re Estate of Nutt, 181 Cal. 522, at page 529, 185 P. 393 at page 396; Lawrence v. Pickwick Stages, Northern Division, Inc., 68 Cal.App. 494, at page 501, 229 P. 885, at page 887; People v.

[19,20] Appellant asserts that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict of guilty on the first count. The basis of his claim as we understand his brief, is that the corpus delicti was not established, that therefore his confession was inadmissible, and that without the confession there was no corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice which was relied upon by the People to establish the fact that there was in fact no theft of appellant's furs. The corpus delicti of count I of the indictment was the conspiracy to commit any one of the three counts mentioned in the indictment: (a) Grand theft, (b) Attempted grand theft, and (c) Filing of false and fraudulent insurance claims. Appellant asserts that there was no proof of any agreement to commit grand theft or of any agreement between appellant and any of the named conspirators, to file a claim for insurance.<sup>8</sup> It is true that there was no direct evidence of an express agreement between appellant and any of the named conspirators, but direct evidence is not necessary for a conspiracy may be, and often must be established by circumstantial evidence and an express agreement need not be proved, but the conspiracy may be implied from the acts of the conspirators in carrying out a common purpose to an unlawful end. People v. Daener, 96 Cal.App. 2d 827, 831, 216 P.2d 511; People v. Curtis, 105 Cal.App.2d 321, 327, 235 P.2d 51; People v. Lawrence, 143 Cal. 148, 76 P. 893, 68 L.R.A. 193. In the present case, the evidence produced by the People was sufficient to sustain a finding that a robbery was faked by appellant and Weiss on December 27th; that no furs or other property were stolen from appellant; that the appellant called the police through the A.D.T. alarm and notified the insurers of the alleged theft; that appellant thereafter

8. It was also claimed that there is no such crime as conspiracy to attempt grand theft. There is no substance in this claim, for an agreement to commit grand theft necessarily includes conspiracy to attempt the theft.

filed a claim against these insurers for his alleged loss in the alleged robbery and that each of these acts was done pursuant to a plan to illegally obtain money from appellant's insurers.

The uncorroborated testimony of the accomplice Weiss, together with the filing of the false claim, were sufficient to establish the corpus delicti. People v. Goldstein, 136 Cal.App.2d 778, at page 789, 289 P.2d 581, at page 587; People v. Briley, 9 Cal.App.2d 84, at page 86, 48 P.2d 734, at page 735.

The corpus delicti being established, the confession was admissible in evidence and constituted sufficient corroboration of the accomplice's testimony.<sup>9</sup> People v. Rokes, 18 Cal.App.2d 689, at page 691, 64 P.2d 746, at page 747; People v. Earl, 10 Cal.App.2d 163, at page 165, 51 P.2d 147, at page 148. The testimony of the accomplice, the confession and the evidence as to the filing of the claim against the insurers established not only the conspiracy as charged in the first count of the indictment, but at least two of the overt acts charged by that count, and this evidence amply supports the verdict of guilt upon both counts.

[21] Appellant makes numerous assignments of error in relation to the rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence. We have examined all of these assignments of alleged errors and find only one that has substance.

As a part of the People's case it was proved that exhibit No. 10 (the list of the furs hereinbefore described) had been delivered to Gaebel, the adjustor for the insurance companies, and that the appellant stated that that was the final list for the insurance company, and had refused to give the police a copy of it. The People had also shown that this list was received by Gaebel in an envelope which was received into evidence and marked "exhibit No. 11." The appellant called as a witness one of his employees, a Mr. Behar. This witness testified that he had received exhibit No. 10; that when he received it, it was sealed and was addressed to C. A. Gaebel. When asked what he did with it he replied: "I was instructed to give it to Mr. Gaebel for the police to check." The district attorney then moved to strike the answer as not responsive and as containing hearsay, whereupon counsel for the appellant offered to prove by the witness that exhibit No. 11 was handed to the witness by the appellant who told the witness to deliver it to Mr. Gaebel, "that it was a list for the police and that Mr. Gaebel had asked for it and he was to give it to him as soon as possible." The district attorney's objection to this offer was sustained and the answer of the witness was stricken.

While the motion to strike the answer was proper, as the answer was not responsive to the question asked, the court's ruling on the offer of proof was clearly erroneous. The gist of the crime charged by the second count of the indictment was the filing of a false claim. It was the claim of the prosecution that exhibit No. 10 constituted the false claim. It did not, however, contain any expressed demand for the payment of the loss and unless the appellant intended it as a demand or an assertion of a right to payment, there would be a failure of proof under count II of the indictment. His intent to make a demand might, as the People claim, be inferred from the filing of the claim and other evidence which we will later advert to. The appellant, however, was entitled to show a different intent and to offer proof of any statements made by him in connection with the delivery of the document which might tend to prove the absence of the intent to make a claim. Such statements were verbal acts within the exception to the rule, against hearsay. People v. Weatherford, 27 Cal.2d 401, at pages 421-422, 164 P.2d 753, at page 764; communication between appellant and Weiss by manual signs at the city jail, was also a fact tending to corroborate Weiss' testimony.

9. It was conceded by appellant at oral argument that if the confession was properly received in evidence, it constituted sufficient corroboration of the testimony given by Weiss at the trial. The People v. Chenault, 74 Cal.App.2d 487, 169 P.2d 29; Wigmore VI, §§ 1725, 1732, 1772-1777, 1785.

In view of the record here, however, we are convinced that this error does not justify a reversal of the judgment. The evidence showed without conflict that appellant caused to be prepared and furnished directly to the police, two other lists of the furs lost in the alleged robbery (exhibits Nos. 6a and 6b); that he had stated to the police that exhibit No. 10, which did not contain the manufacturer's numbers as to each of the listed furs, as did exhibits Nos. 6a and 6b, was the final list for the insurance company and that if the police wanted a copy of it they should obtain it from the insurance company. Further, there was no offer to prove that appellant himself or through the witness Behar, informed the insurance adjustor that exhibit No. 10 was delivered to the insurance company for the use of the police. In the light of these facts it does not seem probable that if the evidence offered through this witness had been received, the jury would have found that no claim was filed by appellant against his insurers. We are satisfied that the error complained of did not result in a miscarriage of justice and is one that falls within section 4½ of article VI of the Constitution.

[22] During the direct examination of the witness Weiss, he testified as to certain gestures made by appellant while he and appellant were alone in the city jail. The district attorney requested the court to describe the gesture demonstrated by the witness, whereupon the following occurred:

"The Court: The witness placed his fourth finger of his right hand across his lips, the sign usually indicating 'Keep quiet.'

"Mr. Carr: Well, your Honor, may I interrupt? I object to that; that is a question for the jury to determine. That would indicate many things and I certainly don't think—

"The Court: Placing the index finger perpendicularly across the lips, the Court states, has a common meaning, this motion that the witness made.

"Mr. Carr: I respectfully assign that as error and ask you to instruct the jury to disregard your remark.

"The Court: That assignment is denied."

Appellant urges that the court erred in this ruling and by its statements invaded the province of the jury. We do not agree. The court did not instruct the jury what interpretation they should place upon the testimony of the witness as to the gesture he demonstrated, but only that the gesture had a common meaning and the truth of that statement is undisputed by appellant.

The lack of substance in this claim of error is demonstrated by the fact that the appellant's own counsel gave to the gesture the same meaning assigned to it by the court.

In cross-examination of the prosecution's witness Borders, the following occurred:

Question by Mr. Carr: "How many times have you seen Mr. Teitelbaum stand up in your presence with his finger to his mouth in this fashion, (indicating)? * * I had my finger over my mouth in a 'shushing' fashion."

[23] The court instructed the jury in accordance with CALJIC No. 30 to the effect that if the jury should find that there was an occasion when the appellant, under conditions which fairly afforded him an opportunity to reply, failed to make a denial in the face of an accusation directed to him, charging him with the crime or his connection with its commission; that "the circumstance of his silence and conduct" might be considered against him as indicating an admission that the accusation thus made was true, and that evidence of such an accusatory statement was not received for the purpose of proving its truth but only to explain the conduct of the accused in the face of it; and unless they should find that his conduct at the time indicated an admission that the accusatory statement was true, they should entirely disregard the statement. (Emphasis added.)

Appellant argues that the court erred in giving this instruction because under the evidence given by the prosecution, appellant did not remain silent but expressly admitted the truth of the statements made by Weiss in his presence. We find no merit in this contention. The appellant's admission of the truth of Weiss' statements was certainly a failure to deny its truth and was conduct indicating an admission that the accusatory statement was true. It is impossible to see how the appellant could have been, in anywise, prejudiced by the instruction.

The appellant asserts that the court erred in instructing the jury in accordance with CALJIC instruction No. 29 (defining confessions and admissions), No. 29-A (that only a voluntary confession may be considered but that that rule does not apply to an admission) and 29-B (when a confession is voluntary).

Appellant asserts that these instructions were erroneous in that if the jury believed that appellant admitted the truth of the statements made by Weiss in his presence, his admission constituted a confession and that therefore no question of admission was involved, and it was therefore error for the court to instruct the jury that an admission might be considered even though not voluntarily made. In making this assertion, appellant overlooks the fact that as to count II of the indictment, the admission by the appellant of the truth of Weiss' statement was not a confession but only an admission.

[24] In order for a statement to be a confession, it must admit all of the elements of the crime charged. People v. Ferdinand, 194 Cal. 555, at pages 568-569, 229 P. 341, at pages 345-346; People v. Hall, 105 Cal.App. 359, 287 P. 533. The gist of the crime charged by count II was the filing of a false claim or the preparation of a paper to support a false claim. The statements made by Weiss, the truth of which were admitted by appellant, contained nothing as to a filing of any claim by the appellant, or the preparation of any paper in support of a claim and therefore appellant's admission of the truth of Weiss' statement could not constitute a confession as to the crime charged in this count. The court therefore properly charged the jury as to the distinction between confessions and admissions and that an admission might be considered by them even though not voluntary.

[25,26] The court instructed the jury in accordance with Caljic No. 821 and No. 826. By the first instruction, the court told the jury a conviction might not be had on the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as would tend to connect the appellant with the commission of the offense. It defined an accomplice and then stated: "If you should find that any witness in this case so conducted himself in respect to the crime charged, you must find that he was an accomplice." By the second instruction, the court charged the jury that if the crime of conspiracy or the crime in violation of section 556 of the Insurance Code charged in the indictment, were committed by any one, that then Weiss was an accomplice as a matter of law.

Appellant attacks these instructions upon two grounds. First he claims they were contradictory. There is no substance in this claim. The first instruction only defined an accomplice and told the jury that a conviction could not be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless his testimony was corroborated. The second told them that they must find Weiss to be an accomplice. Read together, they do not leave the question of whether or not Weiss was an accomplice to the determination of the jury and then in conflict therewith, instruct that he was an accomplice, but only tell them that if either crime was committed they must find that he was an accomplice whose testimony must be corroborated.

The second attack made upon the instructions is that by the second instruction the court compelled the jury to find that Weiss was an accomplice and that inasmuch as Weiss was not an accomplice unless he was in appellant's store on December 27, 1955, as to which fact the evidence was in conflict, the court by this instruction invaded the province of the jury. This assertion of error is fanciful to say the least. By no stretch of the imagination can the second instruction be construed as instructing the jury that Weiss was in the appellant's store on December 27, 1955. The court told the jury that if either of the crimes charged in the indictment was committed, then Weiss was an accomplice. Unless Weiss was in the store on December 27, 1955, neither crime was committed and the instruction left it for the jury to determine whether Weiss was in the store and the truth of his testimony as to what there occurred. The instructions were proper and for the benefit of the appellant, not his detriment.

[27] Appellant further claims that the court erred in defining to the jury the terms "theft" and "grand theft." If we properly interpret appellant's brief, his claim is that these instructions had no application to either of the crimes charged in the indictment or any basis in the evidence produced. This assignment of error is totally without merit. The first count of the indictment charged the appellant with conspiracy to commit grand theft. It was necessary, therefore, for the court to define grand theft to the jury and in so doing, to define theft. The evidence offered by the People, and believed by the jury, showed that the object or subject of the conspiracy was to wrongfully and fraudulently obtain money from appellant's insurers by staging a fake robbery and then making a false claim. If the conspirators had accomplished their purposes, they would have been guilty of grand theft.

[28] Appellant further charges that the court erred in defining "attempt" and instructing the jury that a person who conspires to commit grand theft is guilty of a crime, and that a person who conspires to attempt grand theft, is guilty of a crime. Appellant asserts that there is no such crime as conspiracy to attempt grand theft. We do not agree. A conspiracy to commit grand theft is inherently one to attempt that crime. If the conspirators are successful in accomplishing the object of the conspiracy, they have committed grand theft. If they are not successful, they have committed the crime of attempted grand theft.

[29] Appellant makes nine assignments of error based upon the refusal of the court to give instructions requested by him. We have carefully examined the instructions given by the court and are satisfied that the jury was properly instructed on all phases of the law applicable in the case and was fully, fairly and correctly advised as to the kind, quality and degree of proof required for appellant to be convicted on either count of the indictment. This is all that is required. People v. Steccone, 36 Cal.2d 234, at pages 240-241, 223 P.2d 17, at pages 20-21; People v. Hill, 76 Cal.App.2d 330, at pages 343, 344, 173 P.2d 26, at pages 33, 34. Only three of these assigned errors merit further comment by us.

[30] Appellant requested the court to give the following instruction:

"The only purpose for which you may consider the alleged statements of Clifford Weiss, on the occasion of the meeting in Chief Anderson's office on the morning of February 14, 1956, in the presence of Chief Anderson, Captain Huff, Lt. Borders and Teitelbaum is for the effect of said recital on the defendant Teitelbaum and his reaction thereto. It does not constitute evidence of the truth of said statements. If you find from all the evidence that Teitelbaum did not admit the truth of the statements then made by Weiss but instead said 'It was a lot of Hokum', or that Teitelbaum denied their truth either by words or conduct or both, then and in such event you must completely and wholly disregard whatever was allegedly said by Weiss on that occasion and the testimony of the witnesses Borders and Huff wherein they recite what Weiss said upon said occasion." This instruction is but explanatory of CALJIC instruction 30 which was given by the court and which fully stated the law as to the rules which guide the jury in determining the affect of appellant's conduct in relation to an accusatory statement made to him or in his presence. It was not necessary for the court to further state the law to the jury in different language from that contained in the instruction given. It was not error for the court to deny the requested instruction. People v. McKenna, 11 Cal.2d 327, at page 337, 79 P.2d 1065, at page 1070; People v. Stewart, 109 Cal.App.2d 334, at page 343, 240 P.2d 704, at page 709; People v. Walker, 99 Cal.App.2d 238, at page 244, 221 P.2d 287, at page 291; People v. Syed Shah, 91 Cal.App.2d 722, at page 725, 205 P.2d 1077, at page 1079.

[31] The appellant requested three instructions to the effect that if circumstantial evidence was susceptible of two interpretations, each of which appeared to be reasonable, and one of which pointed to the guilt of the appellant and the other to his innocence, that it was the duty of the jury to reject the interpretation which pointed to guilt and adopt that which pointed to innocence. While one of the instructions requested by appellant might well have been given, we believe under the circumstances here that the instruction given by the court<sup>10</sup> adequately advised the jury as to the law and that the appellant suffered no prejudice by reason of the denial of his requested instruction. The evidence as to all elements of the crimes charged by the indictment, other than the element of specific intent, were proven by direct rather than circumstantial evidence. If the jury believed, as they evidently did, the testimony of Weiss, there could be no doubt as to the wrongfulness of appellant's intent in staging the faked robbery depicted by Weiss'

testimony, and the only evidence bearing upon intent which might be subject to different interpretations, was that having to do with the presentation to the insurers of exhibit No. 10. The instruction given by the court above noted, sufficiently advised the jury as to their duty in interpreting this evidence and in resolving any conflicting inferences that might be drawn from it. People v. Yrigoyen, 45 Cal.2d 46, at page 49, 286 P.2d 1, at page 3; People v. Bletson, 117 Cal.App.2d 731, at page 734, 256 P.2d 614, at page 616.

[32] Appellant requested that the jury be instructed that unless they found beyond a reasonable doubt that appellant admitted the truth of the statements made by Weiss in the conference in the office of the chief of police on February 14th, the jury must return a verdict for acquittal. This instruction contained a correct statement of the law, for the only corroboration of Weiss' testimony was the confession and admission contained in appellant's admission that Weiss' statements, made in the office of the chief, were true. The appellant, however, was not prejudiced by the denial of the requested instruction. The court instructed the jury in accordance with CalJIC No. 821, that a conviction could not be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless such testimony be corroborated by other evidence which tended to connect the appellant with the commission of the offense; and it instructed the jury in accordance with CalJIC No. 822 as to when the corroboration of an accomplice was sufficient. It instructed them how they were to determine whether corroborative evidence was sufficient, the instruction given being CalJIC No. 830. The court also instructed the jury that the testimony of the accomplice was to be viewed with distrust. Inasmuch as the only evidence offered by the prosecution to corroborate

10. "I instruct you further, that you are not permitted on circumstantial evidence alone, to find the defendant Teitelbaum guilty of any crime charged against him unless the proved circumstances not only are consistent with the hypothesis that the defendant is guilty of the crime, but are irreconcilable with any other rational conclusion."

the testimony of Weiss was the admission by the appellant of the truth of Weiss' extrajudicial statements, the jury must have understood from the instructions given that unless they found that appellant made the admission in question, they could not find Weiss' testimony to have been corroborated, and could not convict the appellant.

Appellant urges that the trial court abused its discretion in denying his motion for a new trial. We have carefully examined all of the numerous questions argued under this assignment of error. Most of them have been raised and argued on the appeal from the judgment and have been heretofore dealt with, and the questions not so raised all concern matters which were addressed to the discretion of the trial court. An examination of the record convinces us that the trial court did not abuse its discretion.

The manager and vice president of Teitlebaum Furs, Inc., one Somper, was called as a witness for the appellant. On direct examination he testified among other things to the so-called promotion put on by a New York furrier named Franklin Simon. In connection with this promotion, furs of the value of $14,800 had been taken from the company's Beverly Hills inventory and shipped to Simon and furs of the value of $222,000 had been consigned from the company's New York store to Simon but that these furs had never been carried on the Beverly Hills inventory. On cross-examination he was asked: "Q. Mr. Somper, are you aware that the Franklin Simon promotion was advertised as the entire stock of Teitelbaum of California, $603,000 * * *" While propounding this question the deputy district attorney had before him on the counsel table a newspaper. Defense counsel objected to the question on the grounds that it called for hearsay and that it was incompetent to prove any issue as against appellant. They also assigned the asking of the question as misconduct and requested the court to direct the jury to disregard it and not to draw any inference from it. The court overruled the objection and the witness answered: "I have seen the add [sic]. I am not certain of the figures, of course."

The court erred in overruling the objection and in refusing the requested admonition to the jury. The district attorney was clearly guilty of misconduct in propounding the question. The answer called for by the question was clearly incompetent for any purpose. An affirmative answer would not serve to impeach any testimony given by the witness and was wholly incompetent to prove that furs of the value stated or any furs had been delivered by the Teitelbaum company to Simon. The district attorney did not claim that he had any evidence of the fact that furs other than those testified to by the witness on direct examination had been delivered or consigned to Simon. His only purpose in asking the question must have been to get before the jury the fact that a New York dealer was offering all of the company's Beverly Hills stock for sale with the hope that they would draw the inference that the allegedly stolen furs had been placed in the hands of Simon without the transaction having been entered on the company's books.

The crux of the entire case was whether the furs for which appellant made claim against his insurance carrier were stolen on the night in question, i. e., did a robbery take place on that night or was there merely a fake robbery. Appellant offered no direct evidence to controvert the testimony of Weiss as corroborated by the confession of the appellant that the alleged robbery was faked and that no furs were stolen. The only witness called by the defense as to the event was the witness Stan. His testimony practically dovetailed with that of Weiss. While the evidence produced by the appellant showed that it was possible for four men to remove 280 fur garments from the vault to a vehicle in the alley within the short period of time that elapsed before the witnesses Lanza and Walge arrived at appellant's place of business, there was not an iota of evidence that more than one alleged robber was in the store.<sup>11</sup>

From the testimony of the various witnesses who testified as to the racks in the vault being substantially full on December 27, but more than half empty on the 28th, the inference might be drawn that the furs were removed on the night of December 27, but in view of the testimony of Weiss that no furs were removed, whether that inference should be drawn was a question for the jury and if the jury found from the evidence, as they did, that the claimed robbery did not occur then it was entirely immaterial whether the furs claimed to have been stolen were in the hands of Simon or had been otherwise disposed of. Any inference that the jury might have drawn from the question and the answer thereto could not therefore have affected their ultimate verdict.

Other assignments of misconduct are made by appellant. An examination of the record convinces us that there was no misconduct other than that mentioned above; further comment than this would serve no useful purpose.

The order denying appellant's motion for a new trial and the judgment are affirmed.

Hearing denied; CARTER, J., dissenting.

11. Counsel for the appellant, in introducing the evidence of Somper as to the time it would require to remove the furs from the vault to the vehicle in the alley and in making a demonstration before the jury, stated in the presence of the jury that the defense would prove that appellant admitted four men into the vault at the time of the robbery. Such evidence was not offered.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA GAS COMPANY, a corporation, Plaintiff and Respondent,

v.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES, a municipal corporation, Defendant and Appellant.

L. A. 24909.

Supreme Court of California,
In Bank.

Aug. 29, 1958.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1958.

Action by gas company to recover cost incurred in relocating certain of its lines in a county as a result of sewer construction by the city in an unincorporated county area. The Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Philbrick McCoy, J., entered judgment against city and it appealed. The Supreme Court, Traynor, J., held that where there was no provision in utility company's franchise abrogating its common-law obligation to relocate its pipes at its own expense, utility company did not have the right to recover costs of such a relocation, even though its franchise was from the county and relocation was necessitated by a sewer project undertaken by a city in an unincorporated portion of county.

Judgment reversed with directions.

Obligation of a public utility, under its county franchise, to relocate its pipes at its own expense, rests on the paramount right of the people as a whole to use the public streets wherever located, and fact that franchise was granted by a county as an agent of a state did not defeat right of city, as another such agent, acting in its governmental capacity, to invoke such public right for the public benefit.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

The City of Los Angeles constructed the La Cienaga and San Fernando Relief Sewer as part of a sewer construction program. A short section of this sewer line passes under a narrow strip of land known as the County Strip located outside the city limits in an unincorporated area of the county of Los Angeles. To construct the sewer it was necessary to relocate gas lines of the Southern California Gas Company. The company agreed to relocate its gas lines in the County Strip subject to a later determination of its obligation to do so at its own expense. It conceded its obligation to relocate its lines at its own expense within the city limits but denied that it had the same obligation with respect to its lines located in the County Strip. After the work was completed it brought this action against the city to recover the costs incurred in relocating its County Strip lines and recovered judgment for $12,003.92 plus interest. The City appeals.

[1] The company located its lines in the county pursuant to a county franchise. It is not disputed that this franchise constitutes a contract secured by the United States Constitution against impairment by subsequent state legislation (see County of Los Angeles v. Southern Cal. Tel. Co., 32 Cal.2d 378, 382, 196 P.2d 773) and that the company's rights thereunder can not be taken or damaged for public use without making just compensation. Cal.Const. art. I, § 14; U.S.Const. [2] In the absence of a provision to the contrary it has generally been held that a public utility accepts franchise rights in public streets subject to an implied obligation to relocate its facilities therein at its own expense when necessary to make way for a proper governmental use of the streets. *New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. City and County of San Francisco, 53 Cal.App. 188, 192-193, 199 P. 1108. Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co. v. State Highway Commission, 294 U.S. 613, 55 S.Ct. 563, 79 L.Ed. 1090, is not to the contrary, for in that case the utility's private right of way was involved, not its right to use the public streets.

[3-5] The company contends, however, that any implied obligations in its county franchise to relocate its pipes cannot be invoked for the benefit of the city operating outside its territorial limits. We cannot agree with this contention. Such obligations rest on the paramount right of the people as a whole to use the public streets wherever located, and the fact that a franchise is granted by one political subdivision as an agent of the state (see, San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Rys. v. County of Alameda, 66 Cal.App. 77, 83, 225 P. 304; Belfast Water Co. v. City of Belfast, 92 Me. 52, 42 A. 235, 237) does not defeat the right of another such agent acting in its governmental capacity to invoke the public right for the public benefit. First Nat. Bank of Boston v. Maine Turnpike Authority, 153 Me. 131, 136 A.2d 699, 711; City of San Antonio v. Bexar Metropolitan Water Dist., Tex.Civ.App., 309 S.W.2d 491, 493; Cummins v. City of Seymour, 79 Ind. 491, 41 Am.Rep. 618, 623-625; New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Drainage Commission, 111 La. 838, 35 So. 929, 933; see, Gadd v. McGuire, 69 Cal.App. 347, 358-359, 231 P. 754. The fact that the city's use of county streets for its sewers is authorized by section 10101 of the Public Utilities Code has no bearing on the applicability of the foregoing rule. It is true that the rights granted to municipal corporations by that section have been held to constitute franchises subject to the paramount right of the state to make the streets safe for public travel (State v. Marin Municipal Water Dist., 17 Cal.2d 699, 703-704, 111 P.2d 651), but it does not follow that a franchise exercised by a city in its governmental capacity under that section is subordinate to a prior franchise granted to a public utility. The utility involved in the Marin case was a municipal water district operating in a proprietary capacity. See City of South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., 152 Cal. 579, 592-593, 93 P. 490. In the present case, on the other hand, the city is exercising one of its most important governmental powers, a power so important that it is one of the few powers it may exercise outside of its territorial limits without express authorization. Harden v. Superior Court, 44 Cal.2d 630, 638-639, 284 P.2d 9; Mulville v. City of San Diego, 183 Cal. 734, 737, 192 P. 702; McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 163, 44 P. 358, 31 L.R.A. 794; see also, National City v. Fritz, 33 Cal.2d 635, 637, 204 P.2d 7; City of Madera v. Black, 181 Cal. 306, 312-313, 184 P. 397. The Marin case itself recognized and applied the established rule that a utility's rights in the public streets are taken subject to the paramount right of public travel, and as stated above, the same rule applies between public utilities and municipal corporations using the streets for sewer purposes.

The company contends, however, that the express terms of its county franchise define its obligation to relocate its lines at its own expense and that by clear implication any other similar obligations are excluded. Section 8 of its franchise provides that "the County of Los Angeles reserves the right to change the grade of any highway over which this franchise is granted, and the grantee of said franchise, its successors or assigns, shall at once change the location of all pipes and other appliances laid hereunder to conform to such change of grade." The city contends that the recital of the obligation to relocate the gas lines for changes of grade does not exclude other implied obligations to relocate lines and that any attempt to relieve the company of such obligations would be invalid.

The right of municipal corporations to require utilities to relocate their lines to make way for governmental uses of the streets has usually been described as resting in the police power, and it has frequently been stated in this context that the police power cannot be bargained away. National Waterworks Co. v. City of Kansas, C.C., 28 F. 921, 922-923; City of Macon v. Southern Bell Tel. & Tel. Co., 89 Ga.App. 252, 79 S.E.2d 265, 275; Belfast Water Co. v. City of Belfast, 92 Me. 52, 42 A. 235, 237; Louisville City Railway Company v. City of Louisville, 71 Ky. 415, 422-423; Scranton Gas & Water Co. v. City of Scranton, 214 Pa. 586, 64 A. 84, 85, 6 L.R.A.,N.S., 1033; Louisville Gas & Electric Co. v. Commissioners of Sewerage of Louisville, 236 Ky. 376, 33 S.W.2d 344, 344-345; see, New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Drainage Commission, 197 U.S. 453, 460, 25 S.Ct. 471, 49 L.Ed. 831. Given, however, the municipal power to vacate streets or acquire a lesser interest in them in the first instance than is usually obtained by the public (see Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393, 416, 43 S.Ct. 158, 67 L.Ed. 322; Detroit Edison Co. v. City of Detroit, 332 Mich. 348, 51 N.W.2d 245, 247-248), there would appear to be no basic principle that would prohibit granting a utility a right to compensation for relocating its lines as part of its franchise although such right would not otherwise pass. This view finds support in cases holding that the legislature may provide for such compensation. In re Gillen Place, Borough of Brooklyn, etc., 304 N.Y. 215, 106 N.E.2d 897, 900; Baltimore Gas & Electric Co. v. State Road Commission, 214 Md. 266, 134 A.2d 312, 315; Philadelphia Suburban Water Co. v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 168 Pa.Super. 360, 78 A.2d 46, 51-52; Opinion of the Justices, 152 Me. 449, 132 A.2d 440, 443; Opinion of the Justices, N.H., 132 A.2d 613, 614-615; see, Columbus Gaslight & Coke Co. v. City of Columbus, 50 Ohio St. 65, 33 N.E. 292, 293, 19 L.R.A. 510.<sup>1</sup> Perhaps this apparent conflict can be reconciled on the theory that a state legislature may authorize franchises granting the utility the right to compensation for relocating its lines to make way for governmental uses, but that it will not be held to have delegated such power to a political subdivision in the absence of express language to that effect. It is unnecessary to determine, however, whether the county was empowered to grant a franchise including the right to the compensation here sought, for we have concluded that properly interpreted the company's franchise included no such right.

[6, 7] As a public grant the franchise is to be construed in favor of the public interest. Knoxville Water Company v. City of Knoxville, 200 U.S. 22, 33-34, 26 S.Ct. 224, 50 L.Ed. 353; County of Los Angeles v. Southern Cal. Tel. Co., 32 Cal.2d 378, 384, 196 P.2d 773; City of Sacramento v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 173 Cal. 787, 791, 161 P. 978; Civ.Code, § 1069. Its own terms provide that it "is hereby granted upon each and every condition herein contained, and shall ever be strictly construed against the grantee and its successors and assigns. Nothing shall pass hereby unless it be granted in plain and unambiguous terms." The maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius est cannot be invoked to make plain and unambiguous the right to compensation that the company seeks. Given the parties' express recognition of the rule of strict construction against the grantee, paragraph 8 cannot reasonably be interpreted as being more than a partial expression of the parties' common-law rights and obligations (City of Los Angeles v. City of Glendale, 23 Cal.2d 68, 77, 142 P.2d 289; Strand Improvement Co. v. City of Long Beach, 173 Cal. 765, 772-773, 161 P. 975) inserted out of an abundance of caution or by way of example only. City of Lexington ex rel. Menefee v. Commercial Bank, 130 Mo.App. 687, 108 S.W. 1095, 1096; Georgia Power Co. v. Leonard, 187 Ga. 608, 1 S.E.2d 579, 581; see also, Springer v. Government of Philippine Islands, 277 U.S. 189, 206, 48 S.Ct. 480, 72 L.Ed. 845;

1. It should be noted that we are not here concerned with the question of the power of the Legislature to grant additional rights under a franchise after it has been accepted by the utility and the problem that would be raised thereby of a possible gift of public funds:

Dickey v. Raisin Proration Zone No. 1, 24 Cal.2d 796, 811, 151 P.2d 505, 157 A.L.R. 324. Thus, the New York Court of Appeals has pointed out that despite the existence of express provisions dealing with the utility's obligations with respect to the streets "The reasonable construction * * * is to assume that the people are not to be burdened with any heavier expense than necessity requires, and that to relieve the public service corporations having franchises in the streets of their common-law liabilities and to pass them over to the taxpayer can only be accomplished by the express direction of the Legislature." Transit Commission v. Long Island R. Co., 253 N.Y. 345, 171 N.E. 565, 568; see, also, New York City Tunnel Authority v. Consolidated Edison Co., 295 N.Y. 467, 68 N.E.2d 445, 448-449. City of Chicago v. Sheldon, 9 Wall. 50, 76 U.S. 50, 19 L.Ed. 594; State ex rel. City of Kansas City v. Corrigan Consol. Street Ry. Co., 85 Mo. 263; City of Kansas City v. Corrigan, 86 Mo. 67, and Western Union Tel. Co. v. Police Jury, etc., 225 La. 531, 73 So.2d 450, are not to the contrary. The first three of these cases involved, not competing uses of the streets, but the extent of the utility's duty to repair and repave the streets, a matter covered by the express terms of the franchise, and in the Sheldon case the court's interpretation was in accord with the practical construction placed on the franchise by the parties. In the fourth case, the competing public use was so highly unusual that it could not have been contemplated at the time the franchise was accepted. In the present case, on the contrary, the use of the streets for sewers was clearly to be anticipated, the utility's common-law obligation to relocate its pipes to accommodate that use has at all times been clearly recognized by the law, and there is no provision in the company's franchise abrogating that obligation by giving it the right to recover the costs of such relocation.

The judgment is reversed with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for the defendant city.

CARTER, Justice (concurring).

Although I agree with the conclusion reached in the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice TRAYNOR, for the reasons hereinafter stated, I regret my inability to join in said opinion.

My views with respect to the application of article I, section 14, of the Constitution of California to the ordinary situation in which private property has been taken or damaged for a public use, have been stated many times in both majority, dissenting and concurring opinions which I have written as a member of this court (Rose v. State of California, 19 Cal.2d 713, 123 P.2d 505; Bacich v. Board of Control, 23 Cal.2d 343, 144 P.2d 818; Archer v. City of Los Angeles, 19 Cal.2d 19, 29, 119 P.2d 1; O'Hara v. Los Angeles County Flood Control Dist., 19 Cal.2d 61, 64, 119 P.2d 23; House v. Los Angeles County Flood Control Dist., 25 Cal.2d 384, 398, 153 P.2d 950; Clement v. State Reclamation Board, 35 Cal.2d 628, 646, 220 P.2d 897). It will be noted that in all of the cases above cited it was the position of the public agency which took the property or caused damage thereto, that the taking or damaging was done under the police power reserved to the state and its political subdivisions by article XI, section 11, of the Constitution of California. I did not agree with this contention, and my position in this regard is the same now as it was then. This is the first case since I have been a member of this court, in which, in my opinion, the police power doctrine was applicable to the facts of the case presented. A review of the above-cited cases reveals a state of confusion in the minds of some members of this court with respect to the situations in which the police power doctrine may be invoked by the state or a political subdivision thereof to take, damage or destroy private property without the payment of compensation therefor in contravention of article I, section 14, of the Constitution of California. See Rose v. State of California, supra; Bacich v. Board of Control, supra; Archer v. City of Los Angeles, supra; O'Hara v. Los Angeles County Flood Control Dist., supra; House v. Los Angeles County Flood Control Dist., supra; Clement v. State Reclamation Board, supra; Beals v. City of Los Angeles, 23 Cal. 2d 381, 144 P.2d 839; People v. Ricciardi, 23 Cal.2d 390, 144 P.2d 799. A reading of the last-cited cases including the dissenting and concurring opinions therein demonstrates the truth of my statement with respect to the confusion which has existed in the minds of some members of this court in attempting to distinguish cases involving the application of article I, section 14 (eminent domain), of the Constitution and cases involving the application of article XI, section 11 (police power), of the Constitution of California. The opinion prepared by Mr. Justice TRAYNOR in this case adds to that confusion, as he fails to differentiate between the powers granted to the state and its political subdivisions under the last two cited constitutional provisions. Said opinion states: "In the present case, on the other hand, the city is exercising one of its most important governmental powers, a power so important that it is one of the few powers it may exercise outside of its territorial limits without express authorization." He then cites Harden v. Superior Court, 44 Cal.2d 630, 284 P.2d 9, which is a case involving power of eminent domain. Later in his opinion, he states: "The right of municipal corporations to require utilities to relocate their lines to make way for governmental uses of the streets has usually been described as resting in the police power, and it has frequently been stated in this context that the police power cannot be bargained away." The cases he cites here correctly apply the police power doctrine.

In said opinion, Mr. Justice TRAYNOR also discusses the power of the Legislature to provide for the payment of compensation in cases such as this, but this proposition is not involved here because it is conceded that the Legislature made no such provision. This discussion is therefore obiter dictum.

There is really no need for the confusion which now exists in the decisions of this court which have had occasion to apply article I, section 14, and article XI, section 11, of the Constitution of California to particular factual situations as there is a clear distinction between the power of eminent domain and the police power granted by said constitutional provisions. It may be true that there is a twilight zone where the line of demarcation between the exercise of the power of eminent domain and the exercise of the police power is difficult to discern, but in view of the very clear pronouncements of the Supreme Court of the United States in this field, this is not such a case. I say this, notwithstanding my predilection to hold otherwise before reading the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States applicable to the facts of this case. New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Drainage Commission, 197 U.S. 453, 25 S.Ct. 471, 49 L.Ed. 831; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 166 U.S. 226, 17 S.Ct. 581, 41 L.Ed. 979; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. State of Illinois ex rel. Drainage Com'rs, 200 U.S. 561, 26 S.Ct. 341, 50 L.Ed. 596; New York & N. E. Railroad Co. v. Town of Bristol, 151 U.S. 556, 14 S.Ct. 437, 38 L.Ed. 269; Butchers' Union Co. v. Crescent City Co., 111 U.S. 746, 4 S.Ct. 652, 28 L.Ed. 585; *Stone v. In view of these decisions, we have here a very simple case which should be disposed of by an opinion free from the confusion and dictum which permeates many of the other decisions of this court in this field. For the sake of clarity only, I have prepared an opinion which correctly states and disposes of the issues in this case in accordance with the rules of law as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be applicable to the factual situation presented here.

Defendant, city of Los Angeles, a municipal corporation, appeals from a judgment awarding compensation to plaintiff, Southern California Gas Company, a corporation, for its costs in relocating its gas lines. The case was tried on an agreed statement of facts.

The city of Los Angeles, hereinafter referred to as the city, began a sewer construction program, one of the main parts of which was the construction of the "La Cienaga and San Fernando Valley Relief Sewer." This sewer carries sewage from the San Fernando Valley to a spot near La Cienaga Boulevard where it meets with the Hyperion disposal plant line. A small portion of this sewer line passes under a narrow strip of land known as the County Strip which is located outside the city limits but within an unincorporated area in the county of Los Angeles. A portion of the proposed sewer route underlying public streets in the County Strip was occupied by the gas lines of the Southern California Gas Company, hereinafter called the company. The company agreed to relocate its gas lines in the County Strip to make way for the sewer mains subject to a later determination of its obligation to do so at its own expense. The company conceded its obligation to relocate its lines as its own expense within the city limits but denied that it had the same obligation with respect to its lines located in the County Strip. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff company in the sum of $12,003.92, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent from March 25, 1955. The city appeals.

The city argues that a public utility, such as plaintiff, is obligated to relocate at its own expense its facilities underlying public streets within an unincorporated portion of the county to make way for a public improvement being installed therein by the city. The major points here involved are whether the installation and maintenance of sewers by a municipality for the protection of the public health is an exercise of the police power; whether the police power of the state is being exercised by a municipality when it constructs connecting sewers beyond its boundaries; and whether the relocation of gas lines, at the company's expense, constitutes a taking of private property without compensation within the meaning of the constitutional prohibitions.

There can be no doubt at this time but that the installation and maintenance of sewers in the interests of the public health by a municipality is an exercise of the police power. In Harter v. Barkley, 158 Cal. 742, 744, 745, 112 P. 556, 557, it was held that "The regulation of the right of laying sewers in public streets is unquestionably a power conferred upon municipalities, partly by virtue of the provisions of section 11 of article XI of the Constitution of California. The proper protection of the public health depends very largely upon the maintenance of a thorough and sanitary sewer system * * *. It has been held, and we think very properly, that ordinances of a municipal corporation providing for the construction, maintenance, and repairs of sewers and drains are to be sustained as a valid exercise of police power." "Regulation by ordinance of methods and devices for the conveyance of sewage from private dwellings in municipalities is recognized as an exercise of that branch of the police power which pertains to the public health * * *." In re Nicholls, 74 Cal.App. 504, 507, 241 P. 399, 400; and see, Sullivan v. City of Los Angeles, 116 Cal.App.2d 807, 811, 254 P.2d 590.

The city contends that it is exercising the police power of the state when it constructs sewers beyond its boundaries and that it is authorized to do so by section 10101 of the Public Utilities Code and by its city charter. Section 10101, Public Utilities Code, provides: "There is granted to every municipal corporation of the State the right to construct, operate, and maintain water and gas pipes, mains and conduits, electric light and power lines, telephone and telegraph lines, sewers and sewer mains, all with the necessary appurtenances, across, along, in, under, over, or upon any road, street, alley, avenue, or highway, and across, under, or over any railway, canal, ditch, or flume which the route of such works intersects, crosses, or runs along, in such manner as to afford security for life and property."

The Los Angeles City Charter provides (§ 2(6)) that the city shall be empowered "To make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, safety, welfare and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, and to exercise such jurisdiction outside its limits in such manner as may be authorized by law." (Emphasis added.)

In Mulville v. City of San Diego, 183 Cal. 734, 737, 192 P. 702, 703, it was said: "In general, a municipality is competent to act beyond its boundaries only in those cases in which it is so empowered by legislative authority, and it is necessary, in passing upon the validity of acts of a municipality performed beyond its boundaries, to look to the general laws and municipal charter for the requisite authority. In certain instances, owing to the urgency of extreme expediency or necessity, express authority is dispensed with and the power of the municipality to perform certain acts beyond its boundary is implied as incidental to the existence of other powers expressly granted. Thus, it has been held that, where a municipality has power to construct sewers, it may, as an implied incident to such power, extend the same beyond its boundaries when necessary or manifestly desirable. McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 44 P. 358, 31 L.R.A. 794, 53 Am.St.Rep. 191; City of Coldwater v. Tucker, 36 Mich. 474; Cochran v. Village of Park Ridge, 138 Ill. 295, 27 N.E. 939; 4 McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, § 1434." Ebrite v. Crawford, 215 Cal. 724, 728-729, 12 P.2d 937; In re Blois, 179 Cal. 291, 295, 176 P. 449; Raynor v. City of Arcata, 11 Cal.2d 113, 120, 77 P.2d 1054. In In re Blois, 179 Cal. 291, 296, 176 P. 449, 451, we said that we were "disposed to agree" and "to concede that municipalities may exercise certain extraterritorial powers when the possession and exercise of such powers are essential to the proper conduct of the affairs of the municipality. As, for example, this court has held that a municipality has power to construct and maintain a system of waterworks outside of its boundaries for the supply of its inhabitants with water, and that it might even go to the extent of supplying water to persons living without the limits of such municipality. City of South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land, etc. Co., 152 Cal. 579, 93 P. 490."

It clearly appears that the city was exercising the police power of the state by express grant of power as set forth in section 10101 of the Public Utilities Code as augmented by the provisions of its own charter and, that even had there not been such an express grant of power, the authority would be implied from the nature of the work undertaken under the police power. There can be no question but that it was imperative that the city's sewage disposal system connect with the Hyperion disposal plant and that such an exercise of the police power would have carried with it, by necessary implication, the power to act without its boundaries in making the connection. As we said in McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 163, 44 P. 358, 359, 31 L.R.A. 794, where disposition of the outfall of the sewage system outside the city limits was involved, "Proper sewers are in this day so essential to the hygiene and sanitation of a municipality that a court would not look to see whether a power to construct and maintain them had been granted by the charter, but rather only to see whether by possibility the power had been expressly denied."

The company contends that the city has neither a contractual right, nor the police power, to compel a utility to relocate its pipes without compensating the utility when both the pipes of the utility and the sewage system of the city are without the city limits. The company argues that its franchise from the county vested certain rights in it and contained only one limitation—that of bearing the expense of relocation of its lines if the county changed the grade of any highway. In other words, it is contended that its rights under the franchise from the county are by reason of the contract and are limited only by the terms of the contract. The city, on the other hand, maintains that the use by a public utility of public streets is subservient to the public use; that if the company's argument had merit it would mean that a city, or county, could impair or surrender its fundamental police power by contract. The city relies upon the case of New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Drainage Commission, 197 U.S. 453, 25 S.Ct. 471, 472, 49 L.Ed. 831, in support of its position. The court there said: "It is the contention of the plaintiff in error that, having acquired the franchise and availed itself of the right to locate its pipes under the streets of the city, it has thereby acquired a property right which cannot be taken from it by a shifting of some of its mains and pipes from their location to accommodate the drainage system, without compensation for the cost of such changes. It is not contended that the gas company has acquired such a property right as will prevent the drainage commission, in the exercise of the police power granted to it by the state, from removing the pipes so as to make room for its work, but it is insisted that this can only be done upon terms of compensation for the cost of removal." The Supreme Court of the United States, speaking of the case of New Orleans Gas-Light Co. v. Louisiana Light & Heat Producing & Manufacturing Co., 115 U.S. 650, 671, 6 S.Ct. 252, 29 L.Ed. 516, said: "Except that the privilege was conferred to use the streets in laying the pipes in some places thereunder, there was nothing in the terms of the grant to indicate the intention of the state to give up its control of the public streets, certainly not so far as such power might be required by proper regulations to control their use for legitimate purposes connected with the public health and safety." And, quoting from the same case, it was said: "The constitutional prohibition upon state laws impairing the obligation of contracts does not restrict the power of the State to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, as the one or the other may be involved in the execution of such contracts. Rights and privileges arising from contracts with a state are subject to regulations for the protection of the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, in the same sense and to the same extent as are all contracts and all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations.'" The court further said: "The drainage of a city in the interest of the public health and welfare is one of the most important purposes for which the police power can be exercised. The drainage commission, in carrying out this important work, it has been held by the supreme court of the state, is engaged in the execution of the police power of the state." And "It is admitted that in the exercise of this power there has been no more interference with the property of the gas company than has been necessary to the carrying out of the drainage plan. There is no showing that the value of the property of the gas company has been depreciated, nor that it has suffered any deprivation further than the expense which was rendered necessary by the changing of the location of the pipes to accommodate the work of the drainage commission. The police power, in so far as its exercise is essential to the health of the community, it has been held cannot be contracted away. New York & N. E. Railroad Co. v. Town of Bristol, 151 U.S. 556, 567, 14 S.Ct. 437, 38 L.Ed. 269; Butchers' Union Co. v. Crescent City Co., 111 U.S. 746, 751, 4 S.Ct. 652, 28 L.Ed. 585; Stone v. State of Mississippi, 101 U.S. 814, 816, 25 L.Ed. 1079. In a large city like New Orleans, situated as it is, and the entrepôt of an extensive commerce coming from many foreign countries, it is of the highest importance that the public health shall be safeguarded by all proper means. It would be unreasonable to suppose that in the grant to the gas company of the right to use the streets in the laying of its pipes it was ever intended to surrender or impair the public right to discharge the duty of conserving the public health. The gas company did not acquire any specific location in the streets; it was content with the general right to use them; and when it located its pipes it was at the risk that they might be, at some future time, disturbed, when the state might require for a necessary public use that changes in location be made. * *

"The need of occupation of the soil beneath the streets in cities is constantly increasing, for the supply of water and light and the construction of systems of sewerage and drainage; and every reason of public policy requires that grants of rights in such subsurface shall be held subject to such reasonable regulation as the public health and safety may require. There is nothing in the grant to the gas company, even if it could legally be done, undertaking to limit the right of the state to establish a system of drainage in the streets. We think whatever right the gas company acquired was subject, in so far as the location of its pipes was concerned, to such future regulations as might be required in the interest of the public health and welfare. These views are amply sustained by the authorities." (Emphasis added.) Speaking of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 166 U.S. 226, 254, 17 S.Ct. 581, 41 L.Ed. 831, the court said: "In the latter case it was held that uncompensated obedience to a regulation enacted for the public safety under the police power of the state was not taking property without due compensation. In our view, that is all there is to this case. The gas company, by its grant from the city, acquired no exclusive right to the location of its pipes in the streets, as chosen by it, under a general grant of authority to use the streets. The city made no contract that the gas company should not be disturbed in the location chosen. In the exercise of the police power of the state, for a purpose highly necessary in the promotion of the public health, it has become necessary to change the location of the pipes of the gas company so as to accommodate them to the new public work. In complying with this requirement at its own expense, none of the property of the gas company has been taken, and the injury sustained is damnum absque injuria."

Company argues that its franchise gave it vested rights which cannot be taken away without payment of compensation. In

Russell v. Sebastian, 233 U.S. 195, 204, 34 S.Ct. 517, 520, 58 L.Ed. 912, relied upon by company in support of its contention, a gas company operating under a provision of the Constitution of California sought to lay additional pipes in streets not theretofore used by it. The city of Los Angeles, by ordinance, prohibited, in effect, the use by the company of the streets not theretofore used by it. The Supreme Court held that the grant to the gas company which resulted from an acceptance of the state's offer constituted a contract and vested in the company a property right "protected by the Federal Constitution, is not open to dispute in view of the repeated decisions of this court." The effect of the municipal ordinance in the Russell case was to take away from the gas company its right to extend its mains and lines into additional streets in order to provide additional service to the people. No such rights are involved in the case at bar. We are here concerned merely with a relocation of existing lines in order to make way for a sewage system being constructed for the benefit of the public. The company's vested property right here is to continue its lines and installations at some, rather than a specific, location within the public streets. By such a relocation, property "is not, within the meaning of the constitution, taken for public use, nor is the owner deprived of it without due process of law." Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 166 U.S. 226, 17 S.Ct. 581, 591, 41 L.Ed. 979. In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. State of Illinois ex rel. Grimwood, 200 U.S. 561, 584, 26 S.Ct. 341, 346, 50 L.Ed. 596, 605 the court said that it had "recognized the principle that injury may often come to private property as the result of legitimate governmental action, reasonably taken for the public good and for no other purpose, and yet there will be no taking of such property within the meaning of the constitutional guaranty against the deprivation of property without due process of law, or against the taking of private property for public use without compensation. To this class belongs the recent, and, as we think, decisive case of New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Drainage Commission * * *." And, 200 U.S. at pages 593, 594, 26 S.Ct. at page 350, 50 L.Ed. at pages 609, 610, "Upon the general subject there is no real conflict among the adjudged cases. Whatever conflict there is arises upon the question whether there has been or will be in the particular case, within the true meaning of the Constitution, a 'taking' of private property for public use. If the injury complained of is only incidental to the legitimate exercise of governmental powers for the public good, then there is no taking of property for the public use, and a right to compensation, on account of such injury, does not attach under the Constitution."

The company in support of its argument that its vested rights cannot be impaired without compensation also cites the case of City of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corp., 251 U.S. 32, 39, 40 S.Ct. 76, 79, 64 L.Ed. 121, that "A franchise conveys rights and if their exercise could be prevented or destroyed by a simple declaration of a municipal council, they would be infirm indeed in tenure and substance. It is to be remembered that they came into existence by compact, having, therefore, its sanction, urged by reciprocal benefits, and are attended and can only be exercised by expenditure of money, making them a matter of investments and property, and entitled as such against being taken without the proper process of law—the payment of compensation." In the City of Los Angeles case, supra, a clear distinction exists which was specifically noted by the court: "what the city did was done not in its governmental capacity—an exercise of the police power—but in its 'proprietary or quasi private capacity' and that therefore the city was subordinate in right to the corporation, the latter being an earlier and lawful occupant of the field. The difference in the capacities is recognized and the difference in attendant powers pointed out in decisions of this court. Vilas v. City of Manila, 220 U.S. 345, 31 S.Ct. 416, 55 L.Ed. 491; Russell v. Sebastian, 233 U.S. 195, 34 S.Ct. 517, 58 L.Ed. 912; State of South Carolina v. United States, 199 U.S. 437, 26 S.Ct. 110, 50 L.Ed. 261; New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Drainage Commission, 197 U.S. 453, 25 S.Ct. 471, 49 L.Ed. 831; City of Vicksburg v. Vicksburg Waterworks Co., 206 U.S. 496, 508, 27 S.Ct. 762, 51 L.Ed. 1155." 251 U.S. at pages 38, 39, 40 S.Ct. at page 78. The city in the instant case was acting in its governmental capacity—in the exercise of police powers granted to it by the state—and in the interests of the public health and welfare. The city, in the City of Los Angeles case, supra, sought to establish a lighting system of its own. It was noted that the only question was "whether the city may as a matter of public right and without compensation clear a 'space' for the instrumentalities of its system by removing or relocating the instrumentalities of other systems." 251 U.S. at page 37, 40 S.Ct. at page 78. It was specifically held: "It will be observed that we are not concerned with the duty of the corporation operating a public utility to yield uncompensated obedience to a police measure adopted for the protection of the public, but with a proposed uncompensated taking or disturbance of what belongs to one lighting system in order to make way for another. And this the Fourteenth Amendment forbids. What the grant was at its inception it remained and was not subject to be displaced by some other system, even that of the city, without compensation to the corporation for the rights appropriated." 251 U.S. at page 40, 40 S.Ct. at page 79.

Company next argues that the state cannot impair the obligation of its contracts without compensation. From this argument company reasons that because its franchise contained only one condition—the relocation of its installations at its own expense in the event of changes in the highway grade—no other conditions may be imposed. It will be recalled that this point was specifically considered in the case of New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Drainage Commission, 197 U.S. 453, 25 S.Ct. 471, 473, 49 L.Ed. 831, where it was held that "The police power, in so far as its exercise is essential to the health of the community, it has been held cannot be contracted away" and that "There is nothing in the grant to the gas company, even if it could legally be done, undertaking to limit the right of the state to establish a system of drainage in the streets. We think whatever right the gas company acquired was subject, in so far as the location of its pipes was concerned, to such future regulations as might be required in the interest of the public health and welfare." Company contends that the rules set forth in the New Orleans Gas Light case have been "disposed of very tersely" by the case of Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co. v. State Highway Commission, 294 U.S. 613, 55 S.Ct. 563, 79 L.Ed. 1090. The Panhandle case involved a Delaware corporation which had obtained, by purchase, rights of ways from owners of property to construct and maintain conduits for transporting natural gas. In 1930 it purchased rights of way for pipes, auxiliary telephone lines, etc. After the pipes were in operation, the Highway Commission of Kansas, in 1933, pursuant to statute adopted plans for new highways across the company's rights of way in several places. The state obtained permission from the owners of the fee to use the land obtained for the highways, but the company refused to permit the use of its right of way. The state court had held that the new highways were being constructed under the police power of the state and that the necessary relocation of the company's installations at company expense did not constitute a taking of private property without due process of law. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the state court holding (294 U.S. at page 619, 55 S.Ct. at page 566) that "A claim that action is being taken under the police power of the state cannot justify disregard of constitutional inhibitions." It can readily be seen that there are important distinctions between the Panhandle case and the New Orleans Gas Light case and the case at bar. In the Panhandle case the company had purchased rights of way from private owners of land for its installations. In the New Orleans Gas Light case and the case at bar, the companies were granted permission to use the subsurface of public roads already in existence. In the Panhandle case, the state desired to construct new highways over the private rights of way previously acquired by the company. The acquisition of and construction of public highways does not come within the purview of the police power but is accomplished under the power of eminent domain embraced within section 14 of article I of the Constitution of the State of California. See Rose v. State of California, 19 Cal.2d 713, 123 P.2d 505; Beals v. City of Los Angeles, 23 Cal. 2d 381, 144 P.2d 839; Bacich v. Board of Control, 23 Cal.2d 343, 144 P.2d 818; People v. Ricciardi, 23 Cal.2d 390, 144 P.2d 799. The Supreme Court of the United States did not overrule, either directly or indirectly, the New Orleans Gas Light case, but distinguished it as being within the purview of the exercise of the police power as follows: "New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Drainage Commission, 197 U.S. 453, 25 S.Ct. 471, 49 L.Ed. 831, and similar cases concerning pipes in public streets, are not controlling. In them the pipes were laid upon agreement, actual or implied, that the owner would make reasonable changes when directed by the municipality." (294 U.S. at page 623, 55 S.Ct. at page 567.)

It was specifically pointed out in the New Orleans Gas Light case that the police power of the sovereignty could not be contracted away and that any franchise, such as we have under consideration here, must be considered, insofar as location of gas installations is concerned, to have been acquired subject to such future regulations as might be required in the interest of the public health and welfare. As the Supreme Court said in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 166 U.S. 226, 254, 17 S.Ct. 581, 41 L.Ed. 979, uncompensated obedience to a regulation enacted for the public safety under the police power of the state was not taking property without due compensation. This holding was again stated and approved in New Orleans Public Service v. City of New Orleans, 281 U.S. 682, 687, 50 S.Ct. 449, 74 L.Ed. 1115.

Both the city and company rely upon Merced Falls Gas & Electric Co. v. Turner, 2 Cal.App. 720, 721, 723, 724, 84 P. 239, 240, in support of their positions. The Merced case involved the relocation of some electric light poles on a city street. The company brought an action to enjoin the city and, after declining to amend its complaint, judgment was entered upon defendant city's demurrers. The court noted that "The sole contention of appellant [company] in both appeals involves the power of the city authorities to compel or make the change in question." The court, in holding that the city had the power to compel the relocation of the poles, said: "But the Constitution in providing for the exercise and enjoyment of the franchise owned by appellant [company], did not grant an absolute indefeasible right or easement in the particular spots of earth where its poles were planted originally, nor does the grant contain a hint that the superintendent of streets, or other officer in control thereof, exhausted his jurisdiction or power to direct or control the use of the streets by appellant, when the poles were located in the first instance. * * * and therefore such regulations, or the absence of them, cannot limit or annul the general power granted to the municipality, to direct and control the manner in which the streets shall be used, and the franchise exercised. Courts will not hesitate to stay the arm of municipal power when any attempt to curtail or deny the constitutional right is made manifest or a clear abuse of discretion is shown. But they will as unhesitatingly frown upon the doctrine that the constitutional provision in question must be construed as an abdication or denial of power on the part of cities to widen, straighten, beautify and improve streets and sidewalks, and to compel property owners of every class and kind to conform to all reasonable regulations redounding to the general good." Company relies on the following language from the same case: "It may be contended that the averment of irreparable injury sufficiently shows that the regulation is unreasonable and confiscatory. The damage which has already accrued is estimated at $1,000, and it is difficult to guess why the sum total of damage resulting from the removal of all the poles may not be as easily estimated and compensated." From this company argues that the holding of the case is that the company there was entitled to damages accruing by reason of the relocation of its poles. The case cannot be construed as contended for by company since the question of the cost of relocating the poles was not involved. The only contention made there was that the city did not have the power to compel the company to relocate its poles and any statement which did not bear upon that question is clearly dictum. Company cites many other cases in support of its position, none of which is in point. Stockton Gas & Electric Co. v. Los Angeles County Flood Control Dist., 25 Cal.2d 384, 153 P.2d 950, involved an action in inverse condemnation for damages sustained by plaintiff because of the negligence of the defendant in the planning and construction of certain flood control channel work in the Los Angeles River. This case in effect overruled the Archer case, supra. *Hossom v. Company's arguments concerning statutory authority for payment of compensation for utility relocations are of no avail here and it is only necessary to point out that no such statutory authority exists to cover the situation with which we are here concerned.

For the foregoing reasons I am compelled to join with the majority and vote for a reversal of the judgment with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for the defendant city.

Hearing Denied Oct. 28, 1958.

Action to terminate purchasers' rights and interest under contract for sale of timber, for an accounting, and for restitution, wherein others, claiming an interest in the timber, intervened. The Superior Court, Mendocino County, Lilburn Gibson, J., rendered judgment declaring rescission of contract and that since date of notice of rescission, plaintiff had been the owner in fee simple and entitled to possession of the land and timber standing thereon, and defendants and intervenors appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Van Dyke, P. J., held that the record supported finding that breaches of purchaser's obligations under contract to commence and complete logging operations within reasonable time, account for timber cut and removed, and pay for such timber promptly and periodically were so material as to constitute a failure of consideration and entitle owner of land to rescind contract and obtain restitution.

1. Assignments ⇨137

In action to terminate, because of material breach by purchasers, their rights and interest under contract for sale of timber, evidence supported finding that one of purchasers had assigned his interest in contract to copurchaser and that assignor's grantee acquired no interest in timber by virtue of quitclaim deed by which assignor subsequently conveyed his interest in timber to another.

2. Logs and Logging ⇨3(15)

In action to terminate, because of material breach by purchasers, their rights and interest under contract for sale of timber, record supported construction of contract as requiring purchasers to commence and complete logging operations within reasonable time, fixed by court as one and three years respectively.

3. Contracts ⇨324(1)

The purpose of "restitution" as a remedy for breach of contract is to restore injured party to as good a position as he occupied before contract was made by money judgment for value of any performance rendered by plaintiff and received by defendant or by return of specific property, without compensating plaintiff for consequential harm.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Restitution".

This is an appeal from a judgment declaring the rescission in fact of a contract whereby the predecessor in interest of plaintiff-respondent agreed to sell to Henry Thompson and Jack Edsell the merchantable timber upon land in Mendocino County.

The contract made August 15, 1949, read as follows:

"This agreement entered into between H. C. Crofoot (Seller) and Henry Thompson and Jack Edsell (Purchasers) this 15th day of August 1949, whereby Purchasers agree to pay $500.00 at above date, $5.00 a thousand stumpage (Spalding Scale) for all merchantable timber and $2.00 per thousand (Spalding Scale) for all timber not classified as merchantable timber. The Tan Oak is to be purchased at the prevailing price at time of cutting. Said timber is located in the County of Mendocino, State of California, and said timber is described as follows:

"Lots 11, 12, 24 of Section 19, W $\frac{1}{2}$  of SW $\frac{1}{4}$ , NE $\frac{1}{2}$  of SW $\frac{1}{4}$ , Section 20, Township 16 North, Range 14 West, Mount Diablo Base and Meridian.

"Seller agrees to furnish all rights of way to remove said timber. Above stumpage price for said timber to be paid for on the 1st and 15th of each month on all timber removed from premises."

[1] Thompson and Edsell immediately entered the land and began what is referred to as a "split stuff" operation which consists of felling trees sufficiently clear and choice that the logs may be split into such products as pickets, stakes and shakes. The two men worked together about four weeks and made approximately 5,000 grape stakes. Edsell then became ill and left. He never returned. He testified that when he left he turned everything over to Thompson, saying to him, "Henry, you take over. It is yours." Thompson assented to the arrangement and Edsell left. He does not appear in the picture again until six years later when he was located by appellant Lewis who obtained from him for $250 a quitclaim deed to his interest in the timber. From the testimony of Thompson and Edsell as to Edsell's abandonment of the enterprise and his statement that he was turning his interest over to Thompson and the subsequent conduct of both, indicating mutual understanding that Edsell was no longer interested, and from the minimal consideration paid by Lewis for Edsell's quitclaim deed, the trial court found as a fact that Edsell, when he left, had assigned his interest in the contract to Thompson and that Lewis took no interest in the timber by virtue of the quitclaim. We hold the evidence was amply sufficient to support this finding of assignment.

Thompson continued on the land and continued his split stuff operation, working alone except for a short period when another man worked with him. Although he sold the products of his labor he was quite remiss in accounting therefor. On April 3, 1950, he paid respondent's predecessor $127.11, stating that from August 15, 1949 to April 3, 1950, he had removed a total of only 25,725 board feet of timber. On December 20, 1951, he paid $335.94, stating that since his last payment he had removed 67,188 board feet. On October 29, 1952, he paid $214.58 to cover a claimed cutting of 42,915 board feet. Shortly thereafter one Banks, a woods boss for Crofoot, was sent to examine the timber. He determined the amount of timber Thompson had cut far exceeded the amounts he had reported. At this time, therefore, Thompson stood in default, both in his duty to pay regularly on the 1st and 15th of each month and in his duty to account and pay for all timber taken. Banks believed him to have been guilty of concealment and false reports and endeavored to ascertain the exact conditions with respect to Thompson's operations. He demanded of Thompson that he bring in his books in order that a proper accounting might be made. Thompson agreed to do this but broke this promise also. Finally, in 1953, he told Banks that he was not obligated to make accountings and suggested that Banks see his lawyer. He continued his spasmodic removal of timber and about mid-1954 Crofoot (who had become the successor in interest to its predecessor) cruised the timber. The cruise indicated that, although reporting a total of only 135,828 board feet of timber, Thompson had actually taken approximately 350,000 board feet.

[2] The trial court construed the written agreement, in connection with evidence introduced as to the circumstances attending its execution, as requiring that Thompson should begin logging the timber land within a reasonable time which the court fixed as one year; and as further requiring that logging, once begun, should be completed within a reasonable time which the court fixed as three years. From the record we hold that the trial court correctly construed the contract. Thompson was in default as to both contractual obligations, and there was substantial evidence that Thompson's operation had resulted and would result in waste if continued since merchantable parts of logs which would not split were being left to rot in the woods. On the 17th of August, 1954, Banks for Crofoot, visited the timber land and told Thompson that for his defaults respondent had rescinded the contract and that Thompson had no further interest in the timber.

On October 1, 1954, Thompson sent in to Crofoot a statement that between October 29, 1952, and October 1, 1954, he had cut 83,925 board feet, and he accompanied his statement with a payment of $477.83. Crofoot retained the payment, crediting the sum as a past due payment for timber taken prior to rescission.

On October 28, 1954, the present action was instituted. Crofoot joined Thompson, Edsell and several fictitiously named defendants. The first count in the complaint related the making of the timber sale agreement, the succession of Crofoot to the ownership of the real property and the allegation that Thompson and Edsell had breached the agreement by failing to pay for timber taken, by failing to pay in accordance with the rate of payment agreed upon and by failing to log the land. It was further alleged that by reason of the breaches of contract, Crofoot had elected to declare the contract and the interest of said defendants terminated. An accounting for timber taken was requested, and by a separate cause of action Crofoot sought a decree quieting its title against all defendants. Thompson answered, denying that the contract had ever been terminated as to him. He prayed that Crofoot take nothing. Edsell answered, alleging that on October 7, 1955, he had transferred his interest in the contract to Lewis and asserting that Crofoot and its predecessor in interest had waived the contract provisions for periodic payments by repeatedly receiving irregular payments. Lewis, by leave of court, intervened, setting up the transfer of Edsell's interest to himself, asserting the contract still to be in full force and asking that he be adjudged to be the owner of the interest quitclaimed to him. Later Thompson and Lewis amended their answers to allege a waiver by Crofoot and its predecessor of regular payments by receipt of irregular payments.

Upon these pleadings the cause went to trial and just prior to the close of evidence the court permitted Crofoot to amend its complaint to conform to proof. By the amendments there was pleaded breach of the contract obligation to pay regularly, to pay fully for timber taken, to fully account, and to seasonably begin and complete logging. Crofoot further asserted that by reason of the breaches thereof, the contract had, on August 17, 1954, been terminated and rescinded and that the preexisting rights of the defendants had ended. The trial court gave judgment that since the 17th day of August, 1954, Crofoot had been the owner in fee simple and entitled to the possession of the land and the timber standing thereon; that the claims of Thompson, Edsell and Lewis and of all others claiming under them were without right and enjoining those persons from asserting such claims. The court gave Crofoot a money judgment against Thompson in the sum of $1,911.63 for timber taken and unpaid for by him. Thereafter a motion for new trial was denied and this appeal followed.

Since the contentions on appeal revolve around the issue of unilateral termination for breach, we will summarize the findings on that issue. The court found that under the terms of the contract Thompson and Edsell agreed to remove the timber through a logging operation and split stuff operation within a reasonable time; that they agreed to commence said operation immediately and to pay for timber so removed on the 1st and 15th of each month at the specified stumpage rates; that the purchasers went into possession for the purpose of logging and removing timber under the contract; that Crofoot had fully performed the contract; that upon entering the property the purchasers commenced the hand manufacture of split stuff; that approximately four weeks after the making of the contract Edsell assigned all his interest to Thompson, after which date his interests were owned by Thompson; that on October 7, 1955, Edsell for $250 attempted to transfer to Lewis by quitclaim deed such interest as he might have under the contract, but that on said date he had no interest; that on February 21, 1956, Lewis purported to deed a half interest in the alleged rights obtained from Edsell to one Rawles; that because the quitclaim deed of Edsell to Lewis conveyed no interest, the purported transfer from Lewis to Rawles created no interest in Rawles; that at no time before the commencement of the action by Crofoot against Thompson, Edsell and fictitiously named defendants did Thompson transfer to Lewis or Rawles or Edsell any interest in or under the contract; that neither Lewis nor Rawles ever acquired any interest under the contract; that among the material obligations to be performed by Thompson were the obligations to pay for all timber removed, to pay therefor on the 1st and 15th of each month, to commence the removal of all timber within a reasonable time, and to complete the same within a reasonable time; that Thompson failed to perform every one of the above obligations and breached the contract in respect of each; that each breach constituted a material breach of the agreement; that Thompson manufactured split products continuously from August 15, 1949, removing timber from the subject land and utilizing it; that he failed and refused to make payments on the 1st and 15th of each month although demands had been made therefor; that he made payments on April 3, 1950, December 20, 1951, and October 29, 1952, and between the period August 15, 1949, to August 17, 1954, had sold 412,089 board feet of split products and had removed that amount of timber from the subject property, paying for only 135,530 board feet; that a reasonable time to have commenced logging operations was one year from August 17, 1954; that such operations had not begun by August 17, 1954; that a reasonable time within which the purchasers were obligated to have completed logging operations was the period of three years and that prior to August 17, 1954, Thompson had failed and refused to commence seasonably or complete the same; that on August 17, 1954, Crofoot, as successor in interest to the sellers under the contract, rescinded the contract by notice to Thompson, and that since said date the contract stood as rescinded and terminated, all rights thereunder having ceased by virtue of Crofoot's election to rescind for the breaches found; that the breaches of the contract were each and all material and each and all constituted a material failure of consideration; that on October 1, 1954, after rescission, Thompson paid Crofoot $477.83; that said sum did not cure the default of Thompson, and Crofoot retained the sum by giving credit therefor to Thompson; that Thompson still owes for timber removed up to the date of rescission the net sum of $404.97; and that after rescission and during the pendency of this action Thompson continued to remove timber for split products manufactured by him up to February, 1956.

The court further found that during the year 1956 Thompson, Lewis and others had removed substantial quantities of timber from Crofoot's property, but that the removal thereof was the subject matter of another action pending before the court, and that damages accruing for such removal would be determined in that action and not considered in this.

The foregoing reference in the findings to "others" who were found to have acted with Thompson and Lewis in removing substantial quantities of timber during the year 1956 apparently is to William Moores, William Smith, individually and in co-partnership as Moores and Smith, Hollow Tree Lumber Company, a corporation, and Don Ford, who, purporting to act under the rights of Thompson and Lewis, went upon the property in February of 1956 during the pendency of the action and removed about four and one-half million board feet of timber in a few months. These people filed no pleading in this action, but after judgment was rendered purported to move for a new trial along with Thompson, Edsell and Lewis. After denial of their motion they purported to take an appeal, making the same demand for transcript as Thompson, Edsell and Lewis. They have also filed briefs on appeal herein, asking that the judgment be set aside. So far as the record before us is concerned, it shows no right in these parties to appeal. Crofoot, however, has raised no objection to their participation herein, and since all the points raised by them are also raised by the appellants of record, we shall not further comment on their status.

[3] The action brought by Crofoot was essentially one based upon its election to consider itself discharged from further duty of performance on its part because of Thompson's breaches which Crofoot considered to be breaches of such vital importance as to justify its action in declaring the contract at an end. Having done this, Crofoot sought the alternative remedy for breach, resting in a court decree restoring to it its possession and ownership of the timber on its land. At the time the action was brought, Thompson still maintained possession and continued to cut and remove timber. The general subject of restitution as a remedy for breach of contract is treated in Corbin on Contracts, sections 1102-1121, inclusive. There it is stated in section 1102 at page 455:

"* * * The purpose of this remedy is the restoration of the injured party to as good a position as was occupied by him before the contract was made, without attempting to compensate him for consequential harms; the means to this end is a judgment for the equivalent in money of any performance rendered by the plaintiff and received by the defendant (or in some cases for the return of specific property) * * *."

And in section 1104, pages 461-462:

"* * * [W]e are dealing with restitution as a remedy for breach of contract; a judgment for such restitution is as truly a remedy for a 'breach' as is a judgment for damages. It is true that the courts have often said, and a plaintiff has often alleged, that the contract has been 'rescinded' by the injured party because of the defendant's vital breach. Such a 'rescission' as this is essentially different from one that is based on mutual agreement, both in its operative facts and in its legal effects. Such a 'rescission' is merely an assertion by the injured party that the other has committed a vital breach, that he himself has been discharged from the duty of further performance, and that he asks for a restitutionary remedy. If he desires, he can make identically the same assertions and ask for 'damages' instead of restitution. Also, he may properly ask for damages or restitution in the alternative, leaving his final choice to be made at the actual trial of the case."

Civil Code, section 1688, reads: "A contract is extinguished by its rescission." Section 1689 of that code provides in part as follows:

"A party to a contract may rescind the same in the following cases only:

"2. If, through the fault of the party as to whom he rescinds, the consideration for his obligation fails, in whole or in part; * * *".

[4-7] By the contract there was transferred to Thompson and Edsell a valuable right to enter upon the land and to remove therefrom all the merchantable timber thereon, which removal when effected would substantially reduce the value of the land. Whether this contract conveyed title to the timber as contended for by appellants or constituted a right to cut and remove and thus obtain title to the timber as taken is not material to the decision of this case. In either event Thompson and Edsell received a valuable property right. In connection with it they assumed material obligations heretofore related. They took possession of the land and retained it up to and after the commencement of the action. The right of the injured party to claim release from obligations to elect to terminate the contract depends upon the gravity of the breach. * Says Corbin, section 1104, page 464:

"* * * In the case of a breach by non-performance, however, assuming that there has been no repudiation, the injured party's alternative remedy by way of restitution depends upon the extent of the non-performance by the defendant. The defendant's breach may be nothing but a failure to perform some minor part of his contractual duty. Such a minor non-performance is a breach of contract and an action for damages can be maintained. The injured party, however, can not maintain an action for restitution of what he has given the defendant unless the defendant's non-performance is so material that it is held to go to the 'essence'; it must be such a breach as would discharge the injured party from any further contractual duty on his own part * * *."

[8] In this case the trial court found that Thompson's various breaches of his obligation were material and did constitute a failure of consideration. We think the record supports this. Thompson and Edsell when they entered the land (and after Edsell's assignment, Thompson alone) stood charged with reasonable dispatch in the harvesting of timber on the land and the payment therefor as harvested. From the beginning the purchasers breached not only the obligations to harvest and pay for the timber, but also the implied obligations of honorable, fair conduct towards their seller. The entire course of conduct immediately adopted and continuously sustained was violative of every obligation they had assumed. The trial court, as appears in its memorandum opinion, was much impressed with the complete infidelity of Thompson in respect of his obligations, and we think no one can read the record and not be likewise impressed. Said the trial court:

"* * * Mr. Thompson has not lived up to a single term of the contract, brief as it is. He did not pay for all timber removed by him from the premises; he did not make payments on the 1st and 15th of each month for timber removed; and he did not remove timber within a reasonable time, and did not complete the contract in a reasonable time. Each one of these breaches went to the very roots of the contract and constituted a material violation thereof and each constituted a ground for rescission."

It is true that plaintiff and its predecessor appear to have been overly indulgent of Thompson's shortcomings, to say the least, and Thompson and those interested under him vigorously insist that therefrom in some manner arise rights of Thompson to continue in his wrongful conduct until and unless the owner of the land and the timber restored a right to have the contract performed. They appear to argue that by reason of long indulgence there arose a hiatus in Thompson's contractual obligations, a sort of license for continued wrongdoing. We cannot read the record in that light. Thompson's disregard of his contractual duties was consistent, persistent and wilful, as is shown by his response to demands that he reveal and account for quantities of timber he was taking. Civil Code, section 1691, contains the following language:

"Rescission, when not effected by consent, can be accomplished only by the use, on the part of the party rescinding, of reasonable diligence to comply with the following rules:

"1. He must rescind promptly, upon discovering the facts which entitled him to rescind, * * *

And upon this subject Corbin says:

"Even though the breach by one party is a repudiation of the contract or is otherwise so substantial as to discharge the other party from further duty, it is not necessary for him to seek a judicial remedy at once or to elect immediately among the remedies that may be available. If, however, his own conduct is such as to be operative as a waiver of condition, so that his own duty to continue performance is restored, his right to the remedy of restitution is suspended although he may still have a right of action for damages. Whether his conduct actually operates as a waiver may be a difficult problem. It is often reasonable for him to hope for a retraction of the repudiation or to expect that a defective performance will be cured by the other party. If his hope and expectation are not realized he may still treat the breach as a vital one and have the same choice of remedies as he had originally." Section 1104, pages 466-467.

[9,10] Generally, the question of diligence depends upon the facts of a particular case. Spadoni v. Maggenti, 121 Cal. App. 147, 8 P.2d 874. The lapse of time is not the sole consideration in determining diligence. Beardsley v. Clem, 137 Cal. 328, 70 P. 175. We think the trial court is supported by the record in its implied finding that under the facts of this case Crofoot, when it acted to terminate the contract and entitle itself to the remedy of specific restitution, had the right to do so. There is in this record no showing whatever that Thompson changed his position in reliance upon indulgence; that he evinced any intention of performing his contract; that he changed in any degree his habit of violation or that he was not aware at all times of the wrongful nature of his conduct. For instance, when finally Banks became insistent that he account for timber taken, Thompson, having already promised and failed to do so on a number of occasions, referred Banks to Thompson's lawyer, a remark which the trial court aptly characterized as one frequently made by those who know they are in trouble. In this case it was within the power of the trial court to find as a matter of fact that Crofoot was not disqualified to terminate the contract through lack of diligence.

[11] Appellants contend that the judgment appealed from worked a forfeiture of Thompson's interest in the timber on Crofoot's land. This is not so. Thompson's conduct gave to Crofoot the option to consider itself relinquished from all obligations to him and to terminate the contract between them, by the faithful performance of which alone Thompson could maintain and capitalize his right to take Crofoot's timber. When that had been done which the court declared was rightfully done, the cessation of the rights and interest of Thompson occurred, but occurred because of his own wrongful conduct.

The judgment appealed from, therefore, does not declare a forfeiture.

There are other contentions advanced by appellants. We think that they are not only without merit, but that they do not require specific discussion.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

1. Automobiles $\Rightarrow$ 246(30)

In action for wrongful death of one struck by automobile, plaintiff's requested instruction that defense of contributory negligence is affirmative defense, and if it has not been established by preponderance of evidence, finding must be in plaintiff's favor on that issue, should have been given.

2. Negligence $\Rightarrow$ 135(2)

Burden of proving defense of contributory negligence by preponderance of evidence is constant.

3. Negligence $\Rightarrow$ 135(5)

In order to prove contributory negligence, it must appear from preponderance of whole evidence that party injured by defendant's negligence was himself guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to his injuries.

4. Negligence $\Rightarrow$ 122(2), 141(1)

Burden of proving defense of contributory negligence may be satisfied by evidence produced by plaintiff alone if jury finds from plaintiff's own evidence that probabilities are in favor of such contributory negligence and of its having proximately contributed to injuries; but plaintiff is entitled to have jury instructed that, from whatever source evidence of contributory negligence comes, jury can only find defense established if it finds preponderance of evidence in favor of that defense.

5. Automobiles $\Rightarrow$ 246(4, 22, 30)

In action for wrongful death of one struck by automobile while crossing highway, instruction that, in determining whether negligence, contributory negligence or proximate cause has been proved by preponderance of evidence, jury should consider all evidence on subject regardless of who produced it and if testimony produced by party himself should, in judgment of jury, support finding against him on issue as to which other party has burden of proof, such evidence will support finding, even if other party produced no evidence on subject, would have been appropriate.

6. Negligence ⇨122(2)

Burden of proof does not shift if there is evidence in plaintiff's case from which his contributory negligence may be found, but whatever source of negligence jury must still find a preponderance of evidence in favor of defense of contributory negligence.

7. Automobiles ⇨246(60)

In action for death of one struck by automobile while crossing highway, instruction that ordinarily burden rests on defendants to prove contributory negligence, the exception being where such contributory negligence, if any, appears from testimony offered on behalf of plaintiff, exclusive of any evidence produced by plaintiff from mouth of defendants was misleading.

8. Automobiles ⇨246(30)

In action for death of one struck by automobile while crossing highway, instruction based on idea that even the slightest degree of negligence of deceased was sufficient to constitute contributory negligence was improper.

9. Appeal and Error ⇨1064(1), 1067

Where court gave misleading instruction on burden of proof of contributory negligence, refused correct instruction on subject requested by plaintiff, and struck from instruction given the sentence which would have clarified fact that burden must be met, whether evidence to satisfy it came from defendant's or plaintiff's witnesses, resolution of issues of contributory negligence and proximate cause was in state of confusion which was prejudicial.

10. Witnesses ⇨387

Although testimony of plaintiff's witness, a police officer, differed in one respect from fact as stated in his written report, where officer had testified to same effect at previous trial and had informed plaintiff's investigator that fact as stated in report was erroneous, refusal to permit plaintiff's cross-examination of her own witness was not an abuse of discretion.

11. Automobiles ⇨243(5)

In action for death of pedestrian who was crossing highway to return to his own automobile which he had parked on shoulder following collision with another vehicle, admission of evidence of details of the deceased's prior accident was error, but mere fact of the accident and testimony tending to show that decedent was emotionally upset when he started to cross highway would have been relevant on question of contributory negligence.

12. Negligence ⇨125

Evidence of previous accidents is properly excluded, since it has no probative value on question of party's negligence in case at issue.

Jack H. Werchick, San Francisco, for appellant.

Boyd, Taylor, Nave & Flageollet, San Francisco, for respondents.

DOOLING, Justice.

Plaintiff, administratrix of the estate of Robert Perrotti, appeals from a judgment for defendant in an action for wrongful death.

The evidence shows that at approximately 8:30 p. m. the decedent was struck and killed by an automobile driven by respondent. This accident occurred on Bayshore Highway, a four-lane road, at the intersection of Belle Avenue in Redwood City. At this time the traffic was light, the weather clear, the visibility good and the roadway dry.

Respondent testified that he was driving in the inner (east) lane of the southbound lanes at a rate of speed of approximately 55 miles per hour. He first saw the decedent "trotting" across the highway from east to west at a distance of from 20 to 40 feet in front of his automobile. Respondent immediately applied his brakes and swerved to the right into the outer (west) lane.

Prior to this fatal accident decedent was involved in another accident, striking the rear of an automobile driven by one Hoffman. Hoffman after the collision parked on the east side of the highway. Decedent parked on the west shoulder and walked across the highway to Hoffman's automobile. He was struck by respondent's car as he was returning to his car.

The skid marks indicated that respondent's automobile stopped 258 feet from the point where there was the first evidence of braking. These marks were entirely in the outer (west) lane and they started from a point approximately 20 feet to the rear of decedent's parked automobile. Appellant's expert witness testified that respondent's automobile must have been in the outer lane for a minimum distance of 200 to 300 feet and traveling at a speed of approximately 70 miles per hour before the brakes were applied.

There was evidence that decedent had been angry and upset after his accident with Hoffman.

The court instructed the jury clearly on the meaning and effect of the burden of proof (BAJI No. 21), and that the burden of proving defendants' negligence and that such negligence was a proximate cause of the accident rested on the plaintiff, with the admonition: "If the plaintiff fails to carry such burden of proof, your verdict must be in favor of the defendants." On the question of burden of proof of contributory negligence the court gave no such clear instruction. The only mention of the burden of proof of contributory negligence was contained in the following instruction given at defendants' request:

"Contributory negligence is the want of ordinary care on the part of a person injured by the actionable negligence of another, combining and concurring with such negligence and proximately contributing to the injuries. Ordinarily, the burden rests upon the defendants to prove contributory negligence, the exception being where such contributory negligence, if any, appears from the testimony offered on behalf of plaintiff, exclusive of any evidence produced by plaintiff from the mouth of defendants."

[1] Plaintiff requested Instruction No. 103-C from BAJI, Fourth Edition, which the trial court refused to give. This proposed instruction would have correctly informed the jury of the burden of proof of contributory negligence in the following language:

"Have in mind also that the defense of contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, and if it has not been established by a preponderance of the evidence, your finding must be in plaintiff's favor on that issue."

[2-4] The burden of proving contributory negligence by a preponderance of the evidence is constant. It must appear from a preponderance of the whole evidence that the party injured by the defendant's negligence was himself guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to his injuries. That burden of proof may be satisfied by the evidence produced by plaintiff alone if the jury finds from plaintiff's own evidence that the probabilities are in favor of such contributory negligence and of its having proximately contributed to the injuries; but the plaintiff is entitled to have the jury instructed that from whatever source the evidence of contributory negligence comes the jury can only find the defense of contributory negligence established if it finds a preponderance of the evidence in favor of that defense. (See the excellent discussion of this subject in the text of 1 BAJI, 4th Edition, page 296, where it is pointed out that an instruction such as that here given "reveals a failure to distinguish between burden of proof as fixed by the affirmative allegations of the pleadings, and the possible methods of proof." The text adds: "It is important to note the distinction between the burden of proof as an obligation or risk imposed by law, and the means by which the burden may be fulfilled. When the burden is yours, it is possible for evidence produced by your adversary to be the means. But the fact that he so helps you, even to making it unnecessary for you to produce any additional evidence, does not change the obligation or risk that you assumed in making the affirmative allegation." Cf. 1 BAJI, 4th Edition, page 306: "Regardless of how the fact may be shown, the burden of proving contributory negligence by a preponderance of evidence rests on the defendant. True, he may be so aided by plaintiff that he need present no evidence on the point himself, but this fact does not shift the burden of proof.")

[5] The proper form of instruction is set out in BAJI, 4th Edition, Number 133, in which the jury is instructed that in determining whether negligence, contributory negligence or proximate cause has been proved by a preponderance of the evidence the jury should consider all of the evidence on the subject regardless of who produced it and if the testimony produced by a party himself should in the judgment of the jury support a finding against him on the issue as to which the other party has the burden of proof such evidence will support a finding, even if the other party produced no evidence on the subject.

The identical instruction on the burden of proof here given was the subject of criticism in Hickenbottom v. Jeppesen, 144 Cal.App.2d 115, 300 P.2d 689. The court in Hickenbottom said of this instruction at page 122 of 144 Cal.App.2d, at page 693 of 300 P.2d: "That language was unfortunate but we do not believe it misled the jury, for it was immediately followed by this definitive statement: 'In other words, the burden of proof is met as to contributory negligence if the same is shown by the evidence in the case regardless of by whom the evidence is introduced.'"

[6] This latter sentence makes it clear that the burden of proof does not shift if there is evidence in the plaintiff's case from which his contributory negligence may be found, but that whatever the source of the evidence the jury must still find a preponderance of the evidence in favor of the defense of contributory negligence. The qualifying language last quoted was offered as a part of defendants' instruction on the burden of proof of contributory negligence but was unfortunately stricken from the instruction as given by the court. In Hickenbottom also the court gave other correct instructions on "defendant's duties and his burden of proof." 144 Cal.App.2d at page 123, 300 P.2d at page 693.

[7] In this case the court not only gave the misleading instruction on the burden of proof of contributory negligence, but refused a correct instruction on the subject requested by plaintiff, and struck from the instruction given the sentence which would have clarified the fact that the burden must be met, whether the evidence to satisfy it came from the defendants' or the plaintiff's witnesses.

[8] The court also gave the sturdy indestructible instruction, criticized by our Supreme Court at least as early as 1874 in Robinson v. Western Pac. R. R. Co., 48 Cal. 409, 422-423, where that court said: "The formula is, not that any degree of negligence on the part of the plaintiff which directly concurs in producing the injury (however slight) will constitute a defense; but if the negligence of the plaintiff, which amounts to the absence of ordinary care, shall contribute, in any degree, proximately to the injury, the plaintiff shall not recover."

The idea that even the slightest degree of negligence of the plaintiff is sufficient to constitute contributory negligence dies hard. Despite the fact that this form of instruction has for over 80 years been repeatedly disapproved it still raises a sturdy head to plague appellate courts. Polk v. City of Los Angeles, 26 Cal.2d 519, 535, 159 P.2d 931, where the court said that it is probably not advisable to give this instruction because of its lack of clarity and probably confusing character; Clark v. State of California, 99 Cal.App.2d 616, 222 P.2d 300, where the giving of such instructions was held ground for reversal; Hickenbottom v. Jeppesen, supra, 144 Cal. App.2d at pages 122-123, 300 P.2d at pages 692-693, where a similar instruction was disapproved but held not prejudicial in view of other correct instructions given.

The court also gave an instruction on unavoidable accident which under the recent decision in Butigan v. Yellow Cab Co., 49 Cal.2d 652, 320 P.2d 500, was erroneous and could only further confuse the jury.

[9] The combination of these several instructions and the failure to give a correct instruction on the burden of proof offered by plaintiff left the resolution of the issues of contributory negligence and proximate cause in a state of confusion which we cannot refuse to find prejudicial.

[10] Appellant also complains of the refusal of the court to permit her to cross-examine one of her own witnesses, a police officer whose testimony differed in one respect from the fact as stated in his written report. This officer had testified to the same effect at a previous trial and had informed an investigator employed by plaintiff's attorney that the fact as stated in his report was erroneous. The trial judge did not abuse his discretion in holding that appellant had not shown the surprise required to justify the cross-examination of her own witness. Sandoval v. Southern Cal. Enterprises, Inc., 98 Cal.App.2d 240, 245-246, 219 P.2d 928.

[11, 12] Appellant complains of the admission of evidence of the details of her decedent's prior accident. The details of the other accident, if properly objected to, should not be admitted since such proof might be given weight by the jury in passing on the question of decedent's contributory negligence in this case. Evidence of previous accidents is properly excluded since it has no probative value on the question of the party's negligence in the case at issue. Lowenthal v. Mortimer, 125 Cal.App.2d 636, 640, 270 P.2d 942. In contradistinction to such evidence, the mere fact of the accident and the testimony tending to show that decedent was emotionally upset when he started to cross the highway would seem relevant on the question of contributory negligence. Cope v. Davison, 30 Cal.2d 193, 202, 180 P.2d 873, 171 A.L.R. 667.

Other claimed errors need not concern us since they are not apt to recur.

Cr. 1376.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Sept. 5, 1958.

Defendant was convicted in the Superior Court of San Diego County, John A. Hewicker, J., for burglaries of the second degree, and he appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Griffin, P. J., held that convictions must be affirmed.

Second-degree burglary convictions, entered upon defendant's guilty pleas, were affirmed. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 182

Albert Tom, San Diego, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., and William E. James, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Presiding Justice.

Defendant-appellant was charged in an information, with one Stiles, in count one of an information with conspiracy to commit grand theft (Sec. 182, Penal Code) and in four other counts with separate burglaries. Three additional burglaries were charged against Stiles. Appellant was charged with one prior felony conviction and Stiles with two. Appellant was represented by counsel and entered a plea of not guilty to these charges and denied the prior conviction. Subsequently, appellant, appearing with his counsel, changed his plea of not guilty to that of guilty as to counts three and four and admitted the prior conviction. On motion of the district attorney and in furtherance of justice, the court dismissed counts 1, 2 and 5. After a full hearing it was determined that they were burglaries of the second degree and defendant was sentenced to state's prison at Chino (sentences to run consecutively as to each count).

Appellant, in propria persona, filed his own notice of appeal. At defendant's request this court appointed counsel to represent him. In lieu of an original brief, and by consent of this court, he has filed a report. It reflects a statement of the facts as above outlined and also shows that he has fully examined the records and files in the case, which show that the proprietress of a shop at 3960-30th Street in San Diego, caught appellant behind the counter taking objects from her purse. When this occurred appellant attempted to flee. The proprietress' husband and a customer chased appellant, grabbed his coat, and appellant shed it and left. In the coat was found certain identification cards of appellant. He was later apprehended, identified, and after a plea of guilty, admitted the burglary. He also admitted two others charged as well as the prior conviction of a felony. Counsel for appellant concluded there were no grounds for appeal. The attorney general also reached the same conclusion and cited authorities to the effect that appellant has not and apparently could not show good cause why the pleas should be set aside or the judgment reversed; that no abuse of discretion appears; and that there is no valid reason why the judgment should not be affirmed. We concur in the conclusions reached. People v. Jackson, 89 Cal.App.2d 181, 182, 200 P.2d 204; People v. Ottensstror, 127 Cal.App.2d 104, 109, 273 P.2d 289.

Peter J. Jarvis and Beulah Jarvis in pro. per.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., by Raymond H. Williamson and Marcus Vanderlaan, Deputies Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SCHOTTKY, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon a jury's verdict awarding appellants $1,500 for 1.062 acres of land condemned by respondent.

The complaint, which was filed on August 18, 1954, alleged that respondent sought to condemn the fee simple title to the land and that the taking of said estate and interest was necessary for the construction of a levee. On the same day the court fixed $1,500 as the amount reasonably adequate to provide for payment of just compensation for the taking of appellants' property. Upon deposit of that sum with the clerk of the court an ex parte order for the taking of immediate possession issued, and, pursuant thereto, respondent entered upon the land and constructed a levee thereon. Thereafter trial was had and on February 3, 1956, the jury returned its verdict which found the fair market value of the condemned property to be $1,500 as of February 1, 1956. Judgment was entered upon the verdict on April 10, 1956. Appellants' motion for a new trial was denied and they noticed an appeal from the judgment.

On this appeal an opening brief was filed on appellants' behalf by an attorney who did not represent them at the trial. Assigned as error therein is the trial court's sustaining of an objection to testimony of a witness who lived across the street from the appellants. She was called by appellants as a witness on their behalf. She was asked how much frontage she had on the street. Counsel for respondent objected on the ground that the witness' property was not being condemned. The objection was sustained. The record shows the following:

"[Mr. Hibbitt]: Q. So that you still have property that faces on Rio Linda Boulevard. And do you know the Jarvis property? A. Yes, sir, I do.

"Q. With reference to your property, the Jarvis property is directly across the street; isn't that right? A. Yes, it is.

"Q. And about how much frontage do you have on Rio Linda Boulevard at that place?

"Mr. Vanderlaan: I will object to that, your Honor. We are not condemning this lady's property.

"The Court: Objection sustained.

"Mr. Hibbitt: We are trying to establish values, your Honor, and I think probably by comparative values here, I am bringing this lady in to show the value of her adjacent property.

"Mr. Vanderlaan: I am sure that is not admissible, your Honor. She is not an expert.

"The Court: Objection sustained."

Counsel for appellants made no offer of proof that the witness would testify as to what she had recently paid or been offered for her property. However, such offer of proof would have been futile as at the time of trial it was the long established rule that, as declared by our Supreme Court in People v. La Macchia, 41 Cal.2d 738, at page 744, 264 P.2d 15, at page 20, "witnesses 'cannot, upon the direct examination, be allowed to testify as to particular transactions, such as sales of adjoining lands, how much has been offered and refused for adjoining lands of like quality and location, or for the land in question, or any part thereof, or how much the * * [condemning party has] been compelled to pay in other and like cases—notwithstanding these transactions may constitute the source of their knowledge'."

[1] Since the trial of the instant case our Supreme Court, in the case of County of Los Angeles v. Faus, 48 Cal.2d 672, 312 P.2d 680, has overruled the line of decisions laying down the above quoted rule, and now evidence of prices paid or amounts offered for similar property in the immediate vicinity is admissible on direct examination.

[2,3] It is apparent that the ruling of the trial judge was based on decisions of the courts of this state which have since been overruled. It is also apparent that neither contract nor property rights have vested in either party by virtue of the previous decisions on the point here involved. Therefore, this case falls within the general rule that a decision of a court of supreme jurisdiction overruling a former decision is retrospective in its operation. Under such circumstances the decision must be reversed. See County of Los Angeles v. Faus, 48 Cal.2d 672, 312 P.2d 680, supra. See also People v. Murata, 161 Cal.App.2d 369, 326 P.2d 947.

Appellants have filed a closing brief in propria persona and make numerous contentions, including the contention that they have been denied their constitutional rights and have been deprived of their property without due process of law. In view of the fact that the judgment must be reversed it is unnecessary to discuss them in detail.

[4] We deem it proper to state, however, that in view of the fact that an order for immediate possession was made, appellants will be entitled to interest upon whatever amount they are ultimately awarded, from the date of the order for possession. Code Civ.Proc. sec. 1249; Metropolitan Water District of Southern California v. Adams, 16 Cal.2d 676, 680-681, 107 P.2d

618. Appellants will also be entitled to compensation without deduction on account of any taxes or assessments levied after respondent took possession of the property. People By and Through Department of Public Works v. Peninsula Title Guaranty Co., 47 Cal.2d 29, 35, 301 P.2d 1.

After this cause was orally argued before this court it was discovered that the judge presiding over the cause was a judge of the county in which the real property involved in this action is situated. Furthermore, the record did not disclose that the parties to the action had signed and filed a stipulation in writing waiving the disqualification of the trial judge as required by subdivision 6 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This court then ordered the matter reargued for the purpose of determining whether the judgment was invalid because the cause was tried before a judge who was disqualified to act. At the time of oral argument respondent's motion to augment the record by including therein a certified copy of the minutes of the superior court of June 16, 1958, was granted. The record as augmented disclosed that the trial court had amended its minutes to show that prior to the calling of the jury roll the judge and the attorneys for the parties met in the judge's chambers where it was orally stipulated that each party would waive the disqualification.

[5] By subdivision 6 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure the legislature has provided that in an action brought in any court by or against the reclamation board affecting or relating to any real property, a judge of the superior court of the county in which such real property is located shall be disqualified to sit or act unless the parties to the action shall sign and file therein a stipulation in writing waiving such disqualification. The oral stipulation between the attorneys for the parties in the judge's chambers can not be said to meet the requirements of the subdivision.

[6] Nor can it be said that the parties waived the disqualification. The record discloses that the matter of the judge's disqualification was raised at the earliest opportunity and that a conference in chambers immediately ensued. In this case the only inference that can be drawn from the record is that the parties did raise the matter at the earliest opportunity. Nor can it be said that the parties are estopped to raise the matter for an equitable estoppel can not be urged as a substitute for a statutory requirement of a written stipulation. Emerson v. Superior Court, 7 Cal.2d 685, 62 P.2d 363.

John G. Oppenheimer, in pro. per.

E. D. Yeomans and Walt A. Steiger, Los Angeles, W. A. Gregory, San Francisco, for respondent.

SHINN, Presiding Justice.

Upon a former appeal by Oppenheimer, 150 Cal.App.2d 420, 309 P.2d 887, respondent Southern Pacific Company filed a printed brief which, exclusive of covers and index, comprised 14 pages. Having prevailed on the appeal the company filed a cost bill claiming $100.67 as the cost of the brief. Oppenheimer, by motion to tax costs, objected to the charge as excessive. The motion was denied and he appeals.

The appeal does not present a question of law. Rule 26(c), Rules on Appeal, allows as reasonable costs "the reasonable cost of printing or reproduction of briefs by other process of duplication." Prior to amendment of the rule as of January 1, 1951, the amount chargeable for briefs was limited to $100 to any one party. Since then the only limitation has been that the amount claimed must be reasonable.

[1] By denying the motion the court determined from the evidence before it that the charge was not unreasonable. That was a factual decision which is binding upon this court unless the evidence compelled a contrary conclusion. Neither the trial court nor this court has judicial knowledge of what would have been a reasonable charge in Los Angeles County for printing the brief in question.

[2] The trial court's ruling has support in the evidence. The motion was heard upon the affidavit of Oppenheimer and an affidavit of Robert M. Parker, Jr., Vice-President of Parker & Son, Inc., the printers. It was averred by Oppenheimer that the brief could have been printed for $2.65 or less per page, and for a total of about $50. In Parker's affidavit it was averred: "The firm of Parker & Son, Inc. has been in the business of printing briefs for over 58 years. This firm keeps a very accurate record of costs and production and the price as charged for our services is just and reasonable under the present day wage scale labor market, and is calculated on the same basis as charges made to other customers of Parker & Son, Inc."

The fact, alone, that some printers charge less than others does not necessarily prove that the higher charges are unreasonable. There are other factors to be considered. Not every printer is qualified to print briefs as they should be printed. It requires familiarity with the rules respecting the setup and arrangement of material; the workmen should have familiarity with legal terms and usages and be able to detect obvious errors in manuscripts; the accuracy of the work is an important factor, as well as the ability to get the work done in a limited time. Excellence of workmanship and a reputation for reliability command a price. The evidence that the brief could have been printed for less money did not establish that Parker & Son's charges are unreasonably high. The fact that the firm has been printing briefs for 58 years would tend to prove the contrary. A concern does not carry on an active and successful business for that length of time if its charges are consistently in excess of the value of its services. We are in full agreement with the conclusion of the trial court.

The order is affirmed.

Marshall W. TAGGART and H. M. Jordan, Defendants and Appellants.*

Civ. 22884.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Aug. 19, 1958.

Hearing Granted Oct. 15, 1958.

Action by purchasers against broker and broker's employee for profits allegedly wrongfully acquired by defendants. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Joe Raycraft, J., rendered judgment for purchasers, and defendants appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Ashburn, J., held that where purchasers brought action on theory that broker's working of fraud created a confidential relation between them and entitled them to damages for violation of fiduciary obligation, but purchasers disclaimed any intention to recover upon theory of unjust enrichment, evidence was not uncontradicted, and question of right of recovery under unjust enrichment theory presented a factual situation, the consequences of which were open to controversy and were not put in issue or presented at trial, reduction of amount of judgment and affirmance of judgment for purchasers upon theory of unjust enrichment would not be proper and cause would be reversed generally, and that broker's employee who turned over all she received to broker was not liable to purchasers.

* Opinion vacated 336 P.2d 534.

Reversed with instructions to permit purchasers to amend their complaint.

Fox, P. J., dissented in part.

Opinion, 325 P.2d 502, vacated.

1. Appeal and Error ⇨1140(1)

Where purchasers brought action on theory that broker's working of fraud created a confidential relation between them and entitled them to damages for violation of fiduciary obligation, but purchasers disclaimed any intention to recover upon theory of unjust enrichment, evidence was not uncontradicted, and question of right of recovery under unjust enrichment theory presented a factual situation, the consequences of which were open to controversy and were not put in issue or presented at trial, reduction of amount of judgment and affirmance of judgment for purchasers upon theory of unjust enrichment would not be proper and cause would be reversed generally. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 3343.

2. Trusts ⇨95

The making by broker of successful false representations to buyer does not create a fiduciary relationship, but result of fraud may be, at election of defrauded party, the imposition upon wrongdoer of obligations of a constructive trustee, however imposition of such obligations does not antedate accomplishment of fraud. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 2224.

3. Action ⇨28

Damages ⇨89(2)

Where real estate broker through fraud received money belonging to buyers and buyers elected to recover in an action based upon contract or trust implied in law, not in fact, and one which rested ultimately upon doctrine of unjust enrichment, tort was thereby waived, action proceeded on contract, and exemplary damages could not be recovered. West's Ann. Civ.Code, §§ 2224, 3343.

4. Money Received ⇨3

Plaintiff who sues in assumpsit growing out of fraud or other tort recovers only such sum or property as belongs to him in equity and good conscience; at that point the fraud has spent its force and idea of punishment is out. West's Ann.Civ. Code, § 2224.

5. Trusts ⇨236

In determining damages to be awarded purchasers who were defrauded by broker in purchase transaction, broker would be entitled to deduct entire cost to him of transaction except those items which were incurred as means of accomplishing his fraud. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 2224.

6. Trusts ⇨236

Where broker's action in connection with real estate transaction imposed upon broker the obligations of a constructive trustee, legitimate expenses incurred in acquiring property for purchasers were creditable to broker, but those which were concerned with its maintenance or protection and which were incurred after constructive trust had arisen were not allowable. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 2224.

Where broker's employee willingly allowed her name to be used in transaction in which broker defrauded purchasers but employee did not share in the illicit profit which broker obtained and in transaction it was indicated that employee was merely acting for broker who was designated as real principal, employee was not liable to purchasers as an involuntary trustee. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 2224.

8. Trusts ⇨110

In action against broker and broker's employee for illicit profits made by them from purchase transaction, evidence established that employee turned over all she received to broker. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 2224.

9. Trusts ⇨95

Statute providing that one who gains a thing by fraud or other wrongful act is an involuntary trustee of thing gained for benefit of person who would otherwise have had it applies only to those who have a wrongful acquisition. West's Ann.Civ. Code, § 2224.

James C. Blackstock and Felix H. McGinnis, Los Angeles, for appellants.

Chandler P. Ward, Los Angeles, for respondents.

ASHBURN, Justice.

The facts of this case, now before us on rehearing, are set forth in the former prevailing opinion (325 P.2d 502, 504) as follows:

"This is an appeal by the defendants from a money judgment in favor of the plaintiffs growing out of a real estate transaction. Plaintiffs, William R. Ward and Bert W. Martin, are purchasers of certain real property; defendants are a real estate broker and his employee, both of whom were instrumental in effecting a sale of the property to plaintiffs.

"The essential facts alleged in the complaint and proved at the trial are as follows:

"Prior to the transaction in question plaintiff Ward had asked Leroy Thomsen, a real estate broker, to look for properties which Ward might be interested in purchasing. In February, 1955, Thomsen visited defendant Taggart concerning unrelated matters and during the conversation Taggart informed Thomsen that as exclusive agent for the owner, Sunset Oil Company, he had for sale several acres of real property in Los Angeles County. A general discussion concerning the location and nature of the property ensued, Thomsen stating that he had a client who might be interested in acquiring the property. Thomsen mentioned to Taggart that a broker named Dawson had a 'for sale' sign on the property; Taggart replied that Sunset had taken the listing away from Dawson.

"Thereafter, Thomsen submitted an offer on behalf of Ward to Taggart relating to seven acres in the tract. Taggart promised to submit the offer to Sunset. Taggart later reported that such offer was rejected by Sunset because of a large blanket mortgage. Ward then directed Thomsen to make an offer of $4,000 per acre for the entire property. Thomsen submitted this offer to Taggart, who promised to take it up with Sunset and report back. Taggart later told Thomsen that Sunset had refused the offer and that the least it would take for the property was $5,000 per acre, one-half in cash. Thomsen conveyed the information to Ward and Ward told Thomsen to make an offer on that basis. Thomsen submitted this offer in writing, accompanied by Ward's check for $2,000, to Taggart on March 18, 1955. At Taggart's direction, Thomsen inserted in the written offer provision for payment by Sunset of a ten per cent commission which Taggart and Thomsen agreed to divide equally. On the following day Thomsen advised Ward of the commission arrangement and he was agreeable.

"Thomsen contacted Taggart respecting the $5,000 per acre offer three or four times during the following two weeks. On March 31 Taggart informed Thomsen that Sunset had accepted Ward's offer. Thomsen met with Taggart and the latter presented proposed escrow instructions in which defendant Jordan was named as seller acting for Taggart, who was designated as the real principal in the transaction. Taggart then informed Thomsen that he was to be the principal to enable him to 'clear up the Dawson exclusive listing' as well as certain blanket mortgages on the property. Thomsen told Ward of this when he submitted the escrow instructions to him. Ward asked why Jordan was to be the payee of the notes and beneficiary of the trust deeds. Thomsen related that Taggart had said that such was necessary because of certain tax and other problems of Sunset, and that the trust deeds would be turned back to Sunset after the escrow. The property conveyed to plaintiffs consisted of 72.0492 acres. The full purchase price which plaintiffs paid for the property was $360,246.

"It was not until after they had purchased the property that plaintiffs learned the following facts: Taggart had never been given a listing by Sunset on the property in question. Taggart never presented to Sunset, and never intended to present plaintiffs' offers of $4,000 per acre and $5,000 per acre. Instead Taggart presented to Sunset his own offer of $4,000 per acre, half in cash, and it was accepted. Taggart misrepresented to plaintiffs that the least Sunset would take for the property was $5,000 per acre; he intended to purchase the property from Sunset himself and resell it to plaintiffs at a profit of $1,000 per acre. All of Taggart's statements to Thomsen concerning Sunset's reason for handling the sale in so unusual a manner were fabrications. Taggart never disclosed to Sunset that he had an offer from Ward until after the escrow papers had been signed. All of the moneys used by Taggart to pay Sunset the purchase price were derived wholly from the Ward escrow.

"Plaintiffs commenced this action on August 25, 1955. The case was tried without a jury, and the court rendered judgment against both defendants for $72,049.20 compensatory damages, and awarded exemplary damages of $36,000 against defendant Taggart individually. The judgment also enjoined defendants from transferring certain notes and trust deeds which plaintiffs had given them, and ordered defendants to discharge said notes and trust deeds, thereby reducing the amount of the judgment. Defendants have appealed."

We ruled that plaintiffs' complaint alleges and the proof supports a finding of fraud in the form of deceit practiced by defendant Taggart upon plaintiffs; but there is no allegation or proof that the land purchased by plaintiffs was worth less than the amount paid and hence no showing of damage such as required by § 3343, Civil Code; the allegation of fiduciary relationship between plaintiffs and defendants was not sustained by the evidence and plaintiffs' theory of recovery of damages (not measured by § 3343) for violation of such a relationship could not prevail. But we further ruled that, as Taggart was not the agent of Sunset or of plaintiffs and so far as appears did not defraud Sunset, the secret profit he made belonged in equity and good conscience to plaintiffs who had been defrauded, and that they could recover to the extent of defendants' unjust enrichment, in quasi contract but not in tort. Accordingly the majority of the court struck out the award of exemplary damages and affirmed the judgment in a reduced amount. We differed as to the allowance of certain credits to defendant, the majority holding that he was entitled to no deductions whatever except the amount he actually paid for the land, $4,000 an acre. We agreed that defendant Jordan had not been unjustly enriched and accordingly reversed the judgment as to her.

We granted a rehearing primarily because of the insistence of counsel for both sides that in modifying and affirming the judgment we had adopted and applied a legal theory which was not merely different from that pursued by plaintiffs in the trial court, but was one which plaintiffs had expressly disavowed both in the trial court and in their briefs on appeal. Upon further consideration, we have concluded that there is merit in the contention that this is not a proper case for directing the entry of judgment in a different amount and upon a legal theory which was never canvassed in the court below.

Counsel call our attention to the fact that cases such as Panopulos v. Maderis, 47 Cal.2d 337, 303 P.2d 738, and American Automobile Ins. Co. v. Seaboard Surety Co., 155 Cal.App.2d 192, 318 P.2d 84, do not sanction a departure by the reviewing court from the theory pursued below in cases where the evidence is in substantial conflict.

In Panopulos it is said, 47 Cal.2d at page 340, 303 P.2d at page 740: "It is the general rule that a party to an action may not, for the first time on appeal, change the theory of the cause of action. [Citations.] There are exceptions but the general rule is especially true when the theory newly presented involves controverted questions of fact or mixed questions of law and fact. If a question of law only is presented on the facts appearing in the record the change in theory may be permitted. [Citation.] But if the new theory contemplates a factual situation the consequences of which are open to controversy and were not put in issue or presented at the trial the opposing party should not be required to defend against it on appeal." In American Automobile Ins. Co. at page 200 of 155 Cal.App.2d, at page 89 of 318 P.2d: "If it be said that the views herein expressed depart from the theory upon which the case was tried the answer is that the rule confining the parties upon appeal to the theory pursued below does not apply to a question which is one of law only [citations], and that an appellate court is never bound by concessions of counsel as to the applicable law [citation] or by the interpretation of documents made by the trial court upon the basis of the terms of the written instrument without the aid of other evidence [citations]. There was no evidence at bar except the written indemnity agreement; other matters were covered by admissions of the pleadings or the briefs." Barrera v. De La Torre, 48 Cal.2d 166, 172, 308 P.2d 724, 728: "However, the new legal theory in the Panopulos case presented only a question of law on undisputed facts, and it was deemed appropriate to pass upon its merits as a further basis for affirmance of the judgment. Here plaintiffs not only dispute defendant's version of the facts but, in addition, they advance this new theory of trespass as ground for reversal of the judgment for defendant. Such change of theory by an appellant cannot be permitted." See, also, Townsend v. Wingler, 114 Cal.App.2d 64, 68, 249 P.2d 613.

[1] This is not a case of uncontradicted evidence. While appellant Taggart's counsel concedes the sufficiency of the evidence to support upon appeal the finding of fraud, he does not concede the fact of fraud. The transcript exceeds 500 pages and the change of theory conceived by this court does not present a question of law only; on the contrary it "contemplates a factual situation the consequences of which are open to controversy and were not put in issue or presented at the trial," and we cannot say in the instant case "that probably no different showing could be made on a new trial." Quoting Panopulos, supra.

As we have concluded that this is not a proper case for direction of a new judgment or, what is its equivalent, reduction of amount and affirmance upon a legal theory which was never canvassed below, the cause should be reversed generally, thus affording both parties full opportunity to present all the facts applicable to the theory upon which we find it possible for plaintiffs to recover, assuming the evidence to be the same as shown by the instant record. Though their counsel upon oral argument disclaimed any intention to embrace the theory adopted by this court, plaintiffs should have leave to amend their complaint to rely upon the same if so advised.

We adhere to the view that the judgment at bar is not sustainable as a recovery of damages for a tortious violation of duties arising from a fiduciary relationship. Upon the pleadings as now framed and upon the evidence as presented in the record before us the only sustainable recovery would have to be premised upon the theory of unjust enrichment and its amount would have to be measured in terms of unjust enrichment.

[2] Taggart was not the agent of Sunset Oil Company, the owner of the land. So far as appears, he did not defraud that company. Any secret profit obtained by him did not belong to Sunset. It was plaintiffs who were defrauded and entitled to any appropriate remedy therefor. They elected not to sue for damages on the theory of recovery under § 3343, Civil Code, i. e., the difference between the price paid and the value of the land received for it. They have not advanced the claim at any stage of the case that the land was worth less than they paid for it. Their complaint and their briefs on appeal rest upon the theory that Taggart's working a fraud upon plaintiffs created a confidential relationship between them and entitled plaintiffs to damages for violation of the obligation of a fiduciary. Of course, the making of successful false representations to a buyer does not create a fiduciary relationship; but its result may be, at the election of the defrauded party, the imposition upon the wrongdoer of the obligations of a constructive trustee (Civ. Code, § 2224). This is the result of the fraud; it does not antedate its accomplishment. The Restatement of the Law of Restitution, § 160, comment a, page 641, says: "The term 'constructive trust' is not altogether a felicitous one. It might be thought to suggest the idea that it is a fiduciary relation similar to an express trust, whereas it is in fact something quite different from an express trust. An express trust and a constructive trust are not divisions of the same fundamental concept. They are not species of the same genus. They are distinct concepts. A constructive trust does not, like an express trust, arise because of a manifestation of an intention to create it, but it is imposed as a remedy to prevent unjust enrichment. A constructive trust, unlike an express trust, is not a fiduciary relation, although the circumstances which give rise to a constructive trust may or may not involve a fiduciary relation."

[3] Through fraud defendant received money belonging to plaintiffs (not Sunset Oil Company) and plaintiffs have elected to recover in an action which we hold properly to be based upon a contract or trust implied in law, not in fact,—one which rests ultimately upon the doctrine of unjust enrichment. The tort is thereby waived; the action proceeds on contract. Crogan v. Metz, 47 Cal.2d 398, 404, 303 P.2d 1029.

McCall v. Superior Court, 1 Cal.2d 527, 532, 36 P.2d 642, 645, 95 A.L.R. 1019: "But in assumpsit, where the tort is waived, the sum sued for is the benefit unjustly retained by the defendant; not the damage to the plaintiff, usually more uncertain in amount."

French v. Robbins, 172 Cal. 670, 679, 158 P. 188, 191: "The foundation of the action of assumpsit, where property of plaintiff has been wrongfully taken and sold by the defendant, is the unjust enrichment of the wrongdoer. Keener on Quasi Contracts, p. 160. It is well settled that in order to recover in such an action the plaintiff must show that a definite sum, to which he is justly entitled, has been received by the defendant. 'As the amount of the plaintiff's recovery is limited to the proceeds received by the defendant, it will be fatal to this form of action that the amount is not ascertainable.'"

These principles rule out the recovery of exemplary damages. That is the holding of Crogan v. Metz, supra, 47 Cal.2d 398, 405, 303 P.2d 1029. See, also, Steiner v. Rowley, 35 Cal.2d 713, 720, 221 P.2d 9; Squire's Dept. Store, Inc., v. Dudum, 115 Cal.App.2d 320, 325, 252 P.2d 418; Fordson Coal Co. v. Kentucky River Coal Corporation, 6 Cir., 68 F.2d 131; Hilderbrand v. Anderson, Mo. App., 270 S.W.2d 406, 410.

In our opinion it would be unjust and erroneous to allow defendant Taggart only the sum of $4,000 an acre (a total of $288,196.72) as the basis for measuring his liability for restitution of unjust enrichment. Restatement of the Law of Restitution, § 160, comment d, page 643: "Unjust enrichment and unjust deprivation. In most cases where a constructive trust is imposed the result is to restore to the plaintiff property of which he has been unjustly deprived and to take from the defendant property the retention of which by him would result in a corresponding unjust enrichment of the defendant; in other words the effect is to prevent a loss to the plaintiff and a corresponding gain to the defendant, and to put each of them in the position in which he was before the defendant acquired the property."

[4] As indicated by the quotations from French v. Robbins, supra, and McCall v. Superior Court, supra, the plaintiff who sues in assumpsit growing out of fraud or other tort recovers only such sum or property as belongs to him in equity and good conscience; at this point the fraud has spent its force and the idea of punishment is out. The rule is thus stated in 58 C.J.S. Money Received § 33, page 947: "In an action for money had and received the plaintiff is entitled to recover such sum, and only such sum, as in equity belongs to him, in no event exceeding the sum actually received for his use by the defendant or the amount sued for, with interest."

[5] The cases do not sustain the disallowance of all expenditures made by Taggart regardless of whether they would have been incurred in consummating a legitimate transaction. All of us agree that he should have credit for the $4,000 per acre paid for the land. In the opinion of the majority the line of demarcation is this: That defendant is entitled to a deduction of the entire cost to him of the transaction except those items which were incurred as a means of accomplishing his fraud.

That the foregoing reasoning is sound is supported by the authorities. Schwarting v. Artel, 40 Cal.App.2d 433, 105 P.2d 380, was decided by this court and hearing denied. It was an action to recover a secret profit made by plaintiff's agent. Artel, the agent, had included in an exchange of properties between his principal, Schwarting, and one Hartman, an Inglewood bungalow belonging to himself and thereby had reaped a secret profit. At page 441 of 40 Cal.App.2d, at page 384 of 105 P.2d the court said: "In those cases where an agent has secretly profited, as a matter of course, to the end that equity be done to all parties, he is entitled to be reimbursed for any portion of the purchase money advanced by him and for all expense necessarily incurred by him in protecting and conserving the property of his principal. 3 C.J.S. Agency § 140, p. 14. Under this hypothesis, Artel is entitled to be reimbursed in the amount of $2,000, the value of his said Inglewood bungalow, which he utilized in effectuating said exchange for Schwarting."

[6] In Kinert v. Wright, 81 Cal.App.2d 919, 185 P.2d 364, also decided by this division, it was said concerning the measure of recovery in a secret profit case: "Respondent received $1,200 from appellants, asserting that the small tract selected by them could be purchased for that sum and falsely representing that it was free and clear of encumbrances. He paid $500 for the large parcel of land. The finding is that in his accounting he claimed to have paid $120 as commission. There is no finding that the commission was not paid, the evidence is not before us, and appellants do not dispute the claim. Allowing respondent his full due he is entitled to credit for $620 and appellants should recover the difference between that sum and the amount entrusted to him amounting to $580." 81 Cal.App.2d at pages 927-928, 185 P.2d at page 369. In the same case the agent was disallowed an item of $160 which had been incurred for costs and attorney fees in an action concerning delinquent taxes upon property purchased by him for his principal because "the expenditures made by him were in pursuance of his 'scheme to obtain a secret profit' at appellants' expense." 81 Cal.App.2d at page 923, 185 P.2d at page 367. At page 926, of 81 Cal.App.2d, at page 368 of 185 P.2d: "Though respondent was appellants' agent when their relationship began he became their trustee when he took title to the property in his own name, using their money with which to make the purchase." At page 927, of 81 Cal.App.2d, at page 369 of 185 P.2d: "The fraud and deception of respondent deprive him of the right to repayment of his expenditures for attorney's fees in the tax suit and for other purposes in connection with the property. Section 2273 of the Civil Code provides that a trustee is entitled to reimbursement out of the trust property of all expenses actually and properly incurred by him in the performance of his trust. This rule is applicable only when the trustee has conducted the affairs of the trust honestly, has dealt fairly with his beneficiary, and has not attempted to make a secret profit for himself out of the trust property or otherwise to deceive and defraud those who entrusted him with their business. An involuntary trustee who becomes such through his own fault is not entitled to reimbursement. Civ.Code, sec. 2275; Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. California Dev. Co., 171 Cal. 173, 220, 152 P. 542; Marsh v. Smith, 46 Cal.App. 692, 699, 189 P. 1037. The beneficiary 'is under absolutely no obligation to repay these outlays.' McArthur v. Goodwin, 173 Cal. 499, 505, 160 P. 679, 682." This case seems to recognize an important distinction here applicable, namely, that legitimate expenses incurred in acquiring the property for the principal are credited to the agent, but those concerned with its maintenance or protection which are incurred after the constructive trust has arisen are not allowed. The cases of McArthur v. Goodwin, 173 Cal. 499, 504, 160 P. 679, and Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. California Dev. Co., 171 Cal. 173, 220, 152 P. 542 (cited by respondents), fall within the purview of § 2275, Civil Code: "An involuntary trustee, who becomes such through his own fault, has none of the rights mentioned in this Article." In other words, they have to do with expenses of management or protection of property which has already become the subject of a constructive trust in the hands of defendant. Both cases apply Civil Code, § 2275, and are not controlling here.

Such evidence upon the subject of legitimate expenses of acquiring the property for plaintiffs as is now before us was received incidentally in the canvassing of other issues. We should not attempt now to evaluate it but should leave the subject open for full exploration upon a new trial.

[7-9] Concerning the question of defendant Jordan's liability, we repeat what was said in the previous opinion [325 P.2d

508]: "Even though Jordan willingly allowed her name to be used in the dual escrows, she did not share in the illicit profit which Taggart obtained. In each escrow transaction it was indicated that Jordan was merely acting for Taggart, who was designated as the real principal. The evidence establishes that Jordan turned over all that she received to Taggart, her employer. Under these circumstances it is clear that defendant Jordan cannot be held liable as an involuntary trustee. One cannot be deemed an involuntary trustee of something which he has not acquired. Civil Code section 2224 applies only to those who have made the wrongful acquisition. Since it was Taggart alone who obtained the illicit profit, he alone can be required to hold that profit as an involuntary trustee for the benefit of plaintiffs. Therefore, the judgment must be reversed as to defendant Jordan."

The judgment is reversed as to both defendants with instructions to the lower court to permit plaintiffs to amend their complaint if so advised.

HERNDON, J., concurs.

FOX, Presiding Justice (concurring and dissenting).

While I concur in the majority opinion with respect to the applicable theory of liability, the ruling concerning punitive damages and the reversal of the judgment against the defendant Jordan, I must dissent from the majority's decision that a retrial is necessary. I also disagree with the majority's view that Taggart is entitled to be credited with more than the $4,000 per acre that he paid Sunset for the property.

In my opinion the judgment against Taggart should be modified by striking the award of punitive damages therefrom, and as so modified the judgment should be affirmed.

In their complaint the plaintiffs set forth in detail the facts on which they based their right to recover. Their evidence established all these facts except that a fiduciary relationship existed between Taggart and plaintiffs. Although founded upon a tort, the instant case is not truly a tort action even though both counsel may have treated it as such. The facts which plaintiffs pleaded and proved sustain the judgment on the theory of involuntary trust, but not on the theory of tort. The only difference between the theory which this court holds to be applicable and the theory proceeded upon below is the nature of the duty breached and the type of relief flowing therefrom. The trial court found that Taggart assumed and breached a fiduciary duty. We find that Taggart breached a duty different from that of a fiduciary. These duties, however, are similar in many respects. Even excluding the finding of a breach of fiduciary duty, the facts found by the trial court sustain plaintiffs' right to recover the profits which Taggart acquired as a result of his fraudulent conduct. Thus, there is no question as to plaintiffs' right to recover under the facts pleaded and proved; the only question has to do with the precise legal theory upon which such recovery should be founded. Under such circumstances the rule confining a case on appeal to the theory pursued below does not apply. Panopulos v. Maderis, 47 Cal.2d 337, 341, 303 P.2d 738; American Automobile Ins. Co. v. Seaboard Surety Co., 155 Cal.App.2d 192, 200, 318 P.2d 84; 3 Cal.Jur.2d, Appeal and Error, § 142, p. 609. In my opinion, the legal theory which this court has applied does not contemplate any factual situation different from that established by the evidence in the trial court. Taggart had a full opportunity, in a trial that lasted several days, to present, and apparently did present, his version of the transaction here involved. He does not suggest any new evidence that he could present upon a new trial. The evidence which Taggart presented below was not sufficient to dissuade the court from concluding that plaintiffs had established facts sufficient to entitle them to recover. Those same facts support plaintiffs' recovery on the theory here applied. Taggart has had his day in court on these factual issues; hence I feel a retrial is unwarranted. It would simply entail unnecessary delay and additional expense.

I do not believe Taggart is entitled to credit for any expenses he incurred in consummating his fraud. Because of his acts the law deems him an involuntary trustee of the funds wrongfully acquired. "An involuntary trustee who becomes such through his own fault is not entitled to reimbursement." Kinert v. Wright, 81 Cal. App.2d 919, 927, 185 P.2d 364, 369; see, also, McArthur v. Goodwin, 173 Cal. 499, 504-505, 160 P. 679; Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. California Dev. Co., 171 Cal. 173, 220, 152 P. 542. This is in accord with the principle embodied in Civil Code, section 2275. The expenses which Taggart incurred were a direct result of his fraudulent acts; if he had acted properly, they would not have accrued to him. "No equity is acquired through fraud." Marsh v. Smith, 46 Cal.App. 692, 700, 189 P. 1037, 1040. Moreover, assuming that Taggart had committed no fraud and that plaintiffs had purchased the property from Sunset, it is uncertain whether plaintiffs or Sunset would have paid Thomsen's commission. It may well be that Sunset would have been willing to pay this commission even though plaintiffs were purchasing the property for $4,000 per acre. It is not unreasonable to assume that Taggart would be quick to make concessions in his dealings with Sunset in light of the large profit which he expected to acquire. Since the court could but speculate as to whether plaintiffs would have had to bear this expense in the absence of Taggart's fraud, justice requires that Taggart bear it rather than plaintiffs. The same may be said of the other expenses for which Taggart seeks credit; plaintiffs may well have not incurred these expenses even in the absence of Taggart's misconduct. Because of the uncertainty as to whether plaintiffs would have been required to bear any of these expenses in the absence of any fraud, and because this uncertainty was caused by Taggart's own fraud, it would be unreasonable for the court to allow Taggart to deduct any of these expenses from plaintiffs' recovery.

Thus the judgment against Taggart should be modified simply by eliminating the award of exemplary damages therefrom and affirmed as so modified.

Plaintiff and Respondent,

v.

Donald Hugh LILYROTH, Defendant and Appellant.
Cr. 1382.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Sept. 5, 1958.

Hearing Denied Oct. 28, 1958.

Defendant was convicted of burglary. The Superior Court of San Diego County, William A. Glen, J., entered judgment, and the defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Griffin, P. J., held that evidence sustained conviction.

Judgment affirmed.

Burglary §41(1)

Evidence sustained burglary conviction.
West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 459.

Harold P. Curtis, San Diego, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., and William E. James, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Presiding Justice.

Defendant-appellant was charged with burglary (violation of sec. 459, Penal Code) in addition to three prior felony convictions. He was represented by counsel at the trial, entered a plea of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity, and denied the prior convictions. The jury found him guilty of burglary, second degree, the prior convictions to be true, and that he was sane at the time of the commission of the burglary. A motion for new trial was denied. He was committed to state's prison.

The PEOPLE of the State of California,
Plaintiff and Respondent,

v.

Thomas JACKSON, Defendant and Appellant.

Cr. 6038.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

Sept. 4, 1958.

Defendant filed his own notice of appeal in propria persona and later, at defendant's request, this court appointed counsel to represent him. It was the same counsel who represented him at the trial and he now, after a complete examination of the record and by permission of this court, has filed a general report, in lieu of appellant's opening brief, to the effect that after judgment was procured he moved to be relieved from further representing defendant in the trial court, and the motion was granted; that it was his studied opinion that the evidence showed defendant was caught by the police hiding under the desk at the place he was charged with burglarizing, and the exact amount of cash stolen was found on his person; that there was other evidence implicating him; that defendant freely confessed the burglary to the officers; that he was of the opinion that appellant had a fair trial and no prejudicial errors were noted; that this appeal by defendant in propria persona is without merit and appears to be frivolous. Two psychiatrists examined appellant and concluded that he was sane, knew right from wrong, and understood the nature and quality of his acts.

Suffice it to say, we have examined the entire record, including the evidence of defendant's prior convictions and agree with the conclusions reached by his appointed counsel and the attorney general's counsel as to the evidence and law involved. The motion for a new trial was properly denied.

Judgment affirmed.

Prosecution for selling and furnishing a substance falsely represented to be a narcotic. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Thomas L. Ambrose, J., found defendant guilty and he appealed. Thomas Jackson, in pro. per.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SHINN, Presiding Justice.

Thomas Jackson was charged by information in Count I with selling, furnishing and giving away a preparation of heroin on February 25, 1957; In Count II, with selling and furnishing a substance falsely represented to be a narcotic on March 2, 1957; and in Count III, with the commission of a like offense on March 5, 1957. Health and Safety Code, secs. 11500, 11502. It was also alleged that defendant had suffered two previous felony convictions and had served terms of imprisonment therefor in state prison. Jackson pleaded not guilty and denied the prior convictions. Trial was to the court. As shown by the reporter's transcript the court found defendant guilty as charged in the information. As shown by the clerk's transcript he was found guilty on Count III and the court also found to be true the allegations of the prior convictions. Jackson's application for probation was denied. The court dismissed Counts I and II of the Information and sentenced defendant to state prison on Count III for the term prescribed by law. Jackson appeals from the judgment.

The evidence consisted of that received at the preliminary hearing and additional evidence introduced at the trial. Bart Natisin, a Los Angeles County sheriff's deputy assigned to the narcotics detail, was the chief witness for the People. The following is the substance of his testimony. On February 25, 1957, the officer listened to a telephone conversation between defendant and a female informant over the ear piece of the latter's telephone. Natisin stated that he heard the informer tell Jackson that she "had a cat who would like to score and who had $25.00 to go." In the officer's expert opinion, the word "cat" signified a person familiar with narcotics and the word "score" meant to purchase a narcotic; the phrase "$25.00 to go" referred to the agreed purchase price. At about 2:30 p. m., Natisin and the informer drove to the corner of Santa Barbara Avenue and Figueroa Street in the City of Los Angeles, where they met defendant. Jackson said to the informant: "Let's take a walk and get the bread [i. e., the money] first." Defendant and the informer walked away; they were gone for a few minutes. Upon their return, they got into the officer's car. Defendant handed a small bundle to the informer, who gave it to Natisin. The bundle was proved to contain heroin.

At about 3:30 p. m. on March 2, 1957, Natisin and the informant drove to the corner of 60th Street and Western Avenue in Los Angeles. Defendant arrived shortly thereafter and said: "Let's take a walk." Jackson departed, accompanied by the in-former. The latter returned after a few minutes and told Natisin that defendant wanted the rest of his money. Natisin walked over to Jackson's car, which was parked around the corner. Defendant said: "The stuff is by your foot, right at the rear of the car." The officer retrieved a small package from the ground beside the car and gave defendant $5. He then asked Jackson whether he could buy a half ounce of heroin. Defendant said that "the stuff would be real good" and told the officer to telephone him. Inside the package retrieved by Natisin was a white powder which was proved not to contain a narcotic.

On March 5, 1957, Officer Natisin telephoned defendant and arranged to meet him that afternoon. Around 3:30 p. m. the officer drove to the Better Foods Market at Santa Barbara and Western Avenues in Los Angeles and parked on the parking lot. He had in his possession $175 in currency. Defendant drove onto the lot, parked, and walked toward Natisin's car. As Jackson approached, the officer saw him drop a small package beside the left rear tire of another car. Natisin handed defendant $75, got out of his car, picked up the bundle, and left a $100 bill in its place. The bundle contained a white powder which was proved to be milk sugar. The three packages purchased by the officer were received in evidence without objection.

Officer Natisin testified on cross-examination that the informant had been arrested for a narcotics violation prior to February 25th and that he was aware of that fact at the time he first met defendant. He also stated that the informant began her telephone conversation with defendant by saying: "This is Julie." She did not give her last name to defendant. This testimony was elicited over the objections of the deputy district attorney that it involved confidential information. In arguing that the information was not confidential, defendant's counsel stated: "Well, the defendant knows the informant, so it couldn't be confidential."

Jackson was arrested at his home in the late afternoon of March 5th by J. R. Stroh, a Los Angeles County sheriff's deputy and several other officers. The officers had neither a search warrant nor a warrant for defendant's arrest. Officer Stroh testified that he had furnished Officer Natisin with $175 in currency earlier the same day. The bills were of the following denominations: One $100 bill, five $10 bills and five $5 bills. Stroh dusted the bills with anthracine powder, a fluorescent substance, before giving them to Natisin and made a note of the serial numbers. About $200 was found on defendant's person after his arrest. Stroh tested the money with an ultra-violet light and found traces of fluorescent powder on bills of the same denominations as those he had given to Natisin. There were also traces of powder on Jackson's hands. The officer compared the serial numbers of the bills discovered in defendant's pockets with the numbers of the bills he had previously given to Natisin; they were identical.

Upon being questioned by the officers, Jackson said that a "cat" had given him the $200 found on his person. Stroh asked him "For what?" and defendant replied "You know." The officers then asked Jackson whether he had any narcotics paraphernalia and defendant said that he did. Jackson led them to the bathroom and showed them some hypodermic needles and some packages of powder; one of the packages was proved to contain heroin while the others were proved to contain milk sugar. When asked how much heroin he was selling and how much he was using, defendant told the officers: "Man, I use as much as I can sell." The needles and powders found in defendant's home were received in evidence without objection.

With respect to the prior convictions, the People introduced in evidence certified copies of official records showing that one Thomas Jackson had previously been convicted of two felonies and had served terms of imprisonment therefor in a California state prison. It was stipulated that defendant was the person named in the records.

Defendant testified that he did not sell any heroin to Officer Natisin. He did not give any packages to the officer. On two or three occasions, he was approached by Natisin and a Miss Julie Smith, whom he already knew. Miss Smith introduced Natisin to defendant; Natisin asked him if he could arrange to obtain narcotics, but Jackson refused. Defendant stated that he had between $60 and $80 on his person at the time of his arrest. The money belonged to him and he did not get it from the officer.

As we said earlier, the court found defendant guilty of the three offenses alleged in the information, but dismissed the charges involving the transactions occurring February 25th and March 2nd.

Upon request for appointment of counsel on the present appeal, the court referred the matter to the Los Angeles Bar Association Committee on Criminal Appeals for report to the court as to possible merit in the appeal. The matter was assigned to a member of the committee who has made written report to the court stating that the record had been examined and that in the opinion of the attorney it disclosed no valid ground of appeal. After we had examined the record, the request for appointment of counsel was denied. Defendant was duly so advised and his time to file a brief was substantially extended. No brief has been filed. In accordance with our practice, we have made a thorough study of the record. We have discovered no insufficiency of the evidence and no error at the trial.

Section 11502 of the Health and Safety Code provides in material part: "Every person who agrees, consents, or * * * officers to unlawfully sell, furnish, * * * or give any narcotic to any person, * * * and then sells, delivers, furnishes, * * * or gives, * * * any other liquid, substance, or material in lieu of any narcotic shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year, or in the state prison for not more than 10 years."

[1] The evidence was sufficient to establish that defendant committed a violation of the statute on March 5, 1957. The testimony of the deputies warranted the court in finding that defendant agreed to sell a half ounce of heroin to Officer Natisin, that the officer gave defendant $175 for the narcotics, and that Jackson gave the officer in exchange a substance which proved to be milk sugar. Although defendant denied selling anything to Natisin, his testimony created only a conflict in the evidence, which was resolved against him by the trier of fact. People v. Pastrana, 136 Cal.App. 2d 358, 288 P.2d 568.

[2] Defendant was represented by counsel at the trial and his counsel did not object to the introduction in evidence of the substance he sold to Natisin or the narcotics paraphernalia taken from his home. In the absence of a proper objection in the trial court, the admissibility of the evidence may not be questioned on the appeal. 3 Cal.Jur. 2d 634.

The judgment is affirmed.

The District Court of Appeal, Shinn, P. J., held that mere fact that complaint issued against defendant contained only one count, namely attempted robbery, and after a preliminary hearing, information subsequently filed by district attorney alleged count of attempted rob-

Order affirmed.

William Thomas, in pro. per.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., for defendant.

SHINN, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from an order denying a petition for writ of error coram nobis.

An information was filed against appellant in 1954, charging him in Count I with the attempted robbery of Manuel Earl Johnson on November 18, 1954, and in Count II with assaulting Johnson with a deadly weapon on the same date. December 17, 1954, appellant made a motion to dismiss Count I under section 995 of the Penal Code; at the same time, he entered a plea of not guilty as to Count II. December 22, 1954, Thomas withdrew his motion to dismiss Count I and entered a plea of not guilty. He was represented at the trial by a deputy public defender. Trial was to a jury which found him not guilty on Count I but found him guilty on Count II. Probation was denied and Thomas was sentenced to state prison for the term prescribed by law. Judgment was rendered March 24, 1955.

March 18, 1958, the instant petition was filed, setting forth as grounds for issuance of the writ that appellant was bound over by the committing magistrate only upon the charge of attempted robbery (Count I), of which he was subsequently acquitted; that the charge of assault with a deadly weapon (Count II), of which he was convicted, "had never been before a committing magistrate"; and that Count II was dismissed by the court under Penal Code, section 995 prior to his trial. The court below denied the petition, but the record does not disclose the ground or grounds for the ruling.

Upon application of appellant for appointment of counsel, this court referred the matter to the Los Angeles Bar Association Committee on Criminal Appeals for report to the court as to possible merit in the appeal. The matter was assigned to a member of the committee who has made written report to the court stating that the record had been examined and that in the opinion of the attorney it disclosed no meritorious ground of appeal. After we had examined the record the request for appointment of counsel was denied. Appellant was duly so advised and his time to file a brief was substantially extended. No brief has been filed. In accordance with our practice we have made a thorough study of the record.

[1] In our opinion the writ was properly denied. In order to present a meritorious application for vacation of a judgment there must be a strong showing of the existence of some fact which was unknown to the applicant at the time of trial and which could not have been ascertained by him in the exercise of reasonable diligence, and the fact must be one which, if it had been known, would have prevented the rendition of the judgment. People v. Adamson, 34 Cal.2d 320, 326-327, 210 P.2d 13, and cases cited. With respect to appellant's allegation that Count II of the information was dismissed prior to the trial, the record affirmatively discloses that Thomas made a motion to dismiss Count I, which he subsequently withdrew, and that he did not move to dismiss Count II.

With respect to the allegation that Count II "had never been before a committing magistrate", it appears from the record that a complaint was issued, containing but one count, namely, attempted robbery, and that after a preliminary hearing, appellant was held to answer by the magistrate. The information subsequently filed by the district attorney alleged the one count of attempted robbery and an additional count of assault with a deadly weapon. However, these facts, standing alone, furnish no basis for relief from the judgment.

[2] Section 739 of the Penal Code, enacted in 1951, provides in material part: "When a defendant has been examined and committed, as provided in Section 872, it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the county in which the offense is triable to file in the superior court of that county within 15 days after the commitment, an information against the defendant which may charge the defendant with either the offense or offenses named in the order of commitment or any offense or offenses shown by the evidence taken before the magistrate to have been committed. * * * (Emphasis added.) The statute authorizes the district attorney to charge by information the commission of any offense disclosed by the evidence taken at the preliminary hearing even though such offense is not specified in the commitment, provided the offense charged is related to the transaction which was the basis for the commitment order. People v. Dean, 158 Cal.App.2d 572, 322 P.2d 929, and cases cited.

Each count of the information filed by the district attorney alleged the commission of an offense against Manuel Johnson on November 18, 1954. Appellant has made no showing that the offenses were unrelated, or involved separate transactions, or that the evidence at the preliminary hearing was insufficient to warrant the magistrate in a reasonable belief that he was guilty of assaulting Johnson with a deadly weapon, as charged in the second count.

[3, 4] The facts alleged in the petition were wholly insufficient to justify a disturbance of the judgment. The petition could also properly have been denied upon the ground that there was no showing of any cause or excuse for the delay of three years in making the application. People v. Rodriguez, 143 Cal.App.2d 506, 299 P.2d 1057.

The order is affirmed.

David G. McInnes, Sacramento, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., by William O. Minor, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SCHOTTKY, Justice.

Lloyd Huston was charged with the crime of robbery, the information alleging that he forcibly took from the person of one Earl Zumwalt $70 in money and a Bulova wrist watch of the value of $50 by means of force and fear. Defendant pleaded not guilty and was found guilty by the jury of the crime of robbery in the first degree. His application for probation and his motion for a new trial were denied and judgment was pronounced. He has appealed from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant wrote a letter to this court in which he attempted to set forth what he considers to be errors occurring during the course of the trial, and also stating that he did not have an attorney. This court appointed Mr. David G. McInnes, of the Sacramento Bar, to represent appellant on appeal. Mr. McInnes has informed this court that after a thorough review of the record it is his opinion that appellant had a fair trial and that there is no merit to this appeal.

Earl Zumwalt testified that he arrived in Willits, California, December 14, 1956, for a two-day holiday. After getting a room he went to Manney's, a bar, for a few drinks. He was in and out of Manney's bar all afternoon and had several beers. During this time he cashed a check which gave him a total of about $90 which he placed in his two front pockets. He met three women in Manney's, bought them drinks, and was generally careless with his money. The group attended various bars during the afternoon and were at Manney's or John's Lodge when appellant joined them. Zumwalt asked one of the women to drive him to Laytonville, but appellant told him that all the woman wanted was his money and that he would take him there in his car. Zumwalt left with appellant later in the evening.

At the time he had about $70 in his pockets, and his Bulova wrist watch. About four to six miles north of Willits appellant stopped at a wide spot in the road, pulled out a knife and stuck Zumwalt with it. Appellant said "let's have it" and when Zumwalt replied "what are you talking about?" appellant said "the money." The knife was a large hunting knife with a single blade, and when Zumwalt attempted to slap it aside his thumb was cut. Appellant took Zumwalt's watch off his arm. He bent the victim over the seat, held the knife on him, scratched his neck and reached into his pockets and took out the money. He said he should kill Zumwalt. Appellant made Zumwalt take off his shoes and belt, took some keys in Zumwalt's possession and after some time left the victim standing in the road.

After being picked up by a passing motorist, Zumwalt was taken to the police station in Willits and from there to the hospital where he was treated for a lacerated thumb. He had blood all over him. He immediately complained of the robbery to the police.

Appellant was arrested February 10, 1957, and two days later a police officer found the victim's watch on a woman at the residence of appellant.

Defendant testified that he drove Zumwalt toward Laytonville and they argued as to who would pay for the gasoline for the trip; that suddenly Zumwalt hit him in the chest, and to protect himself he reached for a knife which he had in the glove compartment; that while he was withdrawing the knife Zumwalt reached for it and cut himself; that he started to push Zumwalt and they scuffled, and during the scuffle the band on Zumwalt's watch broke and the watch fell to the seat of the car; that Zumwalt reached into his own pocket and threw the bills on the seat. Defendant contended that he did not know the denomination of the bills. He denied any intent to rob Zumwalt. He asserted that he later attempted to locate Zumwalt for the purpose of returning his property.

[1,2] The evidence as related is sufficient to sustain the judgment. "Robbery is the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear." Penal Code, sec. 211. The evidence discloses that money and a watch were taken from Zumwalt's possession by appellant. There is evidence that appellant used a knife in order to effectuate the crime. This is sufficient to satisfy the requirement of force. Appellant's testimony merely raised a conflict for the jury to resolve.

Appellant, in his letter to the court, states that the court refused to permit his witnesses to testify. The only instance appearing in the record to which this statement could refer is when Mr. Osborne, a witness for the defense, was asked: "Did the defendant ever at any time make any statement to you concerning some property he had?"

[3] An objection that the question called for a self-serving, hearsay declaration of the defendant was sustained. In his offer of proof appellant's counsel explained that he wanted to show that the "defendant stated to various persons that he sought the owner of this property in order that it may be returned." Since these statements were offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statements themselves, they were clearly inadmissible hearsay. 1 Wharton's Criminal Evidence (1955 ed.), sec. 249; In re Estate of Gaines, 15 Cal.2d 255, 261, 100 P.2d 1055; People v. King, 140 Cal.App.2d 1, 5, 294 P.2d 972. No possible error could be predicated on this ruling.

[4] Appellant also contends in his letter that he has witnesses who can show that some of the statements made during the trial were slightly if not grossly wrong. This concerns matters outside of the record and cannot be reviewed on this appeal. Appellant also contends that the deputies told him that he would get a phony trial. This, too, concerns a matter which does not appear in the record and cannot be reviewed herein.

[5] The final contention in appellant's letter is that one of the jurors did not reside in the county. There is nothing in the record to support this contention. The record shows that the prospective jurors were examined on voir dire and that no objection to the alleged non-resident juror was made. An objection made after the trial is too late. People v. McFarlane, 138 Cal. 481, 490, 71 P. 568, 72 P. 48, 61 L.R.A. 245; 29 Cal.Jur.2d, Jury, sec. 35, p. 533.

After a careful review of the entire record we are satisfied that the appellant received a fair trial, that the jury was fully and correctly instructed, and that the evidence supports the judgment.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

Proceedings in the matter of decedent's estate. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Arthur K. Marshall, J., entered an order fixing inheritance tax, and an appeal was taken. The District Court of Appeal, Patrosso, J. pro tem., held that for purposes of Revenue and Taxation Code section, subjecting to inheritance tax inter vivos transfers made without valuable and adequate consideration if transferee promised to make payments to, or care for, transferor, adequacy of consideration must be determined as of date when transfer was made; and held that since annuity had had fair and reasonable value of not more than $75,000 on date when 73 year old woman (the decedent) transferred property then worth $155,000 to her daughter in consideration for daughter's agreement to assume $34,000 mortgage and pay her $600 per month for life, there had been inadequate consideration for transfer, notwithstanding fact that decedent had lived to be 93 and that total amount paid under annuity agreement had exceeded $140,000.

Reversed with directions.

1. Taxation ☞900(5)

In inheritance tax case, trial court's determination that consideration paid to decedent for transfer of property had been valuable and adequate was, though denominated a "finding of fact," clearly a conclusion of law, the validity of which was dependent upon probative facts from which it had been drawn; and there being no dispute as to facts, such determination was not binding upon reviewing court.

2. Taxation ☞895(4)

Adequacy of consideration for inter vivos transfer is to be determined, for inheritance tax purposes, as of date of transfer rather than as of date of transferor's death.

3. Taxation ☞878(1)

Where annuity had fair and reasonable value of not more than $75,000 on date when 73 year old woman transferred property then worth $155,000 to her daughter in consideration for daughter's agreement to assume $34,000 mortgage and pay her $600 per month for life, there was, for inheritance tax purposes, inadequate consideration for transfer, notwithstanding fact that mother lived to be 93 and that total amount paid under annuity agreement exceeded $140,000.

4. Taxation ☞895(6)

In determining, for inheritance tax purposes, value of an annuity promised to transferor in consideration for transfer of property, net income received from transferred property, or at least the income which transferor might have normally been expected to have received from transferred property, must be deducted in determining value of consideration (annuity) given for transfer of property. West's Ann.Rev. & Tax.Code, §§ 13641, 13643-13645.

5. Contracts ☞53

Adequacy of consideration for contract must be determined as of date of agreement.

6. Appeal and Error ☞1008(3)

Where interpretation and legal effect of written agreement depended solely on language of document, reviewing court was not bound by trial court's construction and could determine effect of said agreement as a matter of law.

Liability in inheritance tax cases does not turn upon intention of grantor, but upon character of interests created by transfer; and even though decedent had purported to make an exchange of undivided interest in property for an annuity having a certain value and to "give" to her daughter the remaining undivided interest in property, it did not follow, for purposes of determining inheritance tax liability, that two separate and independent transactions had been in reality entered into.

8. Taxation Ⓒ881

Inheritance tax on transfer, under which transferee promises to make payments to transferor, cannot be avoided by payment of consideration only equal to value of undivided interest denominated as "sold" and not equal to value of entire property, including undivided interest therein designated as being subject of "gift". West's Ann.Rev. & Tax.Code, § 13645.

9. Taxation Ⓒ878(1)

Revenue and Taxation Code section codified a portion of 1935 inheritance tax act and was designed to subject to inheritance tax inter vivos transfers made without valuable and adequate consideration if transferee promised to make payments to, "or" care for, transferor; and under that section transfer would be taxable even though payments promised were annuity payments and even if such payments were not intended for support of transferor. West's Ann.Rev. & Tax.Code, § 13645.

10. Taxation Ⓒ878(1)

Consideration paid to insurance company for annuity policy is ordinarily adequate; but since inheritance tax law, by its express terms, includes all transfers by "bargain" and "sale" made without consideration, a transfer of property to insurance company in exchange for annuity could come within purview of inheritance tax law. West's Ann.Rev. & Tax.Code, § 13641.

PATROSSO, Justice pro tem.

Appeal by the Controller of the State of California from an order fixing the inheritance tax in the above-named estate.

The sole question presented is whether certain inter vivos transfers by the decedent, hereinafter to be mentioned, are subject to inheritance tax.

The facts are not in dispute. The decedent, Florence R. Stevens, died on May 29, 1955, at the age of 93. On December 20, 1935, when Mrs. Stevens was 73 years of age, she conveyed, by deed absolute in form, three parcels of real property to her daughter Kathryn Stevens Albright. Contemporaneously with the execution of the deed, however, an agreement was executed between Mrs. Stevens and Kathryn which, after reciting the conveyance of said real properties to Kathryn, provides that in consideration of said conveyance and of the natural love and affection between the parties Kathryn agrees to pay to her mother for the term of the latter's life the sum of $600 per month commencing January 10, 1936, as and for an annuity of $7,200 per annum. Kathryn also assumed and promised to pay the unpaid balance of $34,000 due upon a note secured by a mortgage upon one of the parcels so transferred to Kathryn. Additionally, the agreement recites that the parties had agreed that the net value of the real properties transferred to Kathryn, after deducting the $34,000 mortgage, was $121,000 and then proceeds to provide as follows: "(4) Of the amount of the property transferred to the party of the second party [Kathryn] Seventy-five Thousand Dollars ($75,000.00) thereof represents the cost of the annuity hereinabove provided for. The balance the party of the first part [Mrs. Stevens] has given, and by these presents does give, to the party of the second part without restriction as an outright gift."

Also contemporaneously with the execution of the deed and the agreement last above mentioned Kathryn executed a declaration of trust wherein she acknowledged that she held an undivided one-half interest in and to the properties conveyed to Kathryn by Mrs. Stevens in trust for another daughter of Mrs. Stevens, Esther Stevens Heinsch. It was therein provided that the trust thereby created was to continue until the death of Mrs. Stevens and that the net income from the trust property after deducting therefrom all expenses incurred in the maintenance and operation thereof, all payments made on account of the mortgage upon the one parcel and the retention by the trustee of $300 per month (one-half of the $600 monthly payment which Kathryn had agreed to pay to her mother) was payable to Esther or in the event of her death prior to the termination of the trust to Esther's children. Upon the termination of the trust the corpus was to vest in Esther or in the event of her prior death in her children.

At the same time, Kathryn and Esther entered into an agreement which, after reciting the annuity agreement entered into between Kathryn and Mrs. Stevens and the agreement of the former to pay the mortgage upon one of the parcels transferred to Kathryn and the execution of the declaration of trust last above mentioned, provides that Esther acknowledges that Kathryn executed said annuity agreement for the joint benefit of Kathryn and Esther and the latter "assumes and agrees to share equally with second party [Kathryn] any and all obligations created under said annuity agreement."

Appellant contends that the transfer of the property in question is taxable under each and all of sections 13643, 13644 and 13645 of the Revenue and Taxation Code. This contention is necessarily premised upon the proposition that the transfer was made without a "valuable and adequate consideration" as that term is defined in section 13641 of the Revenue and Taxation Code, for the sections under which the right to tax is asserted by the appellant have application only to such transfers. Thus we first address ourselves to a consideration of the evidence upon this subject.

It is admitted that the net value of the properties transferred, as of the date of the transfer, was $121,000. Additionally, it is made to appear that the annual net income realized by Mrs. Stevens from the property so transferred during the three years immediately preceding the transfer was less than the $7,200 annuity agreed to be paid commencing with the year 1936 as aforesaid. Specifically, the net income from the property during said years, computed without any deduction for annual depreciation, was as follows: 1933, $5,279.49; 1934, $4,054.62; 1935, $6,391.31.

As to the net income realized by the daughters from the property after the transfer, the evidence was as follows: From 1935 to 1940, the monthly net income from the transferred property was sometimes sufficient and sometimes not sufficient to equal the $600 monthly payment; and from 1940 to decedent's death on May 29, 1955, the net income was equal to or more than $600 per month. The exact amount of the net income realized by the daughters from the transferred property during the years from December 20, 1935, to May 29, 1955, cannot be ascertained from the record; but the evidence clearly establishes that substantial net income was realized by the daughters from the transferred property, which said net income during the period from 1940 to May 29, 1955, was equal to or in excess of $600 per month. The evidence also showed that, during 1946, the daughters sold portions of the transferred property, realizing a net of $198,826.06 therefrom and reinvested the proceeds in other investments for their own account.

The evidence further discloses that, during each and every month from January 1936 to May 1955 the daughters paid to their mother the sum of $600 pursuant to the annuity agreement; and that the total of the annuity payments so paid by them to Mrs. Stevens amounted to $140,400. Also the daughters paid the mortgage indebtedness of $34,000 which they had assumed and agreed to pay. Further, the daughters paid for substantial alterations and improvements to the transferred property the total sum of $14,600.

There was evidence adduced by respondents that, on December 20, 1935, an annuity contract providing a $600 monthly life income to a woman age 73 (Mrs. Stevens' age at said time) could have been purchased from insurance companies at cost ranging from $65,520 to $67,980 for such a life annuity contract containing no cash refund provisions, and at cost ranging from $84,900 to $90,960 for such an annuity contract containing cash refund provisions in event the annuitant died before she had received a return equal to the premium paid.

In this connection, there was also the further testimony of decedent's son-in-law (a banker of long experience who had for some years been assisting Mrs. Stevens in the management of her properties) that an attempt had been made in 1935 to determine the capitalized value of an annuity providing for payment of a $7,200 annuity for life to a woman age 73; that various insurance companies had been contacted; that a variety of figures had been quoted by the insurance companies; and that $75,000 seemed to be a reasonable figure for the capitalized value of such an insurance contract taking into consideration the variety of figures quoted by the various insurance companies.

The determination of the question as to whether the transfer was supported by a valuable and adequate consideration is dependent in part on the answer to a related question, later to be considered; to wit, whether it can be held, as found by the trial court, that Mrs. Stevens and Kathryn entered into two separate and distinct transactions, namely: first, a bargain and sale exchange of an undivided 75/121st interest in the said real property for an annuity having a fair market value of $75,000; and, second, a complete, absolute and irrevocable gift (independent of the exchange) of an undivided 46/121st interest in the said real property.

The first of the two bases upon which the trial court found and respondents contend that the transfer was made for a valuable and adequate consideration is that the payments made by the daughters to or on behalf of their mother (i. e., the annuity payments in the total sum of $140,400 and the payment of $34,000 mortgage indebtedness) constituted a valuable and adequate consideration for the transferred property.

More specifically, the trial court, in this particular connection, found: "The total amount of such sums so paid [by the daughters to their mother pursuant to the annuity agreement] equals $140,400.00. Also, [the daughters] paid the mortgage indebtedness of $34,000.00 which they had expressly assumed and agreed to pay. The total consideration paid therefor by [the daughters] from their own funds which did not originate directly or indirectly with the decedent was $174,400.00. The consideration paid was valuable and adequate and was more than equal in money or money's worth to the full value of the three parcels of property described in the inheritance tax report." (Emphasis added.)

[1-3] While denominated a finding of fact the last sentence thereof, which we have emphasized, is clearly a conclusion of law the validity of which is dependent upon the probative facts from which it is drawn and concerning which there is no dispute. The conclusion therefore is not, as respondents contend, binding upon this court unless it be true as a matter of law that the adequacy of the consideration paid or given in return for a promise to make annuity payments is to be determined as of the date of the death of the annuitant and measured by the total amount of payments made pursuant thereto during the lifetime of the annuitant. We have concluded that the law is otherwise and it may not be held that the payments so made by the daughters constituted a valuable and adequate consideration for the transferred property.

In the first place, as previously noted, the undisputed evidence shows, and the trial court also found, that the net income received by the daughters from the transferred property was equal to or more than $600 per month from 1940 until the death of the decedent on May 29, 1955; and that, from December 20, 1935, to January 1, 1940, said net income in some months would equal $600 and in some months would not equal $600.

While the evidence may fall somewhat short of definitely establishing, as the controller contends, that the net income received by the daughters from the transferred property equaled or exceeded the total amount of the $600 monthly payments made to the mother, it clearly establishes at the minimum that net income in excess of $111,000 was received by the daughters from the transferred property.

The trial court's aforementioned conclusion that the said $174,400 so paid by the daughters in annuity and mortgage payments was more than equal in money or money's worth to the full value of the transferred property was obviously made without taking into consideration either the net income realized by the transferees from the transferred property during the same period, or the sum which the transferor might have normally been expected to have received from the transferred property or on its commuted value.

[4] Assuming without deciding at this point that the said payments could be properly considered at all (in view of the other evidence and findings as to the fair market value of the annuity agreed to be paid at the time of the transfer, as hereinafter discussed) in determining whether the transfer was made for a valuable and adequate consideration, there is no warrant in our opinion for treating the gross amount of the said payments so made as the value of the consideration given without making any adjustment or deduction therefrom for the net income received by the transferees from the transferred property; or at least without making adjustment and deduction for the income which the transferor might normally have been expected to have received from the transferred property or on its commuted value.

We see no escape from the logic of the principle enunciated in Fidelity Union Trust Co. v. Martin, 118 N.J.L. 277, 192 A. 74, 80 and Updike v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 8 Cir., 88 F.2d 807, 813, that, in determining the value of an annuity promised to be paid to a transferor in consideration of a transfer of property to the transferee, the net income received from the transferred property or at least the income which the transferor might have normally been expected to have received from the transferred property or on its commuted value, must be deducted in determining the value of the consideration (annuity) given for the transferred property.

In Fidelity Union Trust Co. v. Martin, supra, where certain of the transferees had agreed to pay annuities to the transferor in excess of the amount which the transferor might normally have realized upon the principal amount transferred, the Supreme Court of New Jersey enunciated said principle succinctly, as follows, (192 A. at page 80): "We also concur in the result reached by the Vice-Ordinary * * as to the basic principle upon which the actual financial value of the consideration received by the donor for each transfer should be computed. Summarized it may be stated thus: That the consideration of adequate financial value is the amount by which the sum agreed to be paid annually exceeds the sum which the donor would normally receive on the fund commuted as of the date of the instrument of transfer."

In Updike v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, supra, where the transferor in contemplation of death had transferred property to his three sons in consideration of their promise to pay the father during his life the yearly sum of $27,000 and where it appeared that the annuity of $27,000 amounted approximately to the income derived from the transferred property, the Circuit Court of Appeals (Eighth Circuit), after pointing out that the father's estate would have been taxed for the entire value of the transferred property had he kept the property until his death, stated, inter alia, as follows (88 F.2d at page 813): "That being the situation, why should the tax be less where he has transferred in contemplation of death and the transferee in substance has agreed to collect the income and pay it back to him in the form of an annuity? * * * [T]he value of the transferred property at the time of decedent's death was not diminished by the fact that there had been paid back to him in the form of an annuity an amount substantially equal to the income derived from [the transferred] property. * * * To regard such an annuity as consideration would lead to absurd consequences." While it is true, as respondents point out, that the Udike case was essentially determined upon the basis that the transfer therein was made in contemplation of death and that the federal estate tax regulations did not allow an annuity to be deducted where given in exchange for a transfer of property made in contemplation of death, the logic of the court's observations that an annuity cannot be regarded as consideration for a transfer where the income derived from the transferred property is substantially equal to the amount of the annuity, is not and cannot be disputed.

Also while the court in the Udike case had before it a situation where the income derived from the transferred property was substantially equal to the amount of the annuity, it necessarily follows that where the transferred property produces income although not equal to the amount of the annuity there is no consideration to the extent of the income derived therefrom.

Nourse v. Riddell, D.C., 143 F.Supp. 759, cited and relied upon by respondents, is factually distinguishable from the instant case. If, however, it may be said to support the proposition that, upon the facts of the instant case, the adequacy of the consideration for a promise to make annuity payments is to be determined as of the date of the annuitant's death and measured by the total amount of the payments made during the annuitant's lifetime we cannot subscribe thereto.

Further, the respondents' own evidence, construed in the most favorable light to them, discloses and the trial court found, that the fair and reasonable value of the annuity at the time of the transfer was not in excess of $75,000. In view thereof and for the reasons set forth immediately below, it cannot be held that the part of the consideration for the transfer represented by the annuity is to be evaluated at $140,400 (the total of the annuity payments made to the mother) as found by the trial court.

[5] It is, of course, the established rule in the law of contracts that the adequacy of consideration must be determined as of the date of the agreement. Drullinger v. Erskine, 71 Cal.App.2d 492, 495, 163 P.2d 48; Long Beach Drug Co. v. United Drug Co., 13 Cal.2d 158, 165, 88 P.2d 698, 89 P.2d 386; 12 Cal.Jur.2d 225, 226.

There is no reason why the same rule should not apply in determining the adequacy of the consideration given for an inter vivos transfer under the inheritance tax law. Indeed if the adequacy of consideration for annuity contracts were to be determined as of the date of the annuitant's death many such transactions, not otherwise taxable, would be rendered so by the fortuitous circumstance that the annuitant died before the payments received equaled the consideration paid for the contract.

Briefly respondents' contention is that there is no logical reason nor rule of law, except perhaps in eminent domain cases, which forbids the use of knowledge acquired later in ascertaining a value which, if known at the valuation date, would have materially affected the amount fixed as the price or value. Accordingly, respondents urge that, in evaluating the consideration given for the transfer (the annuity), said annuity should be evaluated in accordance with the amount of the actual payments later made to the annuitant. However, it is implicit in their argument and essential to their contention that the other factor involved, i. e., the transferred property should be evaluated as of the date of the transfer.

It is wholly inconsistent to evaluate the property transferred as of the date of the transfer and to evaluate the consideration given (the annuity) as of a later date, as the respondents contend and as the trial court in fact did; and it would further appear that, if the value of the annuity is to be determined in accordance with the situation existing at date of the annuitant's death, the value of the property should likewise be valued as of date of the annuitant's death. In the instant case this would only serve to prove that there was not an adequate consideration for the transfer, since the transferred property had value, as shown by the inheritance tax appraiser's report, of $273,250 as of the date of the annuitant's death as compared with the $174,400 paid to the annuitant or on her behalf.

The second of the two bases upon which the trial court found and respondents contend that the transfer was made for a valuable and adequate consideration is that Mrs. Stevens and Kathryn, in the view of the trial court, entered into two separate and distinct transactions; namely, first, a bargain and sale exchange of an undivided  $\frac{75}{121}$ st interest in the transferred property for a valuable and adequate consideration of \$75,000; and, secondly, a complete, absolute and irrevocable gift (independent of said exchange) of an undivided  $\frac{46}{121}$ st interest in the transferred property from Mrs. Stevens to Kathryn.

Although certain of respondents' own evidence establishes that the annuity in question could have been purchased at cost ranging from $65,520 to $67,980 and although appellant contends that it had a lower value if evaluated in accordance with his "Combined Experienced Tables of Mortality," there is no question that there was some evidence (i. e., the testimony aforementioned of decedent's son-in-law) sufficient to sustain the trial court's finding that the annuity had a fair market value of $75,000 as of the time of the transfer.

The primary questions to be determined in this connection are therefore: Whether the trial court's findings that the parties entered into the two said separate and independent transactions can be sustained; and, if so, whether the giving of a consideration adequate for the transfer of a  $\frac{75}{121}$ st interest in the transferred property is adequate where an accompanying gift of a  $\frac{46}{121}$ st interest is also made to the transferee.

As hereinbefore quoted in full, the agreement between Mrs. Stevens and Kathryn by its terms states that of the amount of the property transferred to Kathryn, $75,000 represented the cost of the annuity which Kathryn agreed to pay to her mother, and that the balance was given to Kathryn without restriction as an outright gift.

The only parol evidence (testimony of decedent's son-in-law) introduced in aid of the interpretation of the agreement added nothing and afforded no aid in interpreting the agreement. Said testimony consisted merely of statements by the witness with reference to the agreement that it was his opinion that there was an outright gift by Mrs. Stevens to Kathryn of the equity (balance) in the property in excess of $75,000 and the $34,000 mortgage indebtedness.

[6] Accordingly, since the interpretation and legal effect of the said written agreement depended solely on the language of the document, this court on appeal is not bound by the trial court's construction, but may determine the effect of said agreement as a matter of law. (12 Cal.Jur.2d 326, 327.)

[7] There can be no doubt that judged by the language of the agreement alone the decedent purported to make a sale or exchange of an undivided interest in the property for $75,000 and to give to her daughter the remaining undivided interest in the property represented by the value of said property in excess of $75,000; but it does not follow in determining inheritance tax liability that two separate and independent transactions were in reality entered into, notwithstanding the expressed intention.

As succinctly stated in Re Estate of Hyde, 92 Cal.App.2d 6, 14, 206 P.2d 420, 425, "[i]ability in [inheritance tax] cases does not turn upon the intention of the grantor, but upon the character of the interests created by the transfer."

As further and more completely stated by the Supreme Court of New Jersey in Schroeder v. Zink, 1949, 4 N.J. 1, 71 A.2d 321, 325-326: "In taxing inter vivos transfers the substance rather than the form of the transfer controls. * * * So it has been held that the statute is concerned with the net substantial result of the entire transaction. * * * As expressed in In re Kellogg's Estate, 123 N.J.Eq. 322, 324, 197 A. 263, 264 * * *, 'that which is material and all-important is whether the thing which has been done, amounts in substance to the thing which the Legislature has made taxable,—not whether the thing which has been done has in substance accomplished the purpose of the transferor.'" (Emphasis added.)

Commenting with apparent approval on the exhaustive treatise by Professor Rottschaefer in 26 Iowa Law Review 514, the court in Re Estate of Hyde, supra, 92 Cal. App.2d 6, 18, 206 P.2d 420, 428, observes: "The author concludes that most of the courts today are no longer using the technical and formal reasoning once employed, but are looking to see, from a realistic standpoint, what economic benefits are in fact shifted by the questioned transfer." (Emphasis added.)

From any realistic viewpoint, the net substantial result of the entire transaction herein was that the decedent transferred the entire property to the transferee, and received back in consideration therefor the transferee's agreement to pay her $600 per month for life.

Except for the decedent's declaration that she intended part of the transferred property to be a gift, such transfer was clearly not made for an adequate consideration, since the value of the annuity at the time of the transfer was not in excess of $75,000 and the mortgage indebtedness assumed only amounted to $34,000 making the total of the consideration given $109,000 for transferred property having a value of $155,000 at the time of the transfer.

The further question is whether a transferor can alter the situation by a declaration that the portion of the transferred property exceeding the value of the consideration given, is intended to be a gift. Under the authorities cited and under any realistic view of the matter, the decedent's intention cannot change "the thing which has been done"; namely, the transfer of the entire property to the transferee for a promise on the transferee's part to pay the transferor $600 per month for life.

In re Estate of Thurston, 36 Cal.2d 207, 211, 223 P.2d 12, 14, cited and relied upon by respondents, does not support respondents' position. While it is stated therein that "[i]t is immaterial whether such a transfer is accomplished by a single transaction or, * * * by an initial transfer and [a] subsequent relinquishment," the language had reference to a situation where the transferor first made a transfer of real property without consideration to his children and reserved to himself a life estate, and at a later date made a relinquishment (an outright transfer) of his retained interest (his life estate) in said real property.

The quoted language has, of course, to be construed in relation to the whole context; and, as so construed, it merely means that a transferor might in a single transaction make an outright gift of real property; or, where he first makes a gift but reserves a life estate in the real property, he may later make a relinquishment (an outright transfer) of his retained interest in said real property. Accordingly, it may very well have been that the decedent herein could have made a relinquishment of her interest in the annuity, but she did not do so.

[8] By analogy and since a transfer under which the transferee promises to make payments to the transferor falls in the same category as a transfer in con-temptation of death insofar as tax liability is concerned, it would also seem that the tax on a transfer under which the transferee promises to make payments to the transferor, cannot be avoided by payment of a consideration only equal to the value of an undivided interest denominated as a sale and not equal to the value of the entire property including the undivided interest therein designated as a gift.

We are not unmindful of Hirsh v. United States, 1929, 35 F.2d 982, 986, cited by respondents, wherein the Court of Claims stated in substance, with reference to a somewhat analogous agreement, that the agreement provided for two things, first a gift and secondly the purchase of an annuity; and that the fact that the decedent chose to unite the gift with the purchase of the annuity in one transaction, did not alter the fact that the agreement provided for two different things. The case was however primarily decided on other considerations (i. e., that a transfer of the type made was not taxable as a part of the estate of the decedent under federal statutes materially different from section 13645 of our Revenue and Taxation Code). In any event for the reasons indicated above, we are not disposed to follow it here.

The final question which remains to be determined is: Whether the transfer in question is one made subject to tax under any provision of the inheritance tax law.

As previously mentioned, the controller contends that the said transfer is subject to tax under each and all of the following sections of the Inheritance Tax Law: namely, (1) under section 13643 of the Revenue and Taxation Code as a transfer made with intention to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after the death of the transferor; (2) under section 13644 as a transfer under which the transferor expressly or impliedly reserved for his life an income or interest in the property transferred; and (3) under section 13645 as a transfer under which the transferee promised to make payments to or care for the transferor.

Much of the argument in the briefs is devoted to the question of whether the said transfer is subject to tax under section 13643 or section 13644, and to the question of whether In re Estate of Hyde, supra, 92 Cal.App.2d 6, 206 P.2d 420 (where it was held that the transfers made therein pursuant to agreement on the part of the transferees to pay annuities to the transferor were subject to the tax under §§ 13643 and 13644), is applicable and controlling herein.

In our opinion, however, it is unnecessary to consider whether the transfers herein are subject to tax under said sections 13643 or 13644 for the reason that the transfer made herein is in any event clearly subject to tax under section 13645 of the Revenue and Taxation Code.

It should be mentioned at this point that the question of whether the transfers made in the Hyde case were taxable under said section 13645 was not passed upon in that case (see the opinion in Re Estate of Hyde, supra, 92 Cal.App.2d at page 21, 206 P.2d at page 429), for the reasons that most of the transfers there involved were made before the provisions contained in said section were first enacted into law (Stats.1935, ch. 358, pp. 1266, 1268) and were held in any event to be taxable under sections 13643 and 13644.

[9] Section 13645 of the Revenue and Taxation Code provides, as follows: "A transfer conforming to Section 13641 [i. e., an inter vivos transfer made without a valuable and adequate consideration] and under which the transferee promises to make payments to or care for the transferor is a transfer subject to this part."

Said section is a codification of the last clause of subdivision (3) (b) of section 2 of the "Inheritance Tax Act of 1935" (Stats.1935, ch. 358, pp. 1266, 1268, effective June 25, 1935), which was in effect at the time the transfer herein was made and which provided that inter vivos transfers made without valuable and adequate consideration were subject to inheritance tax when: "(b) Intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after [the transferor's] death, or in which a life income or interest is reserved by the grantor, either expressly or impliedly, or by the grantee promising to make payments to or care for the grantor." (Emphasis added.)

Said provision now codified as section 13645 of the Revenue and Taxation Code was first added to the inheritance tax law in 1935. The prior provisions of the inheritance tax law simply provided that inter vivos transfers were taxable when made: "(a) In contemplation of the death of the * * * donor, or, (b) Intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death." In re Estate of Schmidt, 49 Cal.App.2d 86, 89, 121 P.2d 104, 106; Deering's General Laws (1931), Act 8443, § 2, subd. 3.

It had long been a perplexing question before the courts whether a transfer was taxable where the transferee promised to pay the transferor an annuity or to care for him. 157 A.L.R. 964, 995 et seq.; 26 Iowa Law Review 514. It was fairly well established that, if the annuity promised to be paid was dependent upon and only payable out of and to the extent of income to be received from the transferred property, the transfer would be held to be taxable. However, if the transferee made an independent promise to pay an annuity or care for the transferor not tied into or dependent on the income to be received from the transferred property, the cases were in conflict as to whether the transfer was taxable. 157 A.L.R. 964, 995, et seq.; 26 Iowa Law Review 514; Fidelity Union Trust Co. v. Martin, supra, 118 N.J.L. 277, 192 A. 74.

In view thereof and of the express and sweeping language of section 13645 (and similarly of the last clause of subd. (3) (b) of § 2 of the "Inheritance Tax Act of 1935"), it cannot be doubted that the Legislature intended to close the gap and to subject to tax inter vivos transfers made without valuable and adequate consideration where the transferee promises to make payments to or care for the transferor.

Respondents in effect are asking us to construe section 13645 as though the words read "under which the transferee promises to make payments (other than annuity payments) to * * * the transferor." The section cannot be so read and permits of no such exception.

Respondents would also have us construe the section as applying only to "support payments" and to hold it inapplicable to the situation herein since there was no evidence that the annuity payments were made as "support payments." The unmistakable wording of the section is in the alternative, i. e., that the transfer is taxable where "the transferee promises to make payments to or care for the transferor." (Emphasis added.)

[10] Finally, there is no merit to respondents' implied claim that, if section 13645 is construed as having reference to and including annuity payments, such construction would, in principle, subject ordinary annuities purchased from insurance companies to taxation.

Briefly and as the court noted in Re Estate of Hyde, supra, the consideration ordinarily paid the annuitant in the purchase of an annuity policy from an insurance company is adequate. However, if an insurance company should depart from its usual practice of asking and receiving cash payment for the premium for issuance of the annuity contract and if it should elect to enter into an arrangement under which the annuitant transfers to it, or exchanges property, in payment of the premium, there is no reason why such a transfer would not be taxable if the insurance company should receive property having a far greater value than its ordinary premium for the issuance of an annuity contract.

Our inheritance tax law by its express terms includes all transfers by "bargain" and "sale" where made without adequate consideration (Rev. & Tax.Code, § 13641); and a sale or exchange made to insurance company without adequate consideration would be as equally within the purview of the inheritance tax law as the transfer made herein. See: Schroeder v. Zink, supra, 4 N.J. 1, 71 A.2d 321, 325, in re a contract for purchase of corporate stock.

In the appellant's reply brief it is conceded that in valuing the properties transferred for the purpose of determining the inheritance tax thereon there should be deducted from the value thereof as determined at date of death the sum of $34,000 paid on account of the mortgage and the sum of $14,600 paid for improvements by the daughters subsequent to the transfer, and if the appraiser, in his appraisal, has not made allowance therefor he should be instructed to do so.

The order appealed from is reversed with instructions to the trial court to take appropriate proceedings not inconsistent herewith and to fix the inheritance tax accordingly.

Divorce action. The Superior Court, Los Angeles County, William P. Haughton, J., entered an order setting aside defendant husband's default and an interlocutory decree, and wife appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Shinn, P. J., held that where wife alleged in her verified complaint that $80 per month for child support was a reasonable amount, and from allegations of the complaint that community property had been divided, it was obvious that the parties had agreed upon an amount for child support, and husband had no reason to believe wife would request more than the agreed amount or that without such a request the court would grant more, action of the court in granting a larger amount for child support constituted a surprise to both parties, and court did not abuse its discretion in setting aside the decree entered following husband's default, to allow husband to litigate question of child support.

Order affirmed.

SHINN, Presiding Justice.

Alma C. Peters sued her husband, Clarence, for divorce upon the ground of cruelty. She also sought custody of their four year old son, and an order requiring defendant to make reasonable payments for his support. The complaint alleged that the parties had divided their community property and that the agreement therefor was fully executed; it also alleged that $80 a month was a reasonable amount for the support of the child and within the ability of defendant to pay. Defendant was served with summons and complaint and upon his failure to appear in the action his default was duly entered. On June 19, 1957, the matter was heard as a default and the court granted plaintiff an interlocutory decree, awarding her custody of Danny and ordering defendant to pay $115 a month for child support. July 13, 1957, defendant noticed a motion under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure to vacate the default and the default judgment upon the grounds that they had been taken against him through mistake, inadvertence and surprise. The motion was granted and the default and the interlocutory decree were set aside. Plaintiff appeals.

The motion was heard on affidavits of Mr. and Mrs. Peters. The affidavit of Mr. Peters averred as follows: Defendant is a fireman employed by the City of Los Angeles. He and his wife separated on or about March 1, 1957. Prior to the separation, they entered into an oral agreement respecting their property rights. In accordance with the agreement, defendant assigned to his wife his interest in the family home; Mrs. Peters sold the house and agreed to pay the fee of her attorney out of the proceeds of the sale. The parties also agreed that Mrs. Peters would have custody of the son, with rights of reasonable visitation in her husband, and that Mr. Peters would pay $80 a month for the support of the child. Pursuant to the agreement, defendant went to the office of his wife's attorney, where he was served with summons and complaint in the divorce action. After reading the complaint, he informed the attorney that the allegations respecting the division of community property and the amount of child support reflected his agreement with Mrs. Peters. The attorney told him that "this was the agreement" and that the court would make its order for child support in accordance with the allegations and prayer of the complaint, that it would be unnecessary for him to retain his own attorney or to appear in the proceedings, and that he would be protected. Thereafter defendant took no further steps, and he was subsequently advised, in a letter from the attorney, that his default had been entered and that the court had ordered support payments in the amount of $115 a month. The attorney wrote: "This was done by the Judge without us asking for same and, of course, you will be required to comply." A copy of the letter was attached to the affidavit as an exhibit. Defendant also averred that the circumstances of the parties were unchanged, that he had been making the agreed payments of $80 a month, and that he had not been advised by his wife or by her attorney that a sum in excess of $80 a month would be requested or obtained. Defendant tendered a proposed answer, alleging that he was willing and able to pay $80 a month for child support but was unable to pay a greater amount. The averments of the defendant's affidavit were not denied.

Mrs. Peters averred in her affidavit that she entered in good faith into the agreement set forth in her husband's affidavit and that neither she nor her attorney asked at the trial for child support in excess of $80 a month. She gave truthful answers to the questions asked her by the judge. Mrs. Peters also averred that the actual cost of maintaining the child was more than $115 a month and defendant was able to pay that amount.

In urging a reversal of the order, Mrs. Peters contends that the facts alleged by her husband were insufficient as a matter of law to justify vacation of the default and the interlocutory decree. She argues, in this connection, that Mr. Peters had no right to rely upon her attorney's representations that the court would order child support payments of $80 a month and that he should not have been relieved from the consequences of his default merely because the amount of the order exceeded the amount he expected to pay. The argument cannot be maintained.

[1] A motion to set aside a default judgment of divorce is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court and an order vacating the decree will not be disturbed on appeal unless it is shown that the court has been guilty of a plain abuse of discretion. Gregory v. Gregory, 92 Cal. App.2d 343, 345-346, 206 P.2d 1122, and cases cited.

[2] Defendant made out a clear case for relief. Both he and plaintiff's attorney properly assumed that the court would award $80 per month for child support. Plaintiff had alleged in her verified complaint that this was a reasonable amount and from the allegation of the complaint that the community property had been divided it was obvious that the parties had agreed upon an amount for child support. Defendant had no reason to believe that plaintiff would request more than the agreed amount or that without such a request the court would grant more. The action of the court, no doubt, came as a surprise to both parties.

The court did not abuse its discretion in setting aside the decree so as to allow defendant to litigate the question of child support. Vacation of the judgment was not only proper but it could not reasonably have been refused. Garcia v. Garcia, 105 Cal.App.2d 289, 233 P.2d 23.

Action by brewer against a distributor for balance due on open account for beer sold, wherein distributor cross-complained for damages for breach of contract. The Superior Court, Butte County, J. F. Good, J., entered judgment adverse to brewer and it appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Van Dyke, P. J., held that where evidence presented a question for the jury as to the existence of an oral contract for the exclusive sale and distribution of brewer's product in an agreed area, to run for a reasonable duration, brewer was entitled to an instruction that if jury found the parties agreed that brewer would continue distributor as its distributor for a reasonable time, then it must determine what period would constitute such reasonable time, and if such reasonable time exceeded one year, such agreement would not be binding upon brewer unless in writing, and failure to give such instruction was prejudicial error.

6. Contracts Ⓒ353(6)

In action for breach of a beer distributing contract, trial court did not err in refusing instruction to the effect that if distributor had a reasonable time to recoup his expenditures and had made a profit, he could not recover damages on account of the termination of the contract by brewer, since if contract was one which was to run for a reasonable time it would not expire as soon as a profit has been made, nor would it become terminable at will.

VAN DYKE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff San Francisco Brewing Corporation brought this action on September 30, 1954, against defendant Clyde A. Bowman, doing business as Bowman's Beverage Company. Plaintiff alleged that defendant was indebted to it in the sum of $18,027.14, being the balance due on an open account for beer sold and delivered during the preceding two years. Defendant's answer admitted his indebtedness to plaintiff in the sum alleged, but asserted that nothing was due because of offsetting demands. He also cross-complained for damages in the sum of $162,000 for breach of contract. The jury returned a verdict in favor of defendant and fixed his damage at $36,040. Judgment was entered accordingly in favor of defendant in the sum of $18,012.86 (the amount of the verdict less the admitted indebtedness sued on). Plaintiff appeals.

Viewing the evidence, as we must, in support of the verdict, it appears that in 1935 defendant was a partner with his father in the business of distributing carbonated beverages and beer in Butte County. Late in 1935 or early in 1936 plaintiff entered into an agreement with the partners by which they were given the exclusive right to distribute and sell its products in Butte County with the exception of the towns of Gridley and Biggs. Plaintiff agreed to furnish all of its products which the partners could sell, and the partners agreed to sell and distribute these products, to furnish sufficient equipment, manpower and warehousing to fill the demands for these products in the territory, to furnish sufficient capital to buy and maintain a reasonable inventory and generally to promote sales within the county. The agreement was to continue as long as the partners, to use defendant's expression, "took care of the territory." At that time the products of plaintiff with which the parties were concerned, were two brands of beer known as "Golden State" and "Pilsen Gold". Early in 1937 plaintiff discontinued those brands and substituted a brand known as "Burgermeister", which product the partners continued to sell and distribute. The partnership between defendant and his father was dissolved around 1938, and for a while thereafter defendant continued individually to distribute Burgermeister under the same conditions which had applied to the preceding partnership business. After a period defendant entered into a second partnership which in turn continued the distribution of plaintiff's beer. At plaintiff's request this partnership was dissolved in 1950. Thereupon defendant, as an individual, continued the distribution of plaintiff's product under the same conditions as had originally been agreed upon until July 28, 1954, when plaintiff without notice and without cause cancelled the distributorship, refused to continue supplying its product to defendant and gave the exclusive right for the distribution thereof in Butte County to another. During all of the time defendant individually and in partnership had distributed plaintiff's product in Butte County up to a date in February, 1954, the business had included the distribution of a rival product known as "Acme" beer. This had been with knowledge of and without objection by plaintiff until February, 1954, when it requested defendant to discontinue the distribution of the rival product, assuring him that if he would terminate his Acme distributorship, plaintiff would then continue his exclusive right to distribute Burgermeister. Accordingly, defendant complied with plaintiff's desires, terminated his Acme distributorship and concentrated his sales efforts on Burgermeister. On the first of June, 1954, he met plaintiff's further demand that he employ a sales promotion and display man, again upon statements by plaintiff that if he would do this plaintiff would continue his distributorship. Shortly prior to termination he met a further demand of plaintiff that he purchase specialized motor equipment for the delivery of its product. Also in order to serve the convenience of plaintiff by enabling it to maintain a uniform schedule of production throughout the year, defendant had for many years met the demands of plaintiff to build up his inventory during slack seasons beyond his distribution requirements. This required him to provide storage for the large inventory thus accumulated, which requirement he met by constructing a warehouse in Chico in 1951. Defendant testified generally that in all things he had performed the duties cast upon him by his agreements with plaintiff.

There is no substantial testimony contrary to the testimony of defendant that the exclusive right to distribute plaintiff's beer existed over the years, and that from time to time defendant and his associates complied with plaintiff's requirements up to and including the final period when defendant alone was plaintiff's distributor. Likewise there is no substantial conflict as to defendant having, from 1950 on, met plaintiff's demands that he terminate his Acme distributorship, that he employ a sales promotion and display man, that he purchase and use specialized motor equipment, and that he buy and store beer in excess of seasonal demands. The witnesses for both parties also agreed that there were no specific covenants as to the duration of the relationship. But there was sharp disagreement as to the manner in which and the conditions under which those relationships terminated. Defendant contended that the contractual obligations of plaintiff to him were to afford him a reasonable continuance of his distributorship and a reasonable notice before termination so as to protect him from the loss he claimed to have suffered by the abrupt termination which took place. Plaintiff contended that the contractual relationship was such that either party could terminate at will, and that therefore the termination effected by it was within its rights and afforded no ground for recovery of damages for breach of contract.

[1] We think it apparent from the record that from the beginning there existed between plaintiff and defendant—first as a partner with his father, then for a period as an individual, for a further period as a partner with another, and lastly from 1950 on as an individual—an oral contract for the exclusive sale and distribution of plaintiff's products in the agreed area, with no provisions as to duration but of such nature as to support a finding that the parties in fact agreed upon a reasonable duration in view of the circumstances. A contract of that nature, with no provision as to duration, has been held to be enforceable, notwithstanding want of definiteness as to duration, and the parties are considered as having agreed upon a reasonable duration and a reasonable notice before either party can terminate it without breach. 4 Williston on Contracts, Rev.Ed., sec. 1027A(3), p. 2852; J. C. Millett Co. v. Park & Tilford Distillers Corp., D.C., 123 F.Supp. 484, 493; Long Beach Drug Co. v. United Drug Co., 13 Cal.2d 158, 88 P.2d 698, 89 P.2d 386. Under the evidence the jury could, as it impliedly did, find that plaintiff breached its contract and was liable for damages proximately caused thereby.

[2] Plaintiff first contends that the verdict is unsupported because the original agreement was made with the partnership between father and son, and asserts that no subsequent agreement with defendant was either alleged or proved. There is no point to the contention, since what we have heretofore said demonstrates substantial proof of a contract arising in 1950 between plaintiff and defendant as an individual. While it is true that the period of oral negotiations which began in 1935 appears to have been the only time when specific conversations were had, it is also apparent from defendant's testimony that by their conduct the parties continued under the same plan and agreement from that time forth and through the varying changes in the persons interested as distributors to and including the last four years, during which defendant alone continued the same relationship, although without any further specific discussion as to its precise nature.

[3] Plaintiff further asserts that the court erred in giving an instruction which reads in part as follows:

"When the parties to an agreement undertake a course of dealing and do not expressly include in their agreement any definite stipulation or undertaking as to the time such course of dealing shall continue, the law implies that such course of dealing shall continue for such period of time as is reasonable in the nature of the business contemplated by the agreement, and such reasonable time is defined as that which is reasonable in the light of the course of the dealing and all the circumstances of the case and the reasonable contemplation and expectations of the parties * * *."

The instruction went on to state that such an agreement could not be lawfully terminated by a party without either the consent of the other or lawful justification for termination or until a reasonable time after notice given by one party to the other of an intent to terminate. Of course the instruction must be examined within the framework of the case made, and when so examined it appears to have been a correct instruction. Upon the subject of termination of exclusive sales and distribution contracts such as we have here, 4 Williston on Contracts, Rev.Ed., sec. 1027A, page 2847 et seq., after pointing out that the validity of such contracts during their continuance is obvious, states that where the agreement contains no provision whatever for its termination it is properly held to be " * * * an enforceable executory contract, binding each party for a reasonable time." He also further states (at page 2852): " * * * It is the settled law of agency that if the agent or employee furnishes a consideration in addition to his mere services, he is deemed to have purchased the employment for at least a reasonable period where the duration of the employment is not otherwise defined. A similar result should be reached though the dealer is a buyer-distributor rather than a technical agent, where in addition to undertaking to pay for the manufacturer's products as ordered, he promises to establish or maintain adequate sales and demonstration facilities or to provide a maintenance and repair service for handling said products." See also J. C. Millett Co. v. Park & Tilford Distillers Corp., supra, and Long Beach Drug Co. v. United Drug Co., supra.

[4] Plaintiff charges other errors in instructions. In addition to the above instruction, the court told the jury that if no time limit was fixed in the contract between the parties during which the contract was to continue, it would ordinarily be terminable at the will of either party unless from all of the circumstances the jury should find that the mutual agreement expressly or impliedly contemplated a continuance for a reasonable time or provided a reasonable notice of termination; that in order for the termination to constitute a breach, defendant had to prove a promise on the part of plaintiff that it would not terminate the contract without notice or would have to prove a promise that the contract was to have continued in effect for some time beyond the date of actual termination as determined by the jury on consideration of all the evidence. Plaintiff declares that these last instructions conflicted with the other. We find no real conflict. But in any event, since the instruction with which it is claimed these instructions conflicted was in itself a correct instruction, and since these alleged conflicting instructions were given at the request of plaintiff, error cannot be predicated on their giving since to do so would offend against the rule of invited error. See 4 Cal.Jur.2d, Appeal and Error, sec. 557, pp. 423-424.

[5] Plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury that if it should find defendant was not obligated to continue to act as distributor for any period of time, then plaintiff was not obligated to continue defendant as its distributor and could terminate the relationship at will, without liability. The court refused to so instruct. The requested instruction could well have been given. It was correct in law and presented a theory of nonliability relied on by plaintiff.

[6] Plaintiff next contends the court erred in refusing its requested instruction to the effect that if defendant had had a reasonable time to recoup his expenditures and had made a profit, he could not recover damages on account of the termination of the contract by it, for in such case and as a matter of law a reasonable time for its duration would have expired. It would have been error to have given this instruction. One of the reasons often given why a reasonable time of duration is implied is that such implied duration is justified where expenditures have been made in order to protect the sales distributor from loss. But it does not result that as soon as a profit has been made the contract becomes terminable at will.

It is further contended by plaintiff that the trial court erred in refusing its requested instruction on the statute of frauds. That instruction reads as follows:

"If you find that there was an agreement between the parties which would impose an obligation upon plaintiff to continue for a period of more than one year, then defendant cannot recover unless such agreement was in writing.

"If you find that the parties agreed that plaintiff would continue defendant as its distributor for a reasonable time, then you must determine what period would constitute such reasonable time; if, however, such reasonable time would exceed one year, then said agreement would not be binding upon plaintiff unless it was in writing."

The court had told the jury that in disposing of the case they must, from all of the circumstances, determine what was a reasonable time for the duration of the contract between the parties. It is obvious that the jury did find that the contract was to endure for a time beyond the date of July 28, 1954, on which date plaintiff ceased to perform and informed defendant that it considered it was no longer bound to perform. Although neither party asked for a special verdict as to what constituted a reasonable time, there can be no question but that the case was clearly tried upon the theory that there had been a breach through premature termination and refusal to perform further; that this premature termination had caused damage to defendant; and that the damage so caused totaled the amount allowed by the jury in its verdict. The evidence of damage had to do with losses incurred by defendant from expenditures he had made in reliance upon continuance of the contract and obligations he had assumed upon the same ground. Upon this record, therefore, if a contract of this nature which the parties impliedly have agreed shall continue for a reasonable time, without having defined that time, comes within the statute when the trier of fact determines that the reasonable time exceeded a year from the making of the contract, then plaintiff was entitled to have the jury so instructed. The issue thus presented is a difficult one to resolve. Apparently no California case has been determined by our appellate courts which specifically considers the question. There are, however, several recent federal cases which constitute persuasive authority and which approve the view contended for by plaintiff. The first is Fibreboard Products, Inc., v. Townsend, decided by the United States Court of Appeals, 9 Cir., on February 2, 1953, and reported in 202 F.2d 180. There the trial court gave damages for wrongful prior termination finding that a contract for employment for an indefinite time was made under such circumstances that a reasonable time of employment was agreed upon by implication and that the reasonable time was two years. The court rejected the contention that such an agreement was within the statute but also advanced as an additional ground for affirmance the doctrine of estoppel to rely on the statute, saying at page 183: "In any event, the detriment suffered by plaintiff is sufficient to estop defendant from asserting the Statute of Frauds."

The next federal case in point of time is J. C. Millett Co. v. Park & Tilford Distillers Corp., supra, involving an ordinary liquor distributorship agreement without definite agreement on duration. The court held the parties could not terminate the relationship at will; that under California law a party seeking to terminate such a contract must give the other party reasonable notice of intention to terminate and could not terminate until at least a reasonable time had expired, which the court specifically found to be one year.

The most recent federal case is Hunt Foods, Inc., v. Phillips, 9 Cir., 248 F.2d 23 (Aug. 7, 1957), which involved an action by partners against a food processor for breach of contract whereby the partnership had become the exclusive distributor of the processor's food to certain military establishments. There was evidence of such a change of condition by the distributor's inducing them to enter into the contract as to justify the defense of estoppel to raise the statute of frauds, and the case finally turned upon that issue. But in discussing the impact of the statute the court said:

"Appellant argues that the California Statute of Frauds [C.C. sec. 1624 (1)] is a defense to this action because the alleged oral contract was to continue for more than one year." (At page 31.)

The above quotation from the Hunt Foods case referred to this footnote:

"Because the trial court held that the contract was for a reasonable time and the reasonable time had not yet elapsed, some sixteen months after the commencement date, it is apparent that the contract is within the statute of frauds, being more than one year in duration. See concurring opinion by Judges Pope and Healy in Fibreboard Products v. Townsend, 9 Cir., 202 F.2d 180. Hopper v. Lennen & Mitchell, 9 Cir., 146 F.2d 364, 161 A.L.R. 282, is an accord with this view. J. C. Millett Co. v. Park & Tilford Distillers Corp., D.C., 123 F.Supp. 484, is not inconsistent with our view since in that case it was held that if notice of termination was given at the earliest possible moment, performance could be completed within one year."

One other case has come to our attention—Hall v. Hall, Tex.1957, 308 S.W.2d 12 (rehearing denied January 22, 1958).

There the plaintiff brought action against defendant, a manufacturing partnership, for breach of an oral contract whereby plaintiff was to represent the partnership in "developing" a certain untapped sales territory. The Texas statute pleaded in defense, paragraph 5 of Article 3995, Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, barred action upon an oral promise or agreement "which is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof." The applicability of the statute to the contract in the light of the jury's findings at the trial presented the principal question in the case. The jury had found by special verdict that the contract was to endure for a reasonable time after its making and by a second special verdict had found that the reasonable time impliedly agreed upon was three years. The court said (308 S.W.2d at pages 14-16):

"Considering first the question of whether the contract was or was not within the purview of the statute, we find no authority in the briefs, or by our own research, that is very helpful. * * *

"His reasoning as to why the contract falls without the statute is that, since it lacks an express provision as to duration of performance, the term of a reasonable time is implied; that a contract providing a term of a reasonable time is one of uncertain duration and therefore not within the statute; that the finding of a reasonable time to be three years does not alter the status of the contract as one of indefinite duration—does not make it a contract which, by its terms, cannot be performed within one year."

The court reasoned as follows:

"In the first place, and despite the strict requirement that impossibility of performance within one year must appear from the terms of the contract, we see no reason why the mere fact of duration of performance being implied keeps the contract from being within the statute * * * What is implied in a contract is as much one of its terms 'as though expressly set forth therein.' [Citation.]

"Where the circumstances justify the law in implying any term of performance, they also justify it in defining the period in regular units of time, such as days or years * * * Actually what the law does is to supply the term in units of time, but using the yardstick of reasonableness in so doing. What it determines in the instant case is that 'the contract reasonably implies performance over three years'. The respondent-plaintiff, in seeking to uphold a recovery on the contract for commissions to have been earned in the third year thereof, necessarily asserts a contract with a performance term of three years. He could hardly expect to recover specific damages if the term were the merely abstract one of 'a reasonable time'."

Defendant, in support of the judgment, argues that the doctrine of estoppel to defend under the statute of frauds is applicable here. That may be, but there has been no determination of that issue since it was not submitted to the jury, probably because the trial court, refusing plaintiff's requested instruction on the statute, deemed the statute wholly inapplicable. If the statute was applicable, and if the previously quoted instruction should have been given, then the judgment must be reversed notwithstanding any issue that might have been submitted to the jury on the doctrine of estoppel.

[7] Defendant also says that plaintiff waived its right to rely upon the statute by not specifically pleading the statute and by not objecting to testimony in proof of the contract. But plaintiff denied the making of the contract in toto and that has been held sufficient to justify reliance upon the statute of frauds. 23 Cal.Jur.2d, Frauds, Statute of, sec. 150, p. 440, citing Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 21 P. 984, 4 L.R.A. 826; Harris v. Frank, 81 Cal. 280, 22 P. 856; and Walsh v. Standart, 174 Cal. 807, 164 P. 795.

[8] Addressing ourselves now to the proposition posed by the request for the instruction, we find ourselves unable to escape the reasoning applied by the Ninth Circuit and by the Texas Supreme Court in the cases we have referred to. We think both the express and implied terms of a contract are equally terms of the agreement within the meaning of that phrase as used in the statute. If the parties choose to submit the determination of what in fact was to have been the duration of the contract to the arbitrament of courts and juries in an action brought thereon, we think the contract as determined in such suit by the trier of fact is the contract which they must be taken as having made. Therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to have the jury instructed as requested, for if the contract did carry within it an implied agreement that it should endure for a reasonable time, and if in fact such reasonable time amounted to a period in excess of the period allowed by the statute, then the contract being wholly oral could not be enforced.

The result of this conclusion is that the judgment must be reversed.

Plaintiff has urged numerous objections to other instructions including those upon damages. However we think it unnecessary to discuss these assignments in detail in view of the reversal to be ordered, as they are not apt to recur on retrial. The determination on retrial of the time the parties agreed the contract should endure may result in a judgment in favor of plaintiff upon the issues raised by the cross-complaint because of the bar of the statute; the finding may be made that notwithstanding the bar of the statute plaintiff is estopped to assert it; the finding may be that the time within which the contract was to endure was one year or less from the time of its making, as was the holding of the trial court in J. C. Millett Co. v. Park & Tilford Distillers Corp., supra. Several of the items of damage claimed and concerning which evidence was adduced during the trial will be materially affected by the findings made in respect of the time of duration. For instance, if by reason of the estoppel defendant is permitted to recover upon the basis that the contract still had two years to run when wrongfully terminated, loss of profits claimed would be limited to such period. It is unnecessary to discuss these matters further.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

Charles Frederick NEELY and Norman W.
Golland, Defendants,

Norman W. Golland, Appellant.

Cr. 6016.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Sept. 2, 1958.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1958.

Hearing Denied Oct. 28, 1958.

Prosecutions for robbery and murder. The Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Clement D. Nye, J., entered judgments of conviction and one of the defendants appealed from sentences and judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The District Court of Appeal, Fourth, J., held that corroborating testimony tended to connect defendant to crime committed in such a manner as could reasonably satisfy the jury and trial judge that an accomplice was telling the truth, and therefore such corroborating testimony was sufficient to permit state to use accomplice testimony.

Attempted appeal from sentences dismissed, judgments and order affirmed.

1. Criminal Law §511(2)

Where a conviction is sought upon testimony of an accomplice, corroborating evidence required is sufficient if it tends to connect defendant with the commission of the crime in such a way as may reasonably satisfy the jury that the witness who must be corroborated told the truth. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 1111.

2. Criminal Law §511(1)

In order to sustain a conviction upon the testimony of an accomplice, it is not necessary that the accomplice be corroborated as to every fact to which he testifies.

3. Criminal Law §511(7)

False and contradictory statements of a defendant in relation to the charge are corroborative evidence of accomplice's testimony.

4. Criminal Law §510

Proof of the elements of a crime, as contrasted with proof of the connection of the defendant with the commission thereof, may rest upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice.

5. Criminal Law §511(2)

In prosecution for robbery and murder, corroborating testimony tended to connect defendant to crimes committed in such a manner as could reasonably satisfy the jury and trial judge that an accomplice was telling the truth, and therefore such corroborating testimony was sufficient to permit the state to use testimony of an accomplice. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 1111.

6. Criminal Law §511(1)

It is the combined and cumulative weight of the evidence furnished by non-accomplice witnesses which meets test of sufficient corroboration of accomplice's testimony to sustain a conviction thereon. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 1111.

7. Homicide §250

Robbery §24(1)

Evidence was sufficient to sustain convictions for robbery and murder.

Witnesses §251

In criminal prosecution, question asked an alibi witness, on direct examination, as to whether there was any particular reason the witness had to recall the time at which he allegedly saw defendant was proper direct examination to strengthen the ground of knowledge of the witness, and to show reasons for trusting his testimony, but error of trial court in rejecting such testimony would not be deemed prejudicial in view of fact the same question was put to the witness on cross-examination, and on re-direct examination no questions were put to the witness on such matter. West's Ann. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Even if trial court erred in instructing jury that evidence that a defendant endeavored to procure false or fabricated evidence to be produced at the trial might be considered by the jury as a circumstance tending to prove a consciousness of guilt, because of a lack of evidence that defendant endeavored to procure false or fabricated evidence, such error did not constitute ground for reversal of judgment of conviction where on consideration of entire case and taking all the evidence into consideration no miscarriage of justice appeared in the giving of such instruction. West's Ann.Const. art. 6, § 4½.

10. Witnesses ☞395

In criminal prosecution, trial court did not err in admitting two written statements made by an accomplice implicating defendants, under "the recent fabrication" exception to the hearsay rule, in view of fact counsel for defendant, by his questioning of accomplice, attempted to show he was testifying from improper motives of interest, or improper influences, or that his testimony was recently fabricated, and under such circumstances, prior consistent statements were admissible as tending to show the witness was not controlled by such influences, or that his testimony was not recently fabricated.

11. Criminal Law ☞316

In robbery-murder prosecution, failure of defendant to take the witness stand to explain certain evidence introduced in the cause which appeared to be within his power to explain, including testimony of defendant's fingerprint on door of "get-away car", could be considered by the jury as tending to indicate the truth of evidence produced, and as indicating and making permissible drawing of unfavorable inferences against defendant as more probably correct than inferences favorable to him. West's Ann.Const. art. 1, § 13.

FOURT, Justice.

This is an appeal from the judgments and sentences rendered after verdicts of guilty by a jury, wherein the appellant was charged with and convicted of robbery and murder.

In an information filed in Los Angeles county, the co-defendant Neely and appellant Norman W. Golland, were charged in count I with robbery in that they did about December 28, 1956, while armed with a deadly weapon, by force and fear, take $14 from the person and immediate presence of Vera Kaloostian. In count II Neely and appellant were charged with murdering Joseph Walter Leopold.

It was alleged in the information that Neely had previously been convicted of forgery in about 1956, and had served a term in the federal prison therefor, and had been convicted of robbery in Los Angeles county in about 1952, and had served a term in the state prison therefor. It was alleged that Golland had previously been convicted of forgery of a fictitious name in about 1951, and robbery in about 1952, and had served separate terms in the state prison for each of said offenses. On February 20, 1957, Neely denied the prior convictions and entered pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity, and three doctors were appointed pursuant to the provisions of section 1027, Penal Code, to examine Neely and report to the court. On February 20, 1957, appellant entered a plea of not guilty to the charges and stood mute as to the prior convictions. The court thereupon, for the record, entered up a denial of the prior convictions. The appellant made a motion for a separate trial and such motion was denied.

On May 8, 1957, the case started to trial and Neely withdrew his plea of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity as to count II and entered a plea of guilty of murder in the first degree and admitted the two prior convictions. It was stipulated that the court might read and consider the reports of the doctors filed in the case in considering judgment. The time of sentencing Neely was continued to May 22, 1957.

Appellant made a motion to dismiss count II as to him, and such motion was denied. He then made a motion to compel the prosecution to elect as to which count it would proceed upon, and that motion was also denied. The appellant then admitted the prior convictions.

The jury found the appellant guilty of robbery in the first degree, and also found that he was armed at the time of the commission of the offense. The jury also found appellant guilty of murder in the first degree and recommended punishment by imprisonment in the state prison for life. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and appellant was sentenced. The appeal to be considered is from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

A résumé of the testimony is as follows: Neely resided in Bakersfield and was employed as a roustabout by an oil company. At one time he owned a 1951 model Ford automobile, but he was involved in an accident with that car about December 19, 1956, in which accident he had his jaw injured and was hospitalized thereafter for several days. After he got out of the hospital, but before December 27, 1956, he borrowed, on two or three occasions, for not more than an hour or so on each occasion, a 1951 model Plymouth automobile (California license number FER 866) from a friend, Mrs. Frances Leard. About 1:30 o'clock p. m., Thursday, December 27, he borrowed the Plymouth car from Mrs. Leard, stating that he was going to Los Angeles. In the late afternoon of December 27, 1956, Neely registered at the Grant Hotel on Sunset Boulevard in Los Angeles, under the name of Ron Allard, and as being from Minneapolis, Minnesota. About 6:15 o'clock of that same day he left the hotel and about an hour later returned with the appellant. When they entered the hotel Neely went to a telephone which was attached to the wall and looked at the classified section of the telephone book. During this time the appellant was close by the hotel clerk, who testified positively that the appellant was with Neely at that time. Neely and the appellant then went to Neely's room. The hotel clerk worked on his regular shift until 5:00 o'clock a. m. of Friday, December 28th, 1956, but he did not see either Neely or the appellant leave the hotel during the night or early morning.

About 7:15 o'clock p. m., December 28, 1956, Mrs. Vera Kaloostian was working at a check stand in a Safeway grocery store, located at 1921 North Wilcox, Los Angeles. As she was sacking some grocery items for Joseph W. Leopold she noticed a man, wearing a hat and mask and dressed in army khaki clothes and holding a gun, enter the store. The mask was of black silk material and it covered the face of the man wearing it from the eyes down. The man walked up to Mrs. Kaloostian and said, "This is a holdup; open the register;" whereupon she responded by unlocking the register. The drawer opened and the man reached into it and took out "a few bills."

The robber then started to leave and as he did so Mr. Leopold picked up a can and threw it at him. The checker then heard a shot and a "whiz-like, or something" right beside her ear. She called for help from the management.

There was uncontradicted evidence that Leopold was struck in the head by a bullet and died from the wound he so received. An officer stated that he arrived at the store about 7:15 o'clock p. m. and saw a man who was later identified as Leopold, lying in the aisle of one of the check stands.

Shortly after 7:00 o'clock p. m. on December 28, 1956, Miss Janet Parker was riding in a car driven by her brother in a southerly direction on Wilcox Avenue, in the block where the Safeway store heretofore mentioned is located. As they passed the store she saw a masked man, holding a shining object in his hand, run from the store into the parking lot which immediately adjoins the store to the south. The running, masked man ran in front of a car which was parked headed out toward the street, and entered it from the passenger side. The car had started moving toward the exit to the street before the masked man had gotten into it, and then "it moved out rather fast." That car then turned from the parking lot to its right onto Wilcox Avenue, and was directly behind and going in the same direction as the car in which Miss Parker was then riding. At the first intersection, which was but a short distance from the parking lot, both cars stopped. Miss Parker had looked over her shoulder to ascertain the front license number on the car which the masked man had entered, and when the cars were stopped she was able to see the first three letters on the front license plate. The car in which Miss Parker was riding continued southward on Wilcox Avenue for one block and then turned right in a westerly direction. The street (Yucca) which the Parker car then traveled, within a short distance, curves in an "S-turn," and the Parker car turned in a southerly direction.

At the first intersection (North Wilcox and Franklin) from the parking lot the robber's car turned to its right, or westerly (on Franklin), and apparently, at the first intersection thereafter (Grace and Franklin) turned to its left and went southward, and finally into the "S-turn" heretofore mentioned. At that point Miss Parker saw the robber car coming from the front and to her right. The two cars came close to each other and the robber car was compelled to stop for the Parker car to avoid a collision. Miss Parker then saw the front license plate and memorized the letters and numbers which were FER 866. She also saw that there was someone in the passenger side of the robber car "but it was just a shadow then" and she could not see anyone on the driver's side.

At about 7:40 o'clock p. m., Friday, December 28, 1956, Rex Berridge, a truck driver who had known appellant for about seven years, saw the appellant, who appeared to be waiting for a bus at the corner of Sunset and Parkman. Berridge had watched the Friday-night fight on a television. Such fight, according to a representative of the broadcasting company, ended at 7:39.20 p. m. Golland asked Berridge if he, Golland, could buy him, Berridge, a drink and Berridge refused. A bus drove up headed eastward toward Los Angeles, and appellant got on it.

There was also testimony to the effect that "just somewhere after seven o'clock" the appellant was seen walking on the corner of Sunset and Le Moyne by some of his friends, namely James Godkin, Jr., Gus Rantes, Bob Lively and Milt Moore. The appellant got into a car that Rantes was driving and thereafter proceeded along various streets for seven or eight miles and then that automobile was stopped near the intersection of Sunset and Echo Park, close to the Sunset Bar, where appellant got out of the car and started toward the Sunset Bar. The appellant entered the Sunset Bar, sometime between 9:00 o'clock p. m. and 10:00 o'clock p. m., according to the testimony of the bartender who stated that he "watched the clock" in the establishment, which clock was kept about twenty minutes fast.

The Leard Plymouth automobile, license number FER 866, was returned to Mrs. Leard in Bakersfield at about 11:00 o'clock p. m., Friday, December 28, 1956.

Neely was arrested about 12:15 o'clock a. m., December 29, 1956, at the home of Mrs. Leard in Bakersfield.

At about 2:15 a. m., December 29, 1956, the appellant was arrested, at the Sunset Bar, for suspicion of robbery, by the Los Angeles police officers. At the time of the arrest one of the police officers engaged the appellant in a conversation and advised him that another man was involved in the crime. The appellant was asked, while he was still at the bar, to relate what he had done that day, and Golland stated that he got up about 9:00 o'clock a. m., ate breakfast, and went to the library at Fifth and Flower streets, where he remained until about 5:30 o'clock p. m. He further said that he later met Rantes at Sunset and Alvarado, and that he had ridden with him in the Rantes car for about an hour, and was then let off at the bar at about 7:30 o'clock p. m.

Later, the same officer who had talked with Golland at the bar, had a second talk with him at the Hollywood Police Station in the presence of two other officers. The officer then asked Golland if he knew Charles Frederick Neely, and the appellant said at first that he did not know Neely, but when asked the same question a little later stated that he did recollect the name, but that he had not seen Neely for a long time.

Another officer had two talks with the appellant. The first was held at about 11:00 o'clock a. m., on Saturday, December 29, 1956, in the presence of a second officer, when the appellant was told that he was under arrest for murder. The appellant then stated that he was with John Orendorf, a bail bondsman, from about 2:00 o'clock a. m. until 8:00 a. m. on Friday, December 28, 1956; that Orendorf had driven him to the vicinity of Fifth and Hill streets, and that from there he had gone to the library where he remained until noon; that he walked home from there and then walked back to the library, where he remained until about 5:00 o'clock p. m.; that he then walked to the vicinity of Alvarado and Sunset where he had coffee with two or three other persons, and then, while walking along Sunset Boulevard, he was picked up by Rantes and two others in an automobile and that he stayed with them for several hours, driving around the city, and that they let him off at the Sunset Bar at which place he stayed until the time of his arrest.

The second talk between the officer and the appellant was held the next day in the presence of a shorthand reporter. At that time Golland stated that he had not seen Neely on December 27, 1956, and that the last time he saw Neely was sometime before Christmas. He also stated that he had not been in any 1950 or 1951 Plymouth automobile with Neely and that he had not participated in any robbery or murder with Neely. As to his activities on December 28, 1956, the appellant gave substantially the same account which he had initially given to the officer, except that he stated that he had taken the bus home from the library at noontime.

A police officer connected with the scientific investigation division, latent fingerprint detail, of the Police Department, went to Bakersfield on Sunday, December 30, 1956, and, with another officer of the same detail, examined the Leard Plymouth automobile for latent fingerprints. They found some identifiable and some unidentifiable fingerprints. One of the latent fingerprints was found inside of the door on the driver's side of the automobile on the window frame, located under the window. On January 7, 1957, the officer rolled ink fingerprints of the appellant and then compared the latent fingerprint lifted from the car door window frame, with the rolled left thumbprint of the appellant. Based on his study and comparison, the officer formed the opinion that the two fingerprints, that is, the latent one and the rolled one, were made by one and the same person, namely Norman W. Golland.

Now considering particularly the testimony of Neely, who stated in substance as follows: that he lived in Bakersfield and, on December 16th or 17th, he had driven to Los Angeles in his 1951 Ford automobile, and, while parked by a cafe in the Sunset-Echo Park area, met the appellant, whom he had previously known, and had a short talk with him, and then they parted; that on about December 19th 1956, he had been involved in a collision in Bakersfield with his automobile, which was then wrecked, and he had suffered a broken jaw in the accident for which he was hospitalized for a few days. He further said that on December 27th, 1956, he had borrowed a 1950 or 1951 Plymouth automobile from Frances Leard, who lived in Bakersfield, and that he drove the car alone to Los Angeles on that day and arrived in the city about 4:30 o'clock p. m. His intent, on that occasion, was to commit some robberies in the city, and that he took with him a loaded .22 caliber H and L revolver. At about 5:00 o'clock p. m., he registered at a hotel, using the name Ronald Allard. About 8:00 o'clock p. m. on December 27th, while alone and seated on the driver's side of the Plymouth automobile, and while parked on Sunset Boulevard, facing west, in front of the Sunset Bar, he saw Golland walking on the sidewalk and called to him. The appellant came to the passenger side of the automobile, and he (Neely) told appellant that he was going to "pull" a robbery and asked the appellant to join him. The appellant at first demurred, but ultimately agreed. After that talk the appellant and he went to his (Neely's) room in a hotel where he was registered, and they remained there that night. During the night they tried to decide upon a good place to rob but could not make up their minds. While they were in the room the loaded gun was shown to the appellant and he examined it. Neely also testified that he got up about 5:00 o'clock a. m., December 28, 1956, and went out and stole two license plates from cars in the vicinity of the hotel. He stated that he put one of the stolen license plates on the back of the Plymouth car, covering the license plate which was properly there. He said that while putting the stolen license plate on, he and the appellant had agreed that there was no need to put such a license plate on the front of the car as they would be going away from the place of the robbery and no one would "get" that license number. He said that they drove the Plymouth car "all over" Los Angeles looking for a place to rob, and that about 3:00 or 3:30 o'clock p. m., they went to a Sears store on Santa Monica near Western and bought two hats, one for each of them.

He further stated that about 7:10 p. m., they were driving on Cahuenga toward the "Valley" and then turned onto Wilcox and drove by the Safeway store where the murder took place. He testified that he and Golland considered and discussed it and concluded that it looked like a good place to rob. He said they then drove up a street a short distance and he put on his hat and put a mask (scarf) around his neck and drove back to the Safeway parking lot and appellant parked the car in the lot. He stated that while Golland waited in the car, he got out and walked past the store and looked in, and after walking a short distance, turned back into the store, pulling the mask up just under his eyes. There were about seven people in the store, and he announced that it was a "stick up" and proceeded to "dip into the cash register." He said he took $14. At about that time he was struck beside the head with a can which had been thrown at him. He did not see who threw the can, but as he turned the closest man to him "appeared to be the only belligerent in the place," so he fired and shot him. He noted blood running out of the man's head. He stated that he then ran to the parking lot and entered the car from the passenger side while it was moving. They then traveled down some streets and a car approached from their left and the cars nearly collided. The brakes on both cars were applied, and the car in which he, Neely, was riding spun and came to a stop beside the other car. He ducked down, and after traveling over a number of other streets, they went to the "Freeway." He further stated that the Plymouth automobile was stopped in a parking lot off Sunset Boulevard in the Silver Lake area, and Golland got out and returned with a box of band-aids and he, Neely, placed a bandage on the side of his head where the can had struck him. He divided the money which had been taken out of the cash register by giving Golland $10, and he kept $4 for himself. He then left Golland at the parking lot and he, Neely, proceeded to drive the Plymouth car to Bakersfield, arriving there about 11:15 o'clock p. m. He was arrested at the home of Frances Leard about midnight. Before he was arrested he had removed the stolen license plate from the rear number bracket and had placed it in the car with the other stolen license plate.

The defense in the main was that Golland had been in Soledad prison for robbery and had been released on parole on February 14, 1956. The termination date of his parole was October 14, 1962, and conditioned, among other things, that he not associate with ex-convicts. If he did so associate with ex-convicts he was subject to arrest, and if the Adult Authority found a violation of such condition it could direct his return to prison; that he therefore lied to the officers about having been with Neely for fear that the Adult Authority might send him back to prison.

The appellant also caused testimony to be introduced by the store checker to the effect that a check was made of the cash register after Leopold was shot, and the check disclosed that for the entire day the register was $90 short.

Golland also called Ernest De Palma as a witness. De Palma had known the appellant for a few years. The witness stated that on December 28, 1956, he had left his home on Hollywood and Gramercy, and had gone by bus to Sunset and Alvarado; that at about 6:45 o'clock p. m. he saw Golland drinking coffee and having something to eat in a cafe on the corner of Sunset and Alvarado, and that he then spoke to Golland. He also said that there were a few others in the cafe, but he did not know any of them excepting the owner.

The appellant did not testify. As his counsel advised the court, "he has informed counsel that he will not take the stand."

Appellant now asserts (1) that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the conviction, and in particular that there was insufficient corroboration of the accomplice's testimony; (2) that there is a strong probability that the appellant is innocent and therefore any error, however slight, must have contributed to conviction; (3) that the court erred in sustaining objections to questions of the witness De Palma on direct examination; (4) that the court erred in the giving of an instruction (CALJIC 30A) on consciousness of guilt; (5) that the court erred in receiving the statements of Neely made outside the presence of appellant, and in overruling the objection that the evidence was hearsay, and (6) that the court erred in denying a motion for a new trial.

[1] Section 1111 of the Penal Code in part provides: "A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof. * * *" In effect, the Code section provides that the corroborating evidence, without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, must tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. In People v. MacEwing, 45 Cal.2d 218, at page 224, 288 P.2d 257, at page 260, the court stated:

"The most recent decisions have in substance phrased the rule as follows: The corroborating evidence is sufficient if it tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime in such a way as may reasonably satisfy the jury that the witness who must be corroborated is telling the truth. (Citing cases.)"

[2, 3] It has also been held in substance in this state that it is not necessary that the accomplice be corroborated as to every fact to which he testifies. People v. Barclay, 40 Cal.2d 146, 156, 252 P.2d 321; People v. Trujillo, 32 Cal.2d 105, 111, 194 P.2d 681; People v. Henderson, 34 Cal.2d 340, 342-343, 209 P.2d 785. False and contradictory statements of a defendant in relation to the charge are themselves corroborative evidence. People v. Simpson, 43 Cal.2d 553, 564, 275 P.2d 31; People v. Santo, 43 Cal.2d 319, 327, 273 P.2d 249.

[4] As to proof of the elements of the crime, as contrasted with proof of the connection of the defendant with the commission thereof, such may rest upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. People v. Barclay, supra, 40 Cal.2d at page 156, 252 P.2d at page 326.

[5] We are of the opinion that there is ample corroborating evidence in the record to sustain the contention of the prosecution that the testimony of Neely could be used in the instant case.

[6] The appellant seems to rely upon the rule set forth in the cases that if the corroborative evidence raises only a suspicion of guilt, it is not sufficient under the provisions of section 1111, Penal Code. However, the evidence in this case, in our opinion, amply supports the testimony of the accomplice Neely, and strongly connects Golland with the crimes, and could well have satisfied the jury, as it apparently did, that the accomplice told the truth. It is the combined and cumulative weight of the evidence furnished by non-accomplice witnesses which supplies the test. People v. Trujillo, supra, 32 Cal.2d at page 111, 194 P.2d at page 684.

In this case the testimony of Vera Kaloostian, the checker at the store, and the testimony of the autopsy surgeon established the facts that there was a robbery and a murder. Frances Leard testified that she lived in Bakersfield and owned a Plymouth 1951 automobile, license number FER 866; that she knew Neely, and that he had owned a 1951 Ford which was involved in a wreck which accident brought about his hospitalization, and that after December 19, 1956, he stopped driving his Ford car; that Neely never borrowed her car before December 19th, but between that date and December 27th, 1956, he borrowed it two or three times for an hour or so; that on December 27, 1956, he borrowed the Plymouth car to go to Los Angeles and she did not see him again until 11:00 o'clock p. m. the following day. The jury could well have drawn the inference from such testimony that Neely drove Mrs. Leard's automobile to Los Angeles on only one occasion, namely on December 27, 1956.

Mr. Lloyd, the hotel clerk, testified that he worked from 5:00 o'clock p. m. December 27th, to 5:00 o'clock a. m. December 28th, and that late on the afternoon of Thursday, December 27th, Neely registered alone under the name of Ron Allard; that Neely left the hotel about 6:15 p. m. alone and returned about an hour later with Golland; that Neely looked at the telephone book while Golland stood by, and that Golland and Neely went to Neely's room and that he did not see either of them leave the hotel before 5:00 o'clock a. m., December 28th. Certainly the clerk's testimony tends to corroborate the accomplice's testimony that appellant spent the night before the robbery with Neely in his hotel room. It placed the appellant in Neely's company some twenty-four hours before the robbery and murder, and there is a strong inference that they were together fourteen hours prior thereto, and contradicts appellant's extra-judicial statement to the officers that he had not seen Neely at the time in question.

Miss Parker testified that she was riding in an automobile being driven southward on North Wilcox, and as she passed the Safeway store she saw a masked man holding a shining object in his hand run from the store and enter a car headed out of the lot which car started moving before the masked man had gotten into it, and that the car moved toward the exit "rather fast;" she further testified that the car was a greenish-colored 1950 or 1951 model Plymouth, and that the license number on the front was FER 866. Her testimony establishes that Mrs. Leard's automobile was used in the robbery-murder, and the inference is very strong that two persons participated in the crimes; that one person went into the store, and that one person waited in the parked automobile and drove it in the get-away.

The fingerprint expert witness matched the latent fingerprint, found on the inside of the Plymouth car door on the driver's side, with the rolled fingerprint of the appellant taken about January 7, 1957. This evidence conclusively links the appellant to the Plymouth automobile which was used in the robbery-murder.

The appellant's extra-judicial statements to the police were contradictory in some respects. The appellant stated at one time that he did not know Neely; however, under further questioning the appellant said that the name "did ring a bell with him," but added that he had not seen Neely for a "long time." Still later he said that he had seen Neely six or ten days before. There was also an inconsistency in the appellant's statements as to his mode of travel from the library to his home. The appellant explains the contradiction about knowing Neely by stating, in effect, that he was on parole from the state penitentiary and was forbidden to associate with ex-convicts, hence he could not admit being with Neely for fear of jeopardizing his parole status. We are of the opinion that it was for the jury to determine the real reason for the contradiction, that is, whether it was his parole status or whether he was fearful of being implicated in the robbery-murder which had been committed. People v. Henderson, supra, 34 Cal.2d 340, 346-347, 209 P.2d 785.

The witness Orendorf testified that the appellant was with him from 4:00 o'clock a. m. to 9:30 o'clock a. m. on December the 27th, which was contrary to the statement made by the appellant to the officers, namely, that he was with Orendorf from 2:00 a. m. to 8:00 a. m. of December 28th.

The appellant told the officers he went into the Sunset Bar at about 7:30 o'clock p. m. on December 28th, and that he stayed there until arrested. Mr. Berridge, however, testified that he saw the appellant and talked with him at a bus stop near Sunset and Silver Lake or Parkman, after the fights which were shown on television and which ended at 7:39.20 p. m. Also, the bartender said the appellant entered the bar sometime between 8:40 and 9:40 o'clock p. m., by the bar clock. The appellant also stated that he had not been in a 1950-1951 Belvedere Plymouth automobile with Neely. True it is that the fact of the fingerprint in the car does not directly controvert the appellant's statement that he was not in the automobile with Neely, yet the evidence is clear that Neely took the automobile to Los Angeles on but one occasion, namely on the trip when the robbery-murder occurred. There was no evidence that the latent fingerprint was, or might have been placed in the car other than on December 27th or 28th, 1956. Under the circumstances the jury could well have inferred that the appellant left his fingerprint in the car while driving it or riding with Neely on the robbery-murder trip in question. Taken as a whole, the corroborating testimony tends to connect the appellant to the crimes committed in such a manner as could reasonably satisfy the jury and the trial judge that the accomplice Neely was telling the truth. No more is required.

Appellant points out that there is a conflict between the testimony of Neely and that of the witnesses who said they were with or saw Golland, and that there is a conflict between the testimony of the store checker and Neely as to the amount of money taken in the robbery. Those matters were for the jury to determine and they chose to believe Neely, which, under the circumstances, seems to us to have been perfectly proper.

[7] The second of appellant's contentions is to the effect that the evidence submitted by the prosecution "renders it highly improbable that appellant could have been present at the commission of the crime." We need not comment on this contention more than to point out that in our opinion, the evidence taken as a whole, was such that the jury could, and did find the appellant guilty as charged. Likewise, the learned trial judge, who has had many years of experience on the criminal bench in Los Angeles county, apparently was of the same belief, as he denied the appellant's motion for a new trial.

[8] Coming now to the third contention, namely that the court erroneously sustained an objection to questions put to the witness De Palma on direct examination. De Palma was sworn and testified that he had previously known the appellant and that he saw Golland "about a quarter to seven" at a cafe at Sunset and Alvarado, drinking coffee and having something to eat, and that he (the witness) said, "hello." The question was then put: "You tell me how you place the time," and an objection thereto was sustained, the court saying, "It is a matter of cross examination." The question was then put: "Is there any particular reason that you have occasion to recall the time having been six-forty-five?" and an objection thereto was sustained.

On cross-examination the witness stated that on December 28th he was living "out on Hollywood and Gramercy" and that he had taken a bus to get to Sunset and Alvarado. He said he knew "about what time; because I left the house about 10 after six, something like that." He was not going to meet anyone, and he saw no one he knew in the cafe at the time, other than the owner of the cafe. The question was then put to the witness: "Now, how did you arrive at the time that Mr. Golland was sitting having coffee at 6:45?" The answer was: "Well, when I went down there I got the bus and I waited for about a little while, about ten minutes, something. I don't know. And I got—takes about a half hour to get down there, I guess. And I went in the cafe." Cross-examination on this point continued as follows:

"Q. So that's how you fix the time?
A. Yes.

"Q. You're relating back then to an incident of catching a bus and having left home at an approximate time? A. Yes.

"Q. And as you left and you reflect back now, did you see anybody that you talked to on the streets before you saw Norman or passed the time of day or—A. No, I'm sure of that; because I just got off the bus and I went over to the cafe.

"Q. Did you sit with Norman? A. No, I didn't.

"Q. Now, do you wear a watch?
A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you have a watch on that night? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you look at the watch when you saw Norman? A. Well, not right then, no.

"Q. In other words, you had no occasion to be looking at any time, to pinpoint time, is that right? In other words, you didn't have—you weren't trying to correlate—A. Well, I was sure—I was sure I looked at the clock on the wall; but I mean I was sure after the time elapsed.

"Q. In other words, did the little hand, when you saw it, was it 6:45 or was it 7:45? A. Well, when I was—I am sure it wasn't 7:45, or something like that; because I—I know what time it was when I left home.

"Q. You're relating back then to when you left home, is that right? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you look at a clock before you left home? A. I looked at my wrist watch.

"Q. Did you make it a point to see what time it was when you left home that night? A. Well, yeah, just by looking at my wrist watch. I mean I remember it."

The witness also related that he thought the 28th of December was on a Friday night, and that he first knew he was going to be a witness in the present case in about April, 1957, "[a]bout a month and a half ago," and that he had talked with the appellant's brother about when he had seen the appellant.

In our opinion, the question put to the witness on direct examination was in proper form. It is set forth in Wigmore on Evidence, Vol. II, Third Edition, § 655, pages 759-761:

"The party offering a witness may desire to make plain the strength of the witness' grounds of knowledge and the reasons for trusting his belief. This is a legitimate purpose. But, in pursuing it, the witness often will naturally state circumstances which may give indirectly some unfavorable impressions against the opposite party, —as where the witness is asked, 'What made you notice the defendant's features?' and replies, 'Because he was the same man who stole my wagon last year.' Or he may relate other persons' utterances which would be inadmissible as hearsay, but for their present utility.

"Nevertheless, on the principle of Multiple Admissibility, * * * the general rule is that the witness may on direct examination state the particular circumstances which legitimately affected his knowledge or recollection, even though the fact would otherwise be inadmissible; the judge's instruction to the jury must be relied upon for preventing their improper use of the fact: * * *."

However, in the instant case, as heretofore pointed out, substantially the same question was put to the witness on cross-examination and the matter was gone into at some length. Furthermore, the witness was taken on re-direct examination and no questions were put to the witness bearing upon the matter now before us. We are of the opinion, under the circumstances of this particular case, that the error was not prejudicial and we do not believe that a different result would have come about had the witness been permitted to answer the question on direct examination, rather than as he did answer it on cross-examination. Calif.Const. Art. VI, § 4½.

1. "30-A. Consciousness of Guilt—Falsehood

"Evidence, if any, that the [x] defendant, on one or more occasions other than from the witness stand, made false, contradictory or misleading statements concerning the charge against him which now is being tried [or that he endeavored to procure false or fabricated evidence to be produced at the trial] may be considered by the jury as a circumstance tending to prove a consciousness of guilt, but is not sufficient of itself to prove guilt. The weight to be given to such a circumstance, and the significance, if any, to be attached to it, are matters for the jury to determine."

[9] Appellant's next contention has to do with CALJIC Instruction No. 30A,<sup>1</sup> given by the court. Appellant insists that there was no evidence to establish that he, the defendant, "endeavored to procure false or fabricated evidence" at the trial. The court also gave CALJIC Instruction No. 8.<sup>2</sup>

It is conceivable that the part of the instruction No. 30A to which the appellant objects could have referred to the witness De Palma, and in appellant's closing brief he himself states:

"If De Palma's testimony was accurate within a matter of minutes it was impossible for appellant to have been in the car that Miss Parker followed. The testimony of De Palma constituted a turning point in the case."

"That testimony might have been true but inaccurate, or it might have been fabricated. If true it might have been inaccurate. If true and accurate appellant was innocent. If true and accurate the thumb print on the car would have to be accounted for on some other hypothesis than that it was imprinted on this particular occasion." (Emphasis added.)

In any event, however, assuming that there was no evidence of any fabrication of evidence on the part of the appellant, the giving of the instruction was not harmful under the facts of this case. In People v. Eggers, 30 Cal.2d 676, at pages 687 to 688, 185 P.2d 1, at page 7, the court said:

2. "8. All Instructions Not Necessarily Applicable

"The court has endeavored to give you instructions embodying all rules of law that may become necessary in guiding you to a just and lawful verdict. The applicability of some of these instructions will depend upon the conclusions you reach as to what the facts are. As to any such instruction, the fact that it has been given must not be taken as indicating an opinion of the court that the instruction will be necessary or as to what the facts are. If an instruction applies only to a state of facts which you find does not exist, you will disregard the instruction."

"It is error to give an instruction which, although correctly stating a principle of law, has no application to the facts of the case. (Citing cases.) To charge the jurors as to an issue not predicated upon some theory logically deducible from the evidence presents for consideration a question not properly determinable by them. However, the giving of such an instruction does not justify a reversal of the judgment unless it is affirmatively shown that the error would prejudice the rights of the defendant. In the present case, considering his admissions and the evidence tending to prove that the killing was wilful, premeditated and deliberate, the record clearly shows that the defendant suffered no prejudice. Accordingly, there is no error justifying a reversal of the judgment. Const. Art. VI, Sec. 4½."

3. "Q. (By Mr. Graves) Mr. Neely, you pleaded guilty to first degree murder; is that correct? A. Yes.

"Q. You pleaded guilty in this courtroom? A. Yes.

"Q. At that time you had pending against you this very charge here of murder in the first degree and robbery; is that right? A. Yes.

"Q. You also had pending against you an escape charge; is that right? A. Yes.

"Q. In which you were arrested, along with Mr. Kostal and Mr. Watson; is that right? A. Yes.

"Q. Did that involve an escape by you out of the courtroom in Department 41? A. Yes.

"Q. Do I understand it is your position now, sir, you are taking the stand in respect to the Court and the honesty of the oath that you are telling us the truth? A. Yes.

"Q. You have respect for the Court, do you? A. Yes, I have respect for the Court.

"Q. When you pleaded in this courtroom, you understood that your sentence was to be delayed until a later time, until the determination of this case against Mr. Golland, didn't you. A. Yes.

"Q. Did you hear Mr. Busch say to his Honor at that time that he wanted to have the Court consider the testimony in this case in determining the sentence to be imposed upon you? A. I don't recall.

There is not the slightest affirmative showing that the giving of the instruction in question was prejudicial to the rights of the appellant. Further, on considering the entire cause and taking all of the evidence into consideration, there was no miscarriage of justice in the giving of the questioned instruction. Calif. Const. Art. VI, § 4½.

[10] The next contention of the appellant is that the court erred in admitting two written statements made by the accomplice Neely. Neely testified as a witness for the prosecution as heretofore indicated, and named the appellant as an active participant in the crimes charged. On cross-examination Neely was asked, and he answered many questions concerning his motives in testifying against the appellant.<sup>3</sup>

The first statement was one made by Neely to the officers in Bakersfield at about

"Q. You don't recall that. Isn't it a fact, Mr. Neely, that you had every reason to believe, and do now believe, that you will escape the death sentence penalty and get life imprisonment punishment for the purpose of testifying here now? Just answer that one yes or no. A. I can't answer that yes or no.

"Q. Didn't you say that in the detention room in my presence, that the chances were nine to ten that you would get life imprisonment if you testified? A. I didn't say that, no.

"Q. You didn't? A. No.

"Q. Do you remember saying those very words to Mr. Ward Sullivan? A. No.

"Q. In my presence? A. I believe those were your words.

"Q. My words. Isn't it a fact that your attorney told you that the District Attorney would take a position—recommend life imprisonment if you would testify in this case? A. He said there was a good chance of it, yes.

"Q. Didn't he say to you that he had talked to the Judge in my presence in the chambers? A. Yes.

"Q. And didn't he say his Honor said at that time that he would probably be influenced in sentencing you by the testimony you gave here, but that he was not going to be bound by any deals? A. Yes.

"Q. Didn't you thereafter say, 'Well, it looks pretty good to me; the chances

1:00 o'clock a. m., December 29, 1956. The second statement was made by Neely to the officers in Los Angeles during the morning of December 29, 1956. The appellant was not present at the making of either of the statements. No formal charges had been made against Neely at the time of either statement, and in each statement Neely named Golland as the person who had participated with him in the robbery-murder. The statements were admitted for the limited purpose of showing that his are nine to ten for me? A. I didn't make any odds like that.

"Q. You believe, do you not, as you are now testifying, that you will escape the gas chamber by virtue of this testimony, don't you? A. I hope to escape the gas chamber by virtue of this testimony.

"Q. You expect to, do you not? A. Yes.

"Q. You are relying on the statement of Mr. Sullivan, the part that Mr. Busch here, the District Attorney, said that he would recommend that you get life imprisonment for this testimony, aren't you? A. Yes.

"Mr. Graves: We may take the recess, if the Court please, at this time.

"The Court: Yes; we will adjourn until tomorrow morning.

"Q. Now, Mr. Neely, you told us last night that you had hopes of getting a life imprisonment sentence by virtue of your testimony here, is that correct? A. That's right.

"Q. And you also have belief, do you not, that the charge of escape with Mr. Kostal and Mr. Watson will be dismissed against you? A. Yes.

"The Court: When you say you have the belief, Mr. Neely, nobody has promised anything in that respect, have they?

"The Witness: No, sir.

"The Court: In other words, it is a hope that arises in your heart?

"The Witness: Yes, sir.

"Q. By Mr. Graves: You answered questions earlier on Wednesday if anybody had promised you anything, and you said no; is that not so? A. Yes.

"Q. But your attorney had informed you that Mr. Busch at the time of sentencing would recommend a life imprisonment sentence for you if you testified, weren't you? A. Yes.

"Q. You were informed by Mr. Sullivan that he had talked to his Honor and his Honor said he would probably be influenced by the statements of Mr. Busch at the time of sentencing, but he was not going to be a party to any deal, weren't you? A. That was my understanding, yes.

"Q. It was on the basis of the probabilities in your mind that you decided to testify against Norman Golland; isn't that right? A. Yes.

"Q. You were afraid, were you not, of getting the death sentence penalty in this case— A. Yes, sir.

"Q. —before you testified? A. Yes.

"Q. Now, before you agreed to testify was there not a discussion in which Mr. Busch offered a robbery charge against Mr. Golland and a life first degree plea by you, in which Mr. Golland turned it down; did that influence your desire to testify?

"Mr. Busch: I object to that, your Honor; it was never offered.

"Mr. Graves: I will rephrase that.

"The Court: All right.

"Q. By Mr. Graves: Were you informed by me, Mr. Neely, and was Mr. Golland informed by me in your presence that they would probably take a robbery plea as to Mr. Golland if you would plead to first degree with no promise that you would escape the gas chamber; and did Mr. Golland refuse to take that plea, and were those part of the factors that influenced your desire, willingness to testify when you were assured that Mr. Busch would request a life imprisonment penalty for you?

"Mr. Busch: I will object to that as ambiguous, your Honor.

"The Court: The objection is sustained. It is compound, complex, and ambiguous.

"Mr. Graves: All right. May I change the form, if the Court please.

"The Court: Yes.

"Q. By Mr. Graves: There were some preliminary proceedings that influenced you to testify in this case; is that not so? A. That is right.

"Q. One of those preliminary proceedings was some statements about a plea by Mr. Golland to a robbery, and you to a first degree penalty; is that not so? A. Yes.

"Q. In that particular offer which was discussed, it was understood you would not have any assurance by the District Attorney that they would not ask for the death penalty, and both you and Mr. Golland refused to accept it; is that not so? A. That's true.

"Q. And it was only thereafter, when you were assured that the District Attorney would not ask for more than life naming of Golland was not a "recently contrived statement," and not to prove the truth of the statement contained in the transcript of the conversations with Neely. The jury was instructed concerning their use of the statements.<sup>4</sup>

Appellant insists that the contents of the statements were not consistent with the testimony of Neely, and furthermore that the circumstances do not bring the case within the "recent fabrication" exception to the hearsay rule, for the reason that the motive to fabricate existed at the time the statements were made.

There can be no question that counsel for the appellant, by his questions to Neely, was attempting to intimate and to show that the witness was testifying from improper motives of interest, or improper influences, or that his testimony was recently fabricated. Under the circumstances, prior consistent statements are admissible as tending to show that the witness was not controlled by such influences, or that his testimony was not recently fabricated.

In People v. Kynette, 15 Cal.2d 731, at pages 753-754, 104 P.2d 794, at page 806, it was said: "When a witness has been charged with improper motives of interest, or improper influences, or with recent fabrication, the law allows hearsay statements to be introduced for the purpose of showing that the same and consistent statements had been made at a time prior to the alleged fabrication or prior to the time the motive of interest existed. Such evidence is then admitted, not to prove the facts of the case, but as tending to show that the witness has not been controlled by motives of interest, and that he has not fabricated something for the purposes of the case. Clark v. Dalziel, 3 Cal.App. 121, 124, 84 P. 429; People v. Billings, 34 Cal.App. 549, 554, 168 P. 396; 27 Cal.Jur. 178, sec. 153. The trial court both at the time of its admission and at the close of the trial admonished the jury, as required by the authorities, that this particular evidence was limited to the credibility of Sakalis."

Also, in People v. Walsh, 47 Cal.2d 36, at pages 42-43, 301 P.2d 247, at page 251, it was set forth:

"It may be assumed that the witnesses' bias and prejudice against the defendants originated at the time of or prior to the time they were forced to pay the bribes. But in addition to showing such bias and prejudice the cross-examination pursued by the defense was designed to create inferences of fabrication which originated after the time of the bribes and after the making of the writings and statements claimed to have been improperly admitted for the purpose of rehabilitation.

"With reference to the questioned rulings and instructions it is to be noted that it is not necessary that the party desiring to impeach should expressly state that he seeks to prove a fabrication of recent date. It is sufficient if the record indicates a purpose to prove a recent fabrication. (Citing cases.) In the present case inferences of fabrication since the alleged bribes could be fairly drawn by the jurors in addition to those which would tend merely to impeach the witnesses' general reputations or otherwise cast doubt upon their testimony. We find no error in admitting evidence of prior consistent statements for the limited purpose of refuting inferences of subsequent fabrication and to show a prior state of mind consistent with that shown by the witnesses when testifying. However if there was any error in ruling at the time of your sentence, that you agreed to testify for the People against Mr. Golland in this case; is that not so? A. That's true."

4. "In this trial there were times when certain evidence was admitted relative to conversations and statements made by the witness Charles Neely to the Bakersfield and Los Angeles Police Officers. These statements and conversations were offered for the limited purpose of showing prior consistent statements of the witness and not for the truth of any of the matters contained in the statements and conversations."

on the admissibility of the evidence a review of the record discloses no miscarriage of justice resulting therefrom."

In the present case the jury could properly infer from the questions asked and the testimony given during the cross-examination of Neely that owing to the promises of the district attorney, the motive to fabricate did arise after the making of the two statements.

We have carefully read each of the statements in question and we have come to the conclusion that they were, almost in their entirety, consistent with the testimony of Neely on the witness stand. In other words, the statements were in substantial accord with his testimony. See People v. Billings, 34 Cal.App. 549, 554, 168 P. 396. Appellant argues that in one of the statements Neely admitted the robbery, but denied the shooting, and attempted to make it appear that Golland had done the killing. The statement made in Bakersfield shows that Neely stated that he did the actual shooting.<sup>5</sup>

The statement made in Los Angeles on the 29th of December, also shows that Neely said that he did the actual shooting.<sup>6</sup>

5. " * * * Will you, in your own words, describe the details of the aforementioned crime to the best of your knowledge and recollection? A. There was no advance plan to rob the place. We were looking for something that looked easy and that might have some money in there that would give us each two or three hundred a piece and we drove around all day. We drove around 12 hours — 13 hours — from 6:30 in the morning till about 7:15 when this occurred, and we drove up Cahuenga at my partner's suggestion and spotted this Safeway Store and there appeared to be only the woman clerk and two or three other women in the place when we went past, and made a 'U' turn on Cahuenga and passed the store again and then went up in the hills there — I don't know what street it was — first street south of the store. We went up that street and I put on a mask and took a pistol out from under the seat. We went back to that place, parked in the parking lot. I walked past the store. I didn't pay too much attention — I just — I was looking for people outside the place at the time. There were several people there so I walked past the store and when the store had cleared to my satisfaction I walked into the store, pulling out my mask at the same time. There were a couple of people around the cash register and I motioned them away with my gun and directed my attention to the cashier. After ordering her to open the cash register I started to reach for the money and was nearly felled by a blow on the head and I realized that someone had thrown something. I turned around and this appeared to be the logical fellow or something. I was groggy and the gun went off. I saw blood spurt; I dropped everything and fled the scene. And there you have it. We drove, my partner drove down the Freeway and I was crouched in the front seat — on the floor boards — and when he had satisfied himself that we were not being followed he parked and I changed clothes. He procured some band aids for me and I put one on my head. I gave him $10.00 and he said he was going to get a pad for the night and we parted and I drove forth-with to Bakersfield * * * stopping twice.

"Q. Charles, what's the name of your partner? A. Norman Golland.
* * *

"Q. How much money did you realize on the robbery of this Safeway Store? A. I don't know. I gave Golland $10 and I had $4 — I guess we got $14.

"Q. In other words you had $14.00? A. Possibly $14.00."

6. "Q. You parked the car in the Safeway store, did he know you were going to hold the store up? A. Yes.
* * *

"Q. Did you two have some conversation in the car after the robbery regarding the shooting? A. Yes, we had some conversation.

"Q. Will you tell us what that was? A. It was sort of hysterical. I was really scared, when we ran out of the place, 'I said, 'let's go, I just killed a man'. I didn't know what to do.

"Q. What did he say to that? A. I don't know, don't recall, he was driving so erratically.

"Q. At the time you went into the Safeway Store with the intent to rob it, you had a 22 cal. H & R, was it loaded? A. Yes.

"Q. Was it loaded with live shells? A. Yes.

Appellant's last contention is that the court erred in not granting his motion for a new trial. Under this heading he reasserts all that has heretofore been contended. The trial judge in this cause had the opportunity to see and to listen to the witnesses, and he apparently was well satisfied with the sufficiency of the evidence and with the verdicts. He obviously entertained no serious doubts as to the credibility of the witnesses for the prosecution. It was appropriately said in People v. Green, 13 Cal.2d 37, at page 42, 87 P.2d 821, at page 823: "It is the function of the jury in the first instance and of the trial court after verdict to determine what facts are established by the evidence and before the verdict of the jury which has been approved by the trial court may be set aside on appeal for insufficiency of the evidence, it must be made to appear that there is no substantial evidence to support the conclusion of the jury and the trial court. (Citing cases.) A conviction may not be set aside because the evidence is susceptible of two reasonable inferences, one looking to the guilt of the defendant and the other to his innocence. (Citing cases.)"

[11] The appellant did not take the witness stand. This he had a perfect right to do, however, by so omitting to testify he left unexplained many important matters which were, in our opinion, to his detriment.

In 1934, the constitution of the state of California was amended (Art. I, § 13) to provide among other things that the defendant's failure to take the witness stand in a criminal case and to explain certain evidence which had been introduced in the cause may be considered by the jury, and the failure to deny or explain may be considered by the jury as tending to indicate the truth of such evidence and as indicating and making permissible the drawing of unfavorable inferences against the defendant as more probably correct than infer-

People v. Adamson, 27 Cal.2d 478, 165 P.2d 3, was a murder case which resulted in the death penalty. The defendant did not testify in his own behalf. The prosecutor commented upon such failure. The evidence in the case included fingerprints of the defendant at the scene of the murder, some stocking tops and some testimony with reference to a diamond ring which was missing when the deceased's apartment was searched. The court, in sustaining the conviction, said among other things (27 Cal.2d at page 495, 165 P.2d at page 12), "Fingerprints are the strongest evidence of identity of a person and under the circumstances of the present case they were alone sufficient to identify the defendant as the criminal. People v. Ramirez, 113 Cal. App. 204, 298 P. 60. * * *" The court in the Adamson case also stated, 27 Cal.2d at pages 488-494, 165 P.2d at page 8:

"It is clear from the terms of the constitutional provision that the consideration and comment authorized relates, not to the defendant's failure to take the stand, but to 'his failure to explain or to deny by his testimony any evidence or facts in the case against him' whether he testifies or not. The constitutional provision thus makes applicable to criminal cases in which the defendant does not testify, the established rule that the failure to produce evidence that is within the power of a party to produce does not affect in some indefinite manner the ultimate issues raised by the pleadings, but relates specifically to the unproduced evidence in question by indicating that this evidence would be adverse. (Citing cases and authorities.) 'All evidence is to be weighed according to the proof which it was in the power of one side to have produced and in the power of the other to contradict.' Mansfield, C. J. in Blatch v. Archer, [1] Cowp. [63, 65] 66, see 2 Wigmore, supra, 162 et seq., and cases there cited. The Code of Civil Procedure codifies this rule by providing that the jury is to be instructed by the court on all proper occasions: '6. That evidence is to be estimated not only by its own intrinsic weight, but also according to the evidence which it is in the power of one side to produce and of the other to contradict' (Code Civ.Proc., § 2061 (6)); and that it is to be presumed 'That evidence wilfully suppressed would be adverse if produced'. Ibid. § 1963(5). The basis in common experience for this rule as applied to criminal cases has been set forth in State v. Grebe, 17 Kan. 458: 'The instinct of self-preservation impels one in peril of the penitentiary to produce whatever testimony he may have to deliver him from such peril. Every man will do what he can to shield himself from the disgrace of a conviction of crime, and the burden of punishment. We all know this. We all expect it. Whenever therefore a fact is shown which tends to prove crime upon a defendant, and any explanation of such fact is in the nature of the case peculiarly within his knowledge and reach, a failure to offer an explanation must tend to create a belief that none exists.' Therefore the failure of the defendant to deny or explain evidence presented against him, when it is in his power to do so, may be considered by the jury as tending to indicate the truth of such evidence, and as indicating that among the inferences that may reasonably be drawn therefrom, those unfavorable to the defendant are the more probable. Respondent cites People v. Dukes, 16 Cal.App.2d 105, 109-110, 60 P.2d 197; People v. Pianezzi, 42 Cal.App.2d 265, 267-269, 108 P.2d 732 and People v. Dozier, 35 Cal.App.2d 49, 59-60, 94 P.2d 598, as holding that failure to testify directly affects the ultimate issue of guilt by raising an 'inference or presumption of guilt.' The instruction refused in the Dukes case * * * was in part to the effect that the members of the jury were 'not to consider or permit [themselves] in anywise to be influenced by the fact that the defendant has not seen fit to offer himself as a witness before you.' A similar instruction was refused in the Pianezzi case. The instruction refused in the Dozier case provided that failure to deny or explain testimony 'should not create a prejudice or unfavorable inference in the minds of the jury; no inference can be drawn against the defendant from his failure to testify.' * * * In these cases the court was clearly correct in holding that the instruction would destroy the effect of the 1934 amendment.

"The failure of the accused to testify becomes significant because of the presence of evidence that he might 'explain or * * * deny by his testimony' (Art. I, § 13, Cal.Const.), for it may be inferred that if he had an explanation he would have given it, or that if the evidence were false he would have denied it. State v. Grebe, supra; Mooney v. Davis, supra [75 Mich. 188], at page 193 [42 N.W. 802]; see Code Civ.Proc., §§ 1963(5), (6), 2061(6), (7). No such inference may be drawn, however, if it appears from the evidence that defendant has no knowledge of the facts with respect to which evidence has been admitted against him, for it is not within his 'power' (Code Civ.Proc., § 2061(6)) to explain or deny such evidence. Ibid. § 1963(5); Parker v. State, 61 N.J.L. 308, 39 A. 651; Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470, 494, 495, 37 S.Ct. 192, 61 L.Ed. 442; Blatch v. Archer, supra; R. v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 122; see People v. Albertson, 23 Cal.2d 550, 585, 145 P.2d 7.

"Defendant contends that the rational connection between a fact proved and the fact presumed required by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (citing cases) does not exist between the failure to deny or explain incriminating evidence and the inference of the credibility and unfavorable tenor thereof that these provisions permit the jury to draw. Defendant argues that reasons other than lack of power to explain favorably to himself or to deny such evidence, for example fear of disclosure to the jury of prior crimes through impeachment (Code Civ.Proc., § 2051; see 3 Wigmore, supra, 538; ibid. 380) or fear of creating a bad impression by being a 'poor witness,' may prompt a defendant not to take the stand. In view of the even poorer impression normally created by not taking the stand (citing case and authorities), fear of creating a bad impression because of being a 'poor witness' is not an impressive explanation of a defendant's silence. (Citing authorities.) It is true that defendants convicted of prior crimes often do not take the stand because of fear that upon cross-examination their criminal record will be given to the jury. (Citing authorities.) Clearly, however, the inference authorized need not be the only plausible one that can be drawn from the proved fact, to be rational under the due process clause. The inference is rational if the proved fact is a warning signal according to the teachings of experience. (Citing cases.) It is common experience that the failure to explain or deny adverse evidence that a defendant may reasonably be expected to explain or deny tends to show the credibility of such evidence and renders more probable the unfavorable tenor thereof. (Citing case and authorities.)

"There has been much criticism of the present state of the law, which places a defendant who has been convicted of prior crimes in the dilemma of having to choose between not taking the stand to explain or deny the evidence against him thereby risking unfavorable inferences, and taking the stand and having his prior crimes disclosed to the jury on cross-examination. (Citing authorities.) In the present case defendant admitted two prior felony convictions for which he served terms of imprisonment in the Missouri state prison. The fact of the commission of these crimes was not offered or introduced into evidence and would have been inadmissible under the general rule with respect to prior crimes. People v. Albertson, 23 Cal.2d 550, 576, 145 P.2d 7, and authorities there cited. Had defendant taken the stand, however, the commission of these crimes could have been revealed to the jury on cross-examination to impeach his testimony. (Citing case and authorities.) Since fear of this result is a plausible explanation of his failure to take the stand to deny or explain evidence against him (citing authorities), the inference of the credibility and unfavorable tenor of such evidence that arises from this failure is definitely weakened by this rule of impeachment. This weakness, however, could not be revealed to the jury by counsel or court without prejudicing the defendant through the revelation of past crimes. Court and prosecutor are left no alternative but to comment on defendant's failure to deny or explain evidence against him as though the sole reason for his silence was that he had no favorable explanation. Any change in the law in this respect, however, must be made by the Legislature."

In the present case the appellant obviously did not refuse to take the witness stand for fear that it might be disclosed that he was an ex-convict, for he himself affirmatively caused it to be brought out in his defense that he was an ex-convict, and was at the time on parole. He, and he alone, could have explained how his fingerprint got onto the framework of the window on the driver's side of the Plymouth car, and he chose not to do so, and therefore the jury could, and apparently did draw the inference that he, Golland, was in the Plymouth car at the time of the robbery-murder as a participant, and therefore properly convicted him.

Any error committed at the trial was, in our opinion, not prejudicial to the appellant and there was no miscarriage of justice.

The attempted appeal from the "sentences" is dismissed.

The judgments and order are, and each is, affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.
Sept. 4, 1958.

Action under Jones Act for injuries allegedly incurred by bellboy in fall aboard ship. The Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, Ralph McGee, J., rendered judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Draper, J., held that evidence that plaintiff had had similar accident five years before had not been material on issue of negligence but had been admissible to show that plaintiff's present condition had resulted, in whole or in part, from prior accident.

Affirmed.

1. Seamen  $\S$ 29(5.13)

In action under Jones Act for injuries allegedly incurred by bellboy in fall aboard ship, evidence that plaintiff had had similar accident five years before was not material on issue of negligence but was admissible to show that plaintiff's present condition had resulted, in whole or in part, from prior accident. Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688.

2. Trial ⇨48

Evidence admissible for any purpose must be received, even if improper for another purpose.

3. Appeal and Error ⇨216(1)

Appellant, who had made no request therefor, could not complain of lack of formal admonition to jury as to the limited purpose for which evidence was admitted.

4. Appeal and Error ⇨206(2), 882(8)

In Jones Act case, it may have been error to ask plaintiff whether he had made a claim and received money for injuries sustained in prior accident, and it was clearly error to question plaintiff as to amount of settlement; but since there had been no objection to first question and since second question had been asked by plaintiff's own counsel, reversal of judgment for defendant was not required. Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688.

5. Seamen ⇨29(4)

Rule of comparative negligence was applicable in action under Jones Act, and in finding for defendant, jury impliedly found that no negligence on part of defendant had contributed to plaintiff's injury. Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688.

6. Trial ⇨260(8)

In Jones Act case, instructions given clearly informed jury that contributory negligence was not a complete defense unless plaintiff's negligence had been sole proximate cause of injury, and it was not error to refuse requested instructions which were redundant thereto. Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688.

7. Appeal and Error ⇨216(1)

Having failed to request instruction, appellant could not complain of failure to give it.

DRAPER, Justice.

Plaintiff was employed as a bellboy on the S. S. Lurline. He brought this action under the Jones Act (46 U.S.C.A. § 688) for injuries allegedly incurred in a fall aboard ship. Jury verdict was for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from the ensuing judgment.

[1-3] Appellant's principal injury was to his back. On direct examination, he testified that he had received a back injury in a similar accident five years before. In cross-examination, he was asked about the circumstances of the earlier fall and the extent of the injury then suffered. Appellant objected, and respondent asserted that the evidence was offered for its bearing upon the issue of contributory negligence. In general, evidence of other accidents is not material on the issue of negligence. Lowenthal v. Mortimer, 125 Cal.App.2d 636, 640, 270 P.2d 942. However, evidence of the former injury was admissible to show that appellant's present condition resulted in whole or in part from that injury. Le Blanc v. Browne, 78 Cal. App.2d 63, 75, 177 P.2d 347. Evidence admissible for any purpose must be received, even if improper, for another purpose. Daggett v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 48 Cal.2d 655, 665-666, 313 P.2d 557. In overruling appellant's objections, the court repeatedly stated, in the presence of the jury, that this evidence was admitted solely for its bearing upon the issue of injury. Appellant cannot complain of the lack of a formal admonition to the jury as to the limited purpose of the evidence, since he made no request therefor. Lewis v. Southern Pacific Co., 98 Cal.App.2d 358, 363, 220 P.2d 431.

[4, 5] It may well have been error for respondent to ask appellant whether he made a claim and received money for the previous injury (Coleman v. Southern Pacific Co., 141 Cal.App.2d 121, 133, 296 P.2d 386), but these questions were not objected to by appellant, and the clearly erroneous question as to the amount of the settlement was asked by appellant's own counsel.

Even if there were error in any part of this line of examination, it was not prejudicial. Appellant's argument that the evidence may have been considered by the jury on the issue of contributory negligence is not persuasive. The rule of comparative negligence applies in actions under the Jones Act. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co. v. Smith, 305 U.S. 424, 431, 59 S.Ct. 262, 83 L.Ed. 265. Thus contributory negligence is not a full defense, but results only in mitigation of damages. The jury here, in finding for defendant, impliedly found that no negligence on the part of defendant contributed to plaintiff's injury.

[6] Appellant also asserts error in the refusal of an offered instruction that respondent is liable if it "was guilty of any negligence whatsoever" which proximately contributed to appellant's injury, and another that respondent is liable if its failure to provide a reasonably safe place to work was "the proximate or contributing cause of injury." Under the rule of comparative negligence here applicable, it is clear that a defendant is liable, in a proportion to be fixed by the jury, if its negligence contributed in any way to the injury of plaintiff employee. But the jury was instructed that if plaintiff's negligence "contributed only in part to the happening of the accident," then only the proportion in which that negligence contributed was to be deducted from his award, and was instructed in detail on the method of awarding damages according to the percentage contributed to the injury by the negligence of each party. The instructions given clearly informed the jury that contributory negligence was not a complete defense unless plaintiff's negligence were the sole proximate cause of the injury. Thus the instructions requested by appellant were redundant, and their refusal was not error.

Kent v. First Trust & Savings Bank, 101 Cal.App.2d 361, 374, 225 P.2d 625.

[7] We are unable to understand appellant's suggestion that the court erred in failing to give BAJI instruction 104-A, to the effect that there may be more than one proximate cause of an injury. Appellant did not request such instruction, and therefore cannot complain of the failure to give it. Peckham v. Warner Bros. Pictures, 42 Cal.App.2d 187, 189, 108 P.2d 699.

VALLÉE, Justice.

Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action for specific performance, or, in the alternative for damages for breach, of a contract to construct improvements on plaintiff's realty.

On December 18, 1946, James H. Francis, as lessor, and Willard F. Jones and Agnes E. Jones, as lessees, executed a lease of improved realty in Tecopa, Inyo County, California, known as "Tecopa Auto Court." On May 1, 1950, with lessor's consent the lessees assigned the lease to defendant Jessie E. Moudy and she took possession of the property on that date. Francis died on March 12, 1953. Plaintiff Mary Lou Walbergh, daughter of Francis, is the owner of the leased property, it having passed to her on his death.

The lease of December 18, 1946, was for a term of 23 years, ending October 31, 1969. The lessor owned a total of 880 acres. The lease covered 26 acres. The consent to the assignment of the lease reads:

"Assignment of Lease And Agreement.

"This Agreement, made and entered into this day of May, 1950, by and between

James H. Francis, hereinafter called 'First Party,' and Jessie E. Moudy, a widow, hereinafter called 'Second Party,'

"Witnesseth:

"That in consideration of the mutual covenants and agreements herein contained, it is hereby agreed between said parties, as follows:

"First party, as lessor in that certain lease dated December 18, 1946, between James H. Francis, as lessor, and Willard F. and Agnes E. Jones, as lessees, hereby consents to the assignment of said lease between James H. Francis and Willard F. and Agnes E. Jones to Jessie E. Moudy, second party herein.

"It is hereby agreed that said lease dated the 18th day of December, 1946, shall be extended for a period of four (4) years and six (6) months from and after the termination of said lease, to wit, until April 30, 1975; the rental thereof to be the same as set forth in said original lease. The last four (4) years and six (6) months of said lease the rental shall be One Hundred and Fifty Dollars ($150.00) per month.

"In consideration of second party building or erecting fifteen (15) dwellings or units on said property during the next five (5) years, first party agrees that he will not execute any lease for motel or hotel purposes to any other person, firm or corporation other than second party for a period of five (5) years from and after the date of this agreement. In this connection, it is agreed that second party obligates herself to erect said fifteen (15) dwellings or units during said period of five (5) years, and at least three (3) units are to be completed each year, but that the four units or dwellings now being constructed by second party shall be considered as a part of fifteen units, and in the event that second party shall erect a total of fifteen units, including the four now being constructed, at any time prior to the expiration of said five years, then second party shall be relieved of any further obligation to build units on said property."

On April 29, 1951, the lessor signed this instrument:

"I the undersigned owe Jessie E. Moudy $1,000.00 cash.

"I also grant Jessie E. Moudy the extension of Two years on building more courts as lease calls for 3 courts to be built each year."

Defendant paid the rental under the lease and has remained in possession at all times, but except for four units constructed in May 1950 she did not construct any units or dwellings on the property.

Plaintiff brought the action to compel defendant to specifically perform the agreement to construct 11 additional units or dwellings or, in the alternative, for damages for breach of the agreement.

The court found: the agreement of May 1950 provided that defendant would erect 15 dwellings or units on the leased property during the years from May 1950 to May 1957 comparable to those already situated or which were then being constructed upon the premises in or about May 1950; the agreement was not subject to specific performance; "[t]he defendant Jessie Moudy Francis has breached said Agreement of May, 1950, in that she has failed to erect and place upon said premises all of said fifteen (15) units or dwellings, but the plaintiff has sustained no damage as a result thereof"; "[p]laintiff is the owner of other real property in Tecopa, County of Inyo, California, near the aforesaid leased premises. The said dwellings or units already erected or constructed on the said leased premises have failed to enhance or add to the value of the property which is the subject matter of said lease, or to the value of plaintiff's other said property. Additional buildings of the same kind and character as those already erected or constructed on said leased premises likewise would add nothing to enhance the value of the property which is the subject matter of said lease, or to the value of plaintiff's said other property, at the present time or at any subsequent time, up to and including the expiration of the lease term, to wit: April 30, 1975, nor thereafter; likewise the failure so to erect or construct said dwellings or units has not, nor will it, detract from, nor reduce, the value of said premises which are the subject matter of the said Lease or of plaintiff's said other property"; "[i]t is untrue that the cost of construction of dwellings or units in Tecopa, County of Inyo, California, as contemplated in said Lease and Amendment or Modification thereof would be $5,110.00 per dwelling or unit, and in view of the type of sub-standard construction of said dwellings and units already on said premises, which were shack-like structures of little, if any, value, the cost, if any, of similar type buildings would be merely nominal only."

The court concluded that plaintiff "is not entitled to specific performance of the said Lease Agreement, for the reason that an adequate remedy at law was, and has been, available to her."

Judgment was for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Her only assignment of error is the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that no damages resulted to her by reason of defendant's breach of the agreement of May 1, 1950. This is the only question before this court. Plaintiff argues that the measure of damages is the reasonable cost of constructing the additional dwellings or units.

Defendant merely asserts: 1. the agreement of May 1, 1950, between Francis and defendant is not subject to specific performance (plaintiff does not contend that it is); 2. no damages were sustained by plaintiff. She argues that even if it were held that the cost of constructing the contemplated units is the proper measure of damages, plaintiff would not prevail in view of the court's finding such cost would be nominal only. Defendant makes no contention that an action for damages will not lie because of uncertainty as to the type of dwellings or units which were to be constructed. The question is not mentioned in the briefs.

[1] The finding that defendant breached the agreement is amply supported by the evidence. Defendant does not complain of that finding. Indeed, she could not for in 1953 she said to plaintiff: "If you kids think I am going to build any of those buildings called for in the lease, you are crazy."

[2] The finding that no damages resulted from the breach of defendant's agreement to construct the additional buildings is contrary to the evidence. The evidence is uncontradicted that plaintiff sustained substantial damages from defendant's breach of the agreement.

At the time the agreement to construct 15 dwellings or units was executed defendant was constructing four units on the leased premises. They were motel units. She had acquired two officers' barracks in Tonopah, Nevada, and had them moved to the leased property. She had had tie foundations laid. Both parties tried the case on the theory the buildings were affixed to the soil. The outside dimensions of each of the two buildings were 20 feet 4 inches by 50 feet 4 inches. There was a 1 by 6 subfloor on which there was a tongue and groove Douglas fir floor and, on that, asphalt tile throughout each building. The floors were on 2 by 6 joists. The roofs were composed of 1 by 6 solid sheathing nailed on with batting, with asphalt rags, and stone topping. Each unit had three rooms: a living room and kitchen combined, a bedroom, and a bath. Each unit had two doors. The inside walls were in part ¼-inch Douglas fir plywood and in part ½-inch plasterboard. The outside walls were 1- by 12-inch Douglas fir boards. The ceilings were ½-inch plasterboard. Each unit had seven electrical outlets, a floor furnace, a cooler, a bath or stall shower, a toilet, a washbasin, and a medicine cabinet. Three units each had a 25-gallon water heater. The units were connected to a cesspool. The photographs in evidence show the interiors of the four units to be modern in every respect and to compare favorably with the average motel unit. The agreement was executed about May 1, 1950 and the four units were completed by the first week in June 1950.

Defendant testified the cost of constructing the four units she erected in May 1950 was about $4,000, exclusive of furnishings. Plaintiff's witness, a general building contractor who had examined the four units in 1956, testified that in his opinion the cost at that time of erecting structures comparable to the four units in Tecopa was about $5,117.10 a unit. There was no other evidence on the question of damages.

[3] The measure of damages for a breach of contract, except where it is otherwise expressly provided by statute, is the amount that will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused to him by the breach, or which, in the ordinary course of things, will be likely to result therefrom. Civ.Code, § 3300. In Sprague v. Fauver, 71 Cal.App.2d 333, 162 P.2d 865, this court held that where a lessee covenants in a lease to construct improvements on leased realty and breaches the contract, the lessor is entitled to recover the reasonable cost of construction. Also see Turner v. Howze, 28 Cal.App. 167, 172-173, 151 P. 751; Fabian v. Lammers, 3 Cal.App. 109, 113, 84 P. 432; Taylor v. North Pac. Coast Ry. Co., 56 Cal. 317, 319; Trainor Co. v. Aetna Cas. & S. Co., 290 U.S. 47, 54 S.Ct. 1, 78 L.Ed. 162, 164. The Restatement says that for a breach by one who has contracted to construct a specified product the other party can get judgment for "the reasonable cost of construction and completion in accordance with the contract, if this is possible and does not involve unreasonable economic waste." Rest., Contracts, 573, § 346.

It is patent from the agreement of May 1, 1950, that the dwellings or units were to be for motel or hotel purposes. It is further unmistakable that the four units or dwellings then under construction were part of the 15 units to be constructed; and it is also manifest that the parties knew and intended that the dwellings or units which defendant agreed to construct were to be of the type and the standard of those under construction, which were for motel purposes.

We find no reasonable ground for holding, under the finding that defendant breached the contract, that the cost of constructing similar buildings would be nominal only and defendant's failure to construct them resulted in no damage to plaintiff.

[4, 5] We are not concerned with any provision of the lease between Francis and the Joneses. It is the written agreement between Francis and defendant, and that agreement only, with which we are concerned. The assignment of a lease creates a privity of estate between the original lessor and the assignee on the acceptance by the latter of the assignment. No contractual relation comes into existence between them by the mere force of the assignment. 30 Cal.Jur.2d 370, § 224. Defendant did not assume the contractual obligations of the lease or agree to be bound by any of its provisions. In the absence of a new contractual stipulation there is no privity of contract between the assignee and the lessor. An assignee who holds the demised property merely by virtue of an assignment of the lease, without any contractual relation with the lessor to fulfill the covenants of the lease, is bound only for obligations arising from actual possession or privity of estate, as distinguished from privity of contract. 30 Cal.Jur.2d 371, § 227. The only contractual stipulations between Francis, the original lessor, and defendant are to be found in the agreement of May 1, 1950.

We conclude the finding that plaintiff suffered only nominal damages by defendant's breach and that the units constructed in May 1950 were of little, if any, value, is unsupported by the evidence.

The judgment is reversed for a new trial on the issue of damages only. Appellant shall recover her costs on appeal.

PARKER WOOD, J., concurs.

SHINN, Presiding Justice.

I dissent. The buildings which Mrs. Moudy purchased from Jones were rested upon railroad ties and were chattels, the property of Jones. The "barracks" buildings which defendant placed upon the land were rested upon railroad ties, were understood to be and were the property of defendant, and this would be true of any additional buildings to be provided by defendant. The lease to Jones so provided, in the following clauses "(f)-1. Interest in ownership of all buildings and improvements on Lessee's lease shall start reverting to the Lessor at the rate of 4% per year from the time they are built. 2. Present buildings on lease to B. Elias shall start reverting to Lessor at the rate of 4% per year November 1, 1947. 3. Lessee shall report date and value of all buildings as constructed to Lessor." (Italics ours.)

The majority opinion reverses the judgment for a retrial of the issue of damages only. Under that opinion, upon a retrial, the evidence being the same, the following propositions would be the law of the case:

1. Francis and Mrs. Moudy understood and agreed that all additional buildings would be the equivalent of the two "barracks" buildings that defendant had placed upon the land.

2. If more barracks buildings were unavailable (and there was only one more) Mrs. Moudy would have to duplicate them with new construction.

3. The buildings which defendant agreed to provide would be permanently affixed to the soil and the property of the lessor.

4. It is wholly immaterial that under express provisions of the lease the buildings would be chattels in which the lessor would acquire an interest only at the rate of 4% a year.

5. It is immaterial whether the barracks buildings, which defendant provided and which the majority opinion holds were to be duplicated, were chattels, and the property of defendant, subject to the provisions of the lease.

6. That the proper measure of damages would be the cost of new construction, duplicating the barracks buildings, namely, $10 per square foot, without taking into consideration the age of the barracks buildings or the fact that the lessor would not acquire full ownership or use of the buildings for 25 years, both of which facts would necessarily require application of the factor of depreciation.

Under the holding of the majority opinion the trial court would be required to find that defendant agreed to duplicate the barracks buildings with new construction, and that expert testimony that new construction would cost $10 or $12 or $14 per square foot was competent to prove plaintiff's damage. Therefore, since there was no other evidence of the cost of new construction, and no evidence of the cost of duplicating the barracks buildings in their obsolescent condition, the trial court would be justified in finding that each unit in the barracks building, which was approximately 20 by 25 feet square, would cost new at least $5,000 per unit, and that plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of at least $55,000. That would be a shocking result in a case in which plaintiff could establish, under proper evidence, no more than nominal damages.

The problems I have mentioned are interrelated but they all flow from the same basic errors.

I shall discuss first the nature of plaintiff's interest in the buildings that were to be provided. The agreement required defendant to "erect" (not construct) additional units. In attempting to establish a claim for damages for defendant's failure to "erect" eleven more "dwellings or units" it was necessary for plaintiff to prove what her interest in the buildings would have been if they had been erected. She proved this, but without realizing that she had proved it, by placing the Francis-Jones lease in evidence. She assumed that the buildings when erected would be affixed to the soil as a part of the realty and that she would own them. Her proof established that this was not so, but that the buildings and five trailers which Mrs. Moudy had acquired from Jones, and any additional buildings were and would be and remain chattels. There was no provision in the lease or in the agreement between Francis and Mrs. Moudy that the units would be affixed to the soil or that they would become the property of Francis as they were placed on the land, or even that they would be left on the land. In May, 1950, at the time of the Francis-Moudy agreement Francis had acquired something less than a 12 per cent interest in the old buildings and five house trailers. Mrs. Moudy provided four units in 1950, leaving two to be provided in 1952 and six by May, 1957. If the units had been erected as agreed Francis would have had a 100 per cent interest in them at varying times between 1975 and 1982.

The majority opinion disregards these provisions of the lease by misapplying the rule that the assignee of a lease does not, without special agreement, assume all the obligations of his assignor. No one has contended to the contrary. No one is attempting to enforce the lease as against Mrs. Moudy. It is manifest that the rule relied upon in the majority opinion could not operate to transfer from Mrs. Moudy to Mr. Francis title to additional units which would be erected under an express provision of the lease that Francis would acquire an interest in the chattels only at the rate of 4 per cent per year from the time each building was erected. Francis, and consequently plaintiff, had no interest in the buildings other than that to be acquired under the foregoing provisions of the lease. Plaintiff is bound by those provisions, equally with the defendant.

The majority opinion disregards facts that lie at the very foundation of the controversy. These are that it was conclusively established by the evidence that all the old buildings were personal property and were sold by Jones to Mrs. Moudy as such; it was a covenant of the lease that additional buildings would be personal property, and the barracks buildings were rested upon ties and were personal property.

Mrs. Moudy, as assignee of the lease, had a right to rely upon the provisions of the lease with respect to ownership of additional units. Francis had a right to rely upon those same provisions, and Mrs. Moudy could not have denied him the right to acquire ownership in the chattels as provided in the lease. These propositions are elementary. 30 Cal.Jur.2d 367.

How then, can this court say that additional dwellings or units would belong to the lessor as soon as they were placed upon the land? And how can it be said, as plaintiff contends and as the majority opinion holds, that the two barracks buildings belong to the lessor and that additional buildings would be real and not personal property?

The cost of new construction was a false base for the ascertainment of plaintiff's damages. Plaintiff, assuming that she had proved that she would own the buildings as they were erected, introduced the testimony of a contractor. He described the barracks buildings and testified that new construction of the same size, class and type would cost, at Tecopa, at least $10 per square foot. Each of the four units in the two barracks buildings was approximately 20 by 25 feet and accordingly the cost of each unit would be $5,000. The witness also testified that if each unit were built separately the cost would be $12 or $14 per square foot. This testimony was objected to and the objection was overruled; it should have been sustained. Mrs. Moudy testified that the four units had cost her approximately $1,000 each. She had acquired and transported the two buildings for $1,950. Altogether it cost $1,000 per unit to complete them, or $4,000 less per unit than the cost of new construction. There was no other evidence relevant to the issue of damage.

Regardless of the type, size, class or cost of units that the parties had in mind (if they had anything definite in mind), plaintiff would have had no possession or use of any of the buildings except at various intervals between 1975 and 1982. Defendant would have had the exclusive use of each of them for 25 years. Plaintiff's damage for failure to erect eleven more buildings, if she had adopted that theory of damage, could have been no more than the value of the buildings after they had been in use for 25 years. In ascertaining this value the court would have been required to determine the normal rate of depreciation of the type and class of buildings defendant was required to erect. That would have been impossible for the trial court to do for two reasons, first, as I shall presently point out, there was no agreement as to the type or class of buildings that were to be erected, second, there was no evidence as to the annual rate of depreciation of a building of any type or class. Obviously this was not a matter that was judicially known to the court, and it is not known to this court. (If what is generally used as a normal rate of depreciation should be applied the buildings would be 100 per cent depreciated by the time plaintiff acquired full ownership in them.) There is no need to resort to any rule of law for the proposition that the element of depreciation could not be ignored. Common everyday practices in business and trade tell us that when defendant was obligated to erect eleven buildings and surrender possession and title to plaintiff at the expiration of 25 years she had no duty in order to meet that obligation to pay plaintiff presently the cost of new construction.

An additional point that is fatal to plaintiff's case is that there was never any meeting of the minds of Mr. Francis and Mrs. Moudy as to the type, class, size or cost of the buildings that were to be provided. Plaintiff alleged that it was the understanding that the buildings would be just the same in every particular as the barracks buildings. The answer denied this allegation and alleged there was no agreement with respect to the kind or type of "dwellings or units" that were to be erected. This defense was urged upon the trial with respect to the claim for specific performance and also the claim for damages. This was a vital factual question presented to the trial court which, upon the evidence, could reasonably have been resolved against the plaintiff and I think that properly interpreted the court's findings did determine the issue against her. The majority opinion amounts to a finding of the factual issue in favor of plaintiff, as if it were a pure question of law.

The majority say "it is also manifest that the parties knew and intended that the buildings or units which defendant agreed to construct were to be of the type and the standard of those under construction, [and] which were for motel purposes."

By treating this factual issue as if it presented a mere question of law the majority opinion not only purports to impose upon defendant an obligation to construct new buildings at $10 per square foot, but it also is a holding that the contract was definite, certain and capable of enforcement. The opinion proceeds upon this erroneous premise.

The court found that Mrs. Moudy obligated herself to "erect or place upon the property" fifteen buildings comparable to the old buildings that she had acquired from Jones or to the barracks buildings which she had placed upon the property. This could only mean that the trial court was unable to decide, and did not decide, what type or class of buildings were agreed upon, but inferentially decided that there had been no meeting of the minds upon that point. Plaintiff does not complain of the failure of the court to make a more definite finding, nor does she show that she objected to the finding or requested a better one. It therefore stands as a finding that plaintiff's proof failed to establish that there was a meeting of the minds as to the type or class of buildings to be erected or placed upon the property. Nevertheless this court holds as a matter of law that it was the understanding of Francis and Mrs. Moudy that the latter was required not only to duplicate the barracks buildings but to duplicate them with new construction. Not only is this holding gravely in error, but there was no evidence whatever of any discussion between the parties with respect to the type or class of buildings to be provided. Moreover, in their agreement care was taken to use the word "erect" instead of "construct". There cannot be read into the agreement an obligation to "construct" anything.

Some time after May of 1950, Mr. Francis married Mrs. Moudy. Some two months after the barracks buildings had been moved on but before the parties were married, Mr. Francis and Mrs. Moudy discussed placing more buildings upon the property. Mrs. Moudy testified as follows:

"A. At that time there was still one more of these buildings available at Tonopah, and I had considered getting another one, but we had a discussion and my son was for getting another one, but Mr. Francis said no, that those five houses that I had taken over very definitely needed the money spent on them, so that is what I did.

"Q. Did he ask you not to spend it on any more units? A. He persuaded me not to get any more units but to take care of those five houses, because they needed to be done over completely.

"Q. Did you then spend money on those five houses? A. Yes, I did.

"Q. How much money did you spend on those five houses?

"Mr. Stegman: I object as being incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial as to how much money she spent on the five houses on a separate lease, your Honor.

"The Court: Overruled.

"A. Actually how much I spent on them I don't know, but at least a thousand dollars a house, I should say, I spent on them because they had to be practically new-roofed and some of them floored and partitions put in them and, of course, furnished, and flush toilets—there were no toilets. One house had a toilet in it; the rest of them none had flush toilets."

Mrs. Moudy's son died in 1952 and Mr. Francis died in 1953. There was no evidence whatever of any conversation between Mr. Francis and Mrs. Moudy with respect to additional buildings except the one to which she testified as above. Mr. Francis never suggested that Mrs. Moudy bring in or erect any more buildings. The trial judge was so discouraged with plaintiff's attempt to prove an agreement as to the type, size and class of buildings that were to be erected that he found himself unable to make that determination. Wherefore, he found only that they were to conform either to the barracks buildings or to the old ones.

It is manifest that the plaintiff could not prove an agreement to bring in more old "barracks" buildings and that the trial court could not have found there was such an agreement. There was only one more available and Mr. Francis did not want it brought in. How, then, can this court hold, in view of the absence of any obligation to "construct" anything, in view of the equivocal finding of the trial court, and as a matter of law, that Mrs. Moudy was obligated to "construct" eleven more new dwellings or units comparable to the barracks buildings?

The reasons for the inability of the court to make a more definite finding will appear in my discussion of the next point.

The trial court properly refused to make a contract for the parties where they had made none that was enforceable.

I have made note of the fact that the agreement was to "erect" (not construct) additional dwellings or units. The words "erect" and "units" are significant. By "erect" the parties no doubt had in mind that used structures would be brought in and that defendant was not obligated to construct new ones.

There were five houses and five house trailers which defendant had purchased from Jones. Some trailers were on wheels, others on railroad ties. They were rental "units". They served the same purpose as the houses, and were superior to some of them. Bringing in more trailers would be erecting units.

I doubt that there could be found, except, perhaps, in some desert ghost town, a more heterogeneous and nondescript collection of so-called dwellings.

In all the cases of construction contracts in which the thing to be built was not described with reasonable certainty enforcement has not been decreed except upon competent evidence of an understanding of the parties which supplements the contract by removing its uncertainty and thus rendering it susceptible of enforcement. There has been evidence of some standard which the parties understood would be met. In the present case there was none. Some of the five buildings were very ancient but they were used as rental units. Two of them were built on railroad ties. Plaintiff's expert contractor ridiculed these, and perhaps some of the others, which he said were constructed of 1 by 12 planks, as having been put together not by a carpenter but by a handyman. It appears that the buildings had rough cement floors and that some of them had aluminum roofs with no sub-roof; these buildings the witness said, with an excess of moderation, would become "warm" in summer under the desert sun. In fact as to the several buildings he expressed doubt that anyone would want to live in them. Some buildings consisted of one room each, others of two rooms. Some had plumbing, others had none. Some had plywood partitions, others had wallboard partitions. Some had built-in cabinets, others had none. One was built of artificial stone and had double doors but no windows in front. Another was built of heavy planking with no windows in front. No two were alike as to size, and except for those that were built of railroad ties, no two were the same with respect to exterior construction. There was no uniformity of interior construction. Only one had a flush toilet. And yet all were "dwellings or units", and duplication of any of them with old buildings brought in could be held to be performance upon defendant's part.

I have found no case, and am sure none can be found in the books, in which enforceability was decreed of a contract so lacking in essentials as the present one. I have found many in which contracts considerably less uncertain than the one before us were held unenforceable for uncertainty.

Defendant's obligation to erect units was an inseparable part of the lessor-lessee relationship, since the erection of additional units was a matter that was in material respects controlled by the provisions of the lease. It is not necessary to decide whether defendant's agreement was within the statute of frauds. No question is presented as to the right to supply any essential of the contract by extrinsic evidence. Plaintiff offered none.

In Ellis v. Klaff, 96 Cal.App.2d 471, 216 P.2d 15, 17, an action for damages, the agreement was to build a "building or buildings as soon as building conditions reasonably shall permit. * * * Any building or structure constructed by the lessee shall comply strictly with the Building Code of the city of Buenaventura." Of that contract we said (96 Cal.App.2d at page 478, 216 P.2d at page 20): "The construction clause in the lease, as written, however, is too vague and uncertain to give rise to a contractual duty. Aside from the requirement that the 'building or buildings' comply with the city building code, and the implication that it (or they) be sufficiently substantial to be a valuable asset after expiration of the term, the lease is manifestly incomplete in failing to specify whether the lessee was to construct one or more buildings and is wholly silent as to the size, type, materials, location, cost, appearance, or any other details of construction. The language of the construction clause thus shows that, at the time of the execution of the lease, the parties expected to supplement it by a future agreement with respect to the improvement of the property. Although the terms of a contract need not be stated in the minutest detail, it is requisite to enforceability that it must evidence a meeting of the minds upon the essential features of the agreement, and that the scope of the duty and limits of acceptable performance be at least sufficiently defined to provide a rational basis for the assessment of damages. 12 Am.Jur., sec. 64, p. 554. Tested by these settled rules, the construction clause in the present lease upon its face is manifestly unenforceable."

In Ferrara v. Silver, 138 Cal.App.2d 616, 292 P.2d 251, the agreement was to build a "banquet hall". The court wrote (138 Cal. App.2d at page 619, 292 P.2d at page 253): "How large was the building to be? How much of the lot was to be covered? How much was it to cost? Was it to be of concrete, brick or wood? How many stories? How finished inside and out?" I do not quote more of the opinion that followed. It is illuminating and I suggest that anyone interested in a sound statement of the law should read it.

The majority say that defendant does not argue in her brief that the agreement is so uncertain as to be unenforceable in damages. This is true. She argues only against specific performance. This is no reason for reversing the judgment. The point was strongly urged at the trial; it will be urged again upon a retrial, and in my opinion, will be sustained. If the judgment is to be reversed because defendant has not argued all available reasons for affirmance of the judgment, all I can say is that if counsels' "missing the boat" in this lawsuit is to be taken as a reason for penalizing the innocent parties, neither of them would have got closer to court than the courthouse steps. The merits of this appeal cannot be determined without deciding whether the contract sued on is enforceable by way of damages. If plaintiff should prevail upon a retrial there will be another appeal and the question of enforceability will be for decision.

It is a fact that the parties overlooked and continue to overlook the provisions of the lease with respect to the lessor's requiring an interest in the buildings at the rate of 4 per cent per year. The significance of those provisions, as they affect the plaintiff is that if she does not rely upon them she has not established any interest in the units that have been erected or the missing ones. From the standpoint of the defendant those provisions destroy plaintiff's contention that she is entitled to the cost of present construction, without consideration being given to the factor of depreciation.

It is evident that the trial court had in mind the possible condition of the units "up to and including the expiration of the lease term, to wit: April 30, 1975." The court found "Additional buildings of the same kind and character as those already erected or constructed on said leased premises likewise would add nothing to enhance the value of the property which is the subject matter of said lease, or to the value of plaintiff's said other property, at the present time or at any subsequent time, up to and including the expiration of the lease term, to wit: April 30, 1975, nor thereafter; likewise the failure so to erect or construct said dwellings or units has not, nor will it, detract from, nor reduce, the value of said premises which are the subject matter of the said Lease or of plaintiff's said other property. It is untrue that the cost of construction of dwellings or units in Tecopa, County of Inyo, California, as contemplated in said Lease and Amendment or Modification thereof would be $5,110.00 per dwelling or unit, and in view of the type of substandard construction of said dwellings and units already on said premises, which were shack-like structures of little, if any, value, the cost, if any, of similar type buildings would be merely nominal only."

Plaintiff by her complaint elected to claim as damages the detriment she allegedly sustained in the loss of the appreciation in value of her land which she would have realized had all the buildings been placed upon the land. This would have been one measure of damage had the buildings been permanently affixed to the land. She introduced no evidence in support of her theory of damage. Therefore the court found that she had sustained no damage, consisting of the alleged appreciation in value of her land. What else could the court have found. If a plaintiff seeks damages and proves none the court has to find that no damage has been sustained. The court found that all the buildings were sub-standard, the old ones, and the barracks as well. So they were. But sub-standard or not, the court could not find, in the absence of all evidence on the subject, what value, if any, the contemplated buildings would have added to the value of the land, as of April 30, 1975.

I could have placed this dissent upon the sole ground of the unenforceability of the contract. But if the majority opinion should prevail and be given full effect as the law of the case the consequences to Mrs. Moudy would be ruinous. In any event it would be a grave injustice to her to reverse the judgment for the purpose of allowing the plaintiff to revise her theory of damages, and to supply competent evidence, which she miserably failed to do when she had the opportunity. One trial of this case is enough.

I would affirm the judgment.

Sept. 12, 1958.

Action for cancellation of instruments. From orders of the Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Aubrey N. Irwin and A. A. Scott, JJ., dismissing an action as to defendant and a subsequent order denying the plaintiff's motion to vacate the dismissal, the plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court, Spence, J., held that where defendant was served only one week after the expiration of the three year period provided for service by the statute and the defendant was concealing himself to avoid service and the court ordered service by publication and it was only through repeated efforts personal service on defendant was finally accomplished, dismissal of the action against the defendant for failure to service within the three year period constituted an abuse of discretion.

Orders reversed.

Opinion, 321 P.2d 154, vacated.

1. Process ☞97

In making an order for service by publication the judge acts judicially upon the evidence which the code requires to be presented to him for that purpose and can act upon no other evidence than such as is prescribed by the code, and his decision is regarded with the same effect as is his decision upon any other matter of fact submitted to his judicial determination. West's Ann.Code Civ.Proc. § 412.

2. Motions ☞59(1)

A valid order made ex parte may be vacated only after a showing of cause for the making of the latter order, that is, that in making of the original order, there was inadvertence, mistake, or fraud, and such order may not be set aside simply because the court concludes differently than it has upon its first decision.

3. Process ☞98

Where there was no showing that the judge making an order for publication of summons against defendant acted inadvertently or through mistake or that he was imposed upon and the order was fully supported by affidavits furnished by plaintiff prior to its making, it stood as a binding adjudication and the court could not set aside the order on the theory that the defendant had not in fact concealed himself to avoid constructive service.

4. Dismissal and Nonsuit ☞60(1)

The statute imposing the duty upon court to dismiss an action where the summons has not been served and returned within three years except no dismissal can be granted where failure to serve occurs during defendant's absence from the state or he has secreted himself, is designed to encourage promptness in prosecution of an action and, by its enactment, the trial court's inherent discretionary power to dismiss for lack of diligent prosecution was modified by a mandatory provision for dismissal. West's Ann.Code Civ.Proc. § 581a.

5. Dismissal and Nonsuit ☞60(3)

The statute requiring dismissal of actions not brought to trial within five years after being filed may not be used to compel a dismissal of actions where the plaintiff has not had a reasonable opportunity to proceed to trial. West's Ann.Code Civ. Proc. § 583.

6. Dismissal and Nonsuit ☞60(1)

Statute imposing upon court duty to dismiss an action where summons has not been served and returned within three years except that no dismissal can be granted where failure to serve occurs during defendant's absence from the state or while he secreted himself vests the trial court with discretion in applying the exceptions comparable to the discretion vested in it in applying the exceptions to section 583 which discretion must be exercised in accordance with the spirit of the law and with a view of subserving rather than defeating the ends of substantial justice and each case must be decided on its own particular facts. West's Ann.Code Civ. Proc. §§ 581a, 583.

7. Dismissal and Nonsuit — 60(6)

Where defendant was served only one week after the expiration of the three year period provided for service by the statute and the defendant had been found to have been concealing himself to avoid service and the court ordered service by publication and it was only through repeated efforts personal service on defendant was finally accomplished, dismissal of the action against the defendant for failure to serve within the three year period constituted an abuse of discretion. San Francisco, for appellant.

No appearance for respondent.

SPENCE, Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from two orders: (1) the order dismissing its action as to defendant Bush; and (2) the subsequent order denying its motion to vacate the dismissal. It contends that the dismissal was improper because of a prior binding adjudication that defendant Bush was concealing himself to avoid service of summons during the final days of the three-year period provided for such service (Code Civ.Proc. § 581a) and because thereafter Bush was served within a reasonable time, that is one week, following the expiration of said three-year period. We have concluded that plaintiff's contention must be sustained.

Plaintiff filed its action against several defendants on December 15, 1952, and summons was issued on that date. The first defendant was served in February, 1955. During the next several months plaintiff was engaged in making a change of counsel, and nothing further was done in completing the service of process. On December 1, 1955, new counsel advised plaintiff that the three-year period for service and return of the summons would soon expire, and thereafter feverish attempts were made to serve defendant Bush. According to the affidavits of several process servers, many visits were made to Bush's home and office between December 12 and December 15, but he could not be located. Upon the basis of these affidavits, plaintiff obtained on December 15, 1955, an order authorizing service by publication, premised on the finding that defendant Bush was concealing himself to avoid service. Continued efforts were made, however, to effect personal service on Bush through repeated visits to his home and office, and finally on December 22, 1955, he was personally served.

On December 28, Bush filed a notice of motion to quash service. The hearing was set for January 3, 1956, but plaintiff's counsel obtained a continuance to January 12 because of the holidays. The day before the hearing on his motion, Bush filed an "amended and supplemental notice of special appearance and motion to quash summons and service thereof together with motion to dismiss action" as to him for failure to serve and return the summons within the three-year limit provided in section 581a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Bush also filed an affidavit stating that he was readily accessible at his home and office on the days immediately prior to December 15, 1955, and was not concealing himself in any way. The court granted his motion to dismiss and entered an order of dismissal. Thereafter plaintiff made a motion to vacate the dismissal, but its motion was denied.

[1] Initially, we must consider the effect, in the proceedings to dismiss the action, of the prior order authorizing service on Bush by publication. Section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "Where the person on whom service is to be made * * * can not, after due diligence, be found within the State; or conceals himself to avoid the service of summons; * * * and the fact appears by affidavit to the satisfaction of the court, or a judge thereof; * * * such court, or judge, may make an order that the service be made by the publication of the summons." In Rue v. Quinn, 137 Cal. 651, at pages 655-656, 66 P. 216, at page 217, 70 P. 732, it is said: "In making the order for the service by publication, the judge acts judicially upon the evidence which the Code requires to be presented to him for that purpose, and can act upon no other evidence than such as is prescribed by the Code. * * * [His] decision * * * is to be regarded with the same effect as is his decision upon any other matter of fact submitted to his judicial determination." (Emphasis added.) Here the order expressly recites that "upon reading and filing the affidavits [of five named persons] and it satisfactorily appearing therefrom to me that the Defendant George B. Bush * * * conceals himself to avoid service of the Summons * * *." It thus appears that at the time of making the order for publication, the court was satisfied, and therefore found, that defendant Bush was concealing himself to avoid service.

[2,3] It is settled law in California that "a valid order made ex parte may be vacated only after a showing of cause for the making of the latter order, that is, that in the making of the original order there was (1) inadvertence, (2) mistake, or (3) fraud." Sheldon v. Superior Court, 42 Cal.App.2d 406, 408, 108 P.2d 945, 946. Such order may not be set aside simply because "the court concludes differently than it has upon its first decision." Klokke Inv. Co. v. Superior Court, 39 Cal. App. 717, 720, 179 P. 728, 729; see also Wiggin v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 398, 402, 9 P. 646; Sullivan v. Superior Court, 185 Cal. 133, 139, 195 P. 1061. Here there has been no showing that the judge who made the order for publication of summons against Bush acted inadvertently or through mistake, or that he was imposed upon. Bush has never directly challenged the finding of concealment as contained in the order; he has never moved to set the order aside; and the order, being fully supported by the affidavits furnished by plaintiff prior to its making, stands as a binding adjudication. See Matchett v. Ryerson, 156 Cal.App.2d 52, 54-55, 318 P.2d 792. Although the record does not reflect the trial court's reasoning in granting Bush's motion to dismiss, that court could not have proceeded, in the light of the prior binding adjudication, upon the theory that Bush had not in fact concealed himself to avoid service. The question is therefore presented of whether the trial court properly dismissed the action under section 581a of the Code of Civil Procedure when personal service upon Bush was actually accomplished within a relatively few days following the making of the prior order.

[4] Section 581a of the Code of Civil Procedure imposes upon the court the duty to dismiss an action where the summons has not been served and returned within three years after commencement of the action, except that no dismissal can be granted where the failure to serve the defendant occurs "during his absence from the State, or while he has secreted himself within the State to prevent the service of summons on him." This is a rule "designed to encourage promptness in prosecution of actions." Gonsalves v. Bank of America, 16 Cal.2d 169, 172, 105 P.2d 118, 120. By its enactment, the trial court's inherent discretionary power to dismiss for lack of diligent prosecution (Ordway v. Arata, 150 Cal.App.2d 71, 74, 309 P.2d 919; Lieb v. Lager, 9 Cal.App.2d 324, 326, 49 P.2d 886) was modified by a mandatory provision for dismissal, which provision was qualified, however, by certain exceptions.

[5] Similar both in general purpose and language are the provisions of section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure requiring the dismissal of actions not brought to trial within five years after being filed. Despite the apparently mandatory language of that section, this court has found many "implied exceptions" where it was "impracticable and futile" to bring the action to trial within the designated five-year period. Rose v. Knapp, 38 Cal.2d 114, 117, 237 P.2d 981, 983, with cases cited. Thus, discretion has entered into the application of this provision so as to prevent it from being used to compel the dismissal of actions where the plaintiff has not had a reasonable opportunity to proceed to trial. See Ojeda v. Municipal Court, 73 Cal.App. 2d 226, 232, 166 P.2d 49.

[6] We are therefore of the view that notwithstanding the mandatory language of section 581a, the trial court is vested with discretion in applying the exceptions comparable to the discretion with which it is vested in applying the exceptions to section 583. As with the exercise of the court's other inherent and statutory powers to dismiss actions for want of diligence in either serving the summons or bringing the action to trial, the discretion permitted must be "exercised in accordance with the spirit of the law and with a view of subserving, rather than defeating, the ends of substantial justice." 16 Cal.Jur.2d, Dismissal, Continuance, and Nonsuit, § 30, p. 179. Each case must be decided on its own particular facts, and no fixed rule can be prescribed to guide the court in its exercise of this discretionary power under all circumstances.

[7] Here it appears that defendant Bush was finally served on December 22, 1955, only one week after the expiration of the three-year period provided for service by section 581a. During the last few days of that period, Bush had been found by the trial court to have been concealing himself to avoid service, and consequently on December 15 it had ordered service by publication of summons. It was only through repeated efforts during the following week that personal service on Bush was finally accomplished on December 22. Thus, it is clear that Bush was served within a reasonable period after the time that the trial court had found that he had been concealing himself to avoid service. We therefore conclude that the trial court's dismissal of this action as to defendant Bush constituted an abuse of discretion under the circumstances, since plaintiff was thereby denied a reasonable opportunity to effect service of process following the judicial determination that Bush had been concealing himself.

The above conclusion makes it unnecessary to discuss other points raised by the parties.

The orders are reversed.

Action by purchaser of timber for money due and for reasonable value of services performed on the land before cancellation of contract by seller and resale of the timber to a third person. From adverse judgment of the Superior Court, Del Norte County, Samuel F. Finley, J.,

the seller appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Schottky, J., held that purchaser, while entitled to restitution for reasonable value of benefit conferred upon seller by building roads and felling and bucking timber less value of use of land, was not entitled to profit from use of land.

Judgment affirmed in part and remanded in part.

1. Logs and Logging ⇨3(15)

In action by purchaser of timber against seller for money due and for reasonable value of services performed in building roads to and upon property and felling timber on land pursuant to contract which was canceled by seller who entered into a timber contract with another person in March and who conveyed the land to such other person in July for $45,000, evidence of value of timber in July was some evidence of its value in March and sustained determination that fair market value of property in March was $45,000.

2. Logs and Logging ⇨3(15)

Where time was not made of essence of contract for sale of timber, seller, who never tendered performance on his part, repudiated contract by sending notice advising purchasers that he had canceled contract for failure to make payments before a specified date and ordering purchasers not to remove any more logs from land, and he also breached contract by entering into an agreement with another party to remove timber, and upon such repudiation purchaser was entitled to maintain an action for restitution.

3. Vendor and Purchaser ⇨148, 170

In contract for sale of land where performance is due on a certain date, even if time is of the essence, a party who fails to perform is not in default until other party places him in default by making a tender.

A promise to pay and a promise to convey are mutually dependent and condition-

5. Logs and Logging ⇨3(15)

In action by purchaser of timber for money due and for reasonable value of services performed in constructing roads to and upon timber land and for timber felled thereon, evidence sustained finding that purchaser, who had felled, bucked and peeled over one and a half million feet of timber at total labor cost of over $5,700 and who had used two caterpillar tractors having a rental value of $14 and $10 per hour for a minimum of 211 hours in constructing access roads, conferred a benefit on the property in the amount of $10,096.13.

6. Logs and Logging ⇨3(15)

In action by purchaser of timber for money due and for reasonable value of services performed on land before cancellation of contract by seller and resale of timber to a third person, purchaser, while entitled to restitution for reasonable value of benefit conferred upon seller by building roads and felling and bucking timber less the value of the use of land, was not entitled to profit from use of land.

Burton, Lee & Hennessy, Yreka, for appellant.

Falk & Falk, Eureka, for respondent.

SCHOTTKY, Justice.

[1] In June, 1954, appellant Barton and the Bairds entered into a contract entitled "Contract for Sale of Timber." By the terms of the contract Barton agreed to sell all the merchantable timber on 240 acres of land owned by him for $50,000. The purchasers made a down payment of $10,000. The balance was to be paid for at the rate of $20 per thousand for all peeler logs and $12 per thousand for all saw logs sold by the Bairds. Full payment was to be made in six months with all deferred payments to bear interest. When the entire sum was paid, Barton agreed to convey the land to the Bairds.

The Bairds entered into possession of the property and then started construction of access roads to connect the property with public roads. Four miles of road were constructed of which three miles were on U. S. Forest Service property and one mile on the timber property. The construction involved 211 man and tractor hours. The access roads were partially rocked. The Bairds then commenced logging operations. A strike hampered operations in July. Normal operations were conducted from August until October 6th when the Board of Supervisors of Del Norte County closed a suspension bridge across the Smith River to all truck traffic. The closure prevented any egress for logging trucks from the timber land. In December, 1954, a toll road was opened. To use the road required the payment of a toll of $1.50 per thousand feet caried and the posting of a large bond, which the Bairds claimed made it economically impossible to continue operations, so they stopped. During the period the Bairds were able to remove logs from the property Barton received $15,096.13 for logs sold. In addition, at the time the bridge was closed the Bairds had felled and bucked over one and one-half million feet of fir and redwood at a cost of $5,782.63.

On February 10, 1955, Barton sent the Bairds a document labeled "Notice of Cancellation." Thereafter, on March 23, 1955, Barton entered into a timber contract with one Dean calling for stumpage payments at a certain price. The agreement provided that if and when all the timber had been cut and removed and the total stumpage had amounted to $20,000 or more, Barton would convey the lands to Dean. On July 14, 1955, Barton conveyed the property to Dean and on the same date Dean transferred the timber to a plywood company for $45,000.

C. A. Baird, the assignee of the Bairds, then brought suit against Barton to recover $10,000 for money due, and $12,227.72 for the reasonable value of services performed. Barton cross-complained and asked that the court determine that the contract with the Bairds was terminated because of the alleged breach of the Bairds in not making the payments on the contract when due. Upon the trial of the case two questions were submitted to the jury for its special verdicts. The jury was asked to determine the value of the property on July 14, 1955, and March 23, 1955, and to determine whether Baird had ever told Barton he would not or did not intend to pay the balance on the contract. The jury found that the value of the property was $45,000 on both dates and that Baird had never repudiated the contract.

The court made findings which incorporated the findings made by the jury and found further that Barton did not at any time serve written notice upon respondent reestablishing a time limit for forfeiture if full payment was not made therein; that on March 23, 1955, Barton entered into a timber sales contract with Claude W. Dean and Levinna Dean to sell the said land and timber for $20,000 at a time when the land and timber were worth $45,000, and on July 14, 1955, deeded said property to the Deans. The court found further that respondent was entitled to the return of the down payment of $10,000 and was entitled to be reimbursed for monies expended in building roads to and upon the property, and for down timber remaining thereon. The court further found that the reimbursement should be calculated as follows:

|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------|
| "Contract price for sale of timber by defendant to plaintiff,                                          | $50,000.00  |
| "Loss of value on account of logs removed,                                                             | 15,096.13    |
| <hr/>                                                                                                  |              |
| "Bare remaining value after removal of logs by plaintiff,                                              | $34,903.87  |
| "Value of property at time of sale by defendant to Deans as fixed by jury,                             | $45,000.00  |
| "Less value (from above) after removal of logs,                                                        | $34,903.87  |
| <hr/>                                                                                                  |              |
| "Benefit conferred upon property by the felling and bucking of the trees and by the building of roads, | $10,096.13" |

Judgment was entered in favor of respondent in the sum of $20,096.13. Barton was denied any relief on his cross-complaint.

Barton has appealed from the judgment and contends that the material findings of fact are not supported by the evidence adduced at the trial, and that the findings do not support the conclusions of law and judgment entered.

Appellant's first contention is that there was no evidence to support the finding that the property was worth $45,000 on March 23, 1955, which was the time the Barton-Dean contract was made. There was evidence that Dean sold the timber on July 14, 1955, for $45,000. This would tend to establish its value as of that date. Sutherland in his work on damages (Vol. 2, p. 1214) states: "Where the price or value at the time in question can not be directly proved it may be inferred from circumstances; and among those which may be proved are sales at other times near that date, especially if the property is such as bears a stable, rather than a fluctuating, price." McCormick in his work on damages (section 46) states: "The value of land may be proved by * * * evidence * * * of the prices paid on sales of similar land in the neighborhood within a reasonable time before or after the time of valuation." We believe that evidence of the value of the timber on July 14, 1955, is some evidence of its value on March 23, 1955, and that we would not be justified in holding that the determination of the court that the fair market value of the property on March 23, 1955, was $45,000 is not supported by the record.

[2-4] Appellant also attacks the finding that he did not at any time serve respondent Baird with notice of default and points to the notice of cancellation of contract served on respondent on February 10, 1955. This was not a notice of default. While the contract called for payments in six months or on December 1, 1954, time was not made of the essence. In a contract for the sale of land where performance is due on a certain date, even if time is of the essence a party who fails to perform is not in default until the other party places him in default by making a tender. The promise to pay and the promise to convey are mutually dependent and conditional. Until one has offered to perform, the other party can not be placed in default. (3 Corbin on Contracts, sec. 663.) Barton never tendered performance on his own part. When Barton sent his notice advising the Bairds that he had cancelled the contract and ordering them not to remove any more logs from the land, he repudiated the contract. He also breached the contract by entering into the agreement with the Deans. Once Barton repudiated the contract the Bairds were entitled to maintain an action for restitution. 4 Corbin on Contracts, sec. 979; Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal.App. 280, 128 P. 1023, 1026; Duncanson v. Walton, 111 Cal. 516, 44 P. 174.

[5,6] Appellant Barton challenges the finding of the trial court that Baird conferred a benefit on the property in the amount of $10,096.13. The method used by the trial court supports this finding but the figure can be supported another way. There is evidence that the respondent had felled, bucked and peeled 1,577,978 board feet of redwood and fir at a total labor cost of $5,782.63. The testimony shows that a minimum of 211 hours were spent on constructing the access roads and that two caterpillar tractors were used, a D-8 and a D-6. The testimony shows that the reasonable rental value of a D-8 was $14 per hour and a D-6, $10 per hour. These figures were without regard to the cost of rocking the road. The above figures alone amount to over $10,096.13. The trial court, however, did err in its determination of the amount due. While the Bairds were entitled to restitution of the reasonable value of the benefit they conferred upon Barton by their acts of building roads and felling and bucking timber less the value of the use of the land, they were not entitled to profit from their use of the land. The Bairds removed some timber from the land. They paid Barton for the timber at the stumpage rate provided for in the contract. This rate may well have been below the market value of the timber. This should be determined by the court, and any profit made by the Bairds on the timber removed should be deducted from the amount of recovery allowed. Wagner v. McConnell, 141 Cal.App.2d 370, 296 P.2d 915.

The cause is remanded to the trial court for a determination of the profit made by the Bairds on the timber removed by them. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed. Each party shall bear his own costs on appeal.

Civ. 9339.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Sept. 10, 1958.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 2, 1958.

Hearing Denied Nov. 5, 1958.

Action by business agent of local union on behalf of members of the union and himself, against an employer and certain of its agents for breach of a collective bargaining agreement. The Superior Court, Shasta County, Eaton and Ross, JJ., sustained defendants' demurrer to a second amended complaint, as amended, without leave to amend, and entered judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Peek, Acting P. J., held that where plaintiff's complaint failed to allege that a person employed by defendant-employer was afforded an opportunity of membership in union on the same terms and conditions as were available to other employees, and that employee failed to tender initiation fees and dues, complaint failed to allege facts showing occurrence of conditions precedent to employer's duty to discharge such person under contract in question, and therefore, complaint failed to state a cause of action for breach of such contract which included a provision that every employee represented by union, as a condition of employment, would become and remain a member of the union, subject to the terms and conditions of the Labor Management Relations Act.

1. Labor Relations Ⓒ255

Under the Labor Management Relations Act, duty on the part of an employer to discharge an employee on demand of union is conditioned upon availability of membership in the union to the employee on the same terms and conditions as are available to other employees, and the failure of the employee to tender initiation fees and dues. National Labor Relations Act, § 8(b) as amended by Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158(b).

2. Labor Relations Ⓒ777

Where union business agent's complaint failed to allege that a person employed by defendant-employer was afforded an opportunity of membership in union on the same terms and conditions as were available to other employees, and that employee failed to tender initiation fees and dues, complaint failed to allege facts showing occurrence of conditions precedent to employer's duty to discharge such person under contract in question, and therefore complaint failed to state a cause of action for breach of such contract which included a provision that every employee represented by union, as a condition of employment, would become and remain a member of the union, subject to the terms and conditions of the Labor Management Relations Act. National Labor Relations Act, § 8(b) as amended by Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158(b).

3. Labor Relations ☞777

Allegation by union agent that employer failed to require a certain employee to join union could not be considered as an allegation of breach of collective bargaining agreement requiring every employee represented by union, as a condition of employment, to become and remain a member of the union, subject to provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act, since under such Act employer is under no duty to require his employees to join the union, but is merely under a duty to discharge an employee after a proper demand has been made by the union. National Labor Relations Act, § 8(b) as amended by Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158(b).

Halpin & Halpin, Redding, for appellants.

Chenoweth & Leininger, Redding, Rogers & Clark, San Francisco, for respondents.

PEEK, Acting Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff, as business agent of Local 13-433 CIO-IWA, brought this action for damages on behalf of all the members of the union and on his own behalf, against defendant Ralph L. Smith Lumber Company and certain of its agents for breach of a collective bargaining agreement. Defendants' demurrer to the second amended complaint, as amended, was sustained without leave to amend upon counsel's statement that no further amendment would be filed, and a judgment of dismissal was thereafter entered.

The allegations of the second amended complaint, as amended, pertinent to the issues on appeal were that the union and the lumber company were parties to a collective bargaining agreement which in part provided, in Article IIA thereof, that:

"The National Labor Relations Board having certified that a majority of the employees have voted to authorize the Union to seek a clause requiring membership in the Union as a condition of employment, the following clause shall become a part of this agreement:

"Within 30 days from the effective date of this clause or within 30 days after employment, every employee represented by the Union, as a condition of employment, shall become and remain a member of the Union. This clause is subject to the terms and provisions of Section 8 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947."

The complaint further alleged that on October 18, 1954, Charles R. Hatfield was employed by defendant company as a choke setter, a position coming within the bargaining unit represented by the union; that on May 6, 1955, the union requested in writing that the company discharge Hatfield, but that it unlawfully refused said request; that on May 17, 1955, after a second request by the union, Hatfield was discharged; that defendants' failure to discharge Hatfield from November 18, 1954, to May 17, 1955, was the proximate cause of plaintiff's damages where were alleged to be (a) loss of dues and initiation fee from November 18, 1954, to May 17, 1955, in the amount of $36; (b) loss of services of Hatfield in the amount of $10,000; and (c) $10,000 damages caused by defendants' breach, in that the union was weakened and made to seem without economic power and thus unable to deal effectively for the economic betterment of its members. Plaintiff further alleged that Hatfield refused to become a member of the union during the period he was employed by the defendant company.

By the amendment to the second amended complaint, plaintiff further alleged that defendants knew that the question of Hatfield's joining the union was of great importance to the members of the union, to the general public and to other employers in the area; that it had become a matter of common knowledge, known to defendants, that the union needed the services of Hatfield as a member on or before May 5, 1955, in order to negotiate successfully with defendants for better wages and working conditions during the years 1955 and 1956; that defendants knew that if said union was unsuccessful in bringing about the immediate discharge of Hatfield after his refusal to join the union on or before May 5, 1955, the union would not be in a position to secure economic conditions of benefit to said membership; that with knowledge of said facts the defendants deliberately and intentionally refused to discharge Hatfield immediately upon the lawful demand of May 5 and refused to require him to join the union on or before May 5, but instead informed him that he did not have to join the union; and that because of the alleged facts, Hatfield as an individual had a unique value to said union during the period from November 18, 1954, to May 5, 1955.

Section 8 of the federal act, National Labor Relations Act, specifically incorporated in the agreement of the parties, provides in part:

"* * * That no employer shall justify any discrimination against an employee for nonmembership in a labor organization (A) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that such membership was not available to the employee on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to other members, or (B) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than the failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership."

Section 8(b) of the act provides:

"It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents * * * (2) to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of subsection (a) (3) [supra] of this section or to discriminate against an employee with respect to whom membership in such organization has been denied or terminated on some ground other than his failure to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership; * * *". 29 U.S.C.A. § 158(b).

[1,2] It is apparent from the express terms of the Labor Management Relations Act that the duty on the part of the employer to discharge an employee on demand of the union was conditioned upon the availability of membership in the union to the employee on the same terms and conditions as are available to other employees and the failure of the employee to tender initiation fees and dues. It is also apparent from plaintiff's complaint as summarized that there has been a failure to allege facts showing that all of the conditions precedent to the defendants' duty to discharge Hatfield have happened or have been excused. It necessarily follows that defendants' demurrer was properly sustained.

[3] The allegation by plaintiff that defendants failed to require Hatfield to join the union could in no way be considered as an allegation of breach of the contract since under the incorporated statute, the employer is under no duty to require his employees to join the union. He is merely under a duty to discharge an employee who fails to join after a proper demand has been made by the union. Silva v. Mercier, 33 Cal.2d 704, 707, 204 P.2d 609.

In view of our conclusion that plaintiff's complaint is insufficient for the causes heretofore stated, it becomes unnecessary to discuss defendants' further contention that there is not sufficient causal connection between the breach and the damages alleged.

The judgment is affirmed.

Cr. 1185.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Sept. 17, 1958.

Defendant was convicted of the unlawful sale of narcotics and from a judgment of the Superior Court of San Bernardino County and from an order denying a new trial, Edward P. Fogg, J., the defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Griffin, P. J., held that the evidence was sufficient to carry the case to the jury on the question of identity of the defendant as the offender, that the venue was sufficiently established and that the verdict was not inconsistent.

Affirmed.

1. Criminal Law §741(2)

In prosecution for the unlawful sale of narcotics, evidence of identity of the defendant as the offender was sufficient for the jury. West's Ann.Health & Safety Code, § 11500.

2. Criminal Law §564(1)

In prosecution for the unlawful sale of narcotics, where the evidence established that part of the acts constituting the sale took place in San Bernardino County, jurisdiction in that county was sufficiently established. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 781.

3. Criminal Law §1144(14)

Error in giving or refusing claimed instructions cannot be presumed.

4. Criminal Law §814(20)

In prosecution for the unlawful sale of narcotics where the evidence indicated that if defendant was guilty at all he was guilty of a higher offense of sale, court properly refused to instruct on any claimed lesser offense. West's Ann.Pen. Code, § 1159.

5. Criminal Law §877

In prosecution for the unlawful sale of narcotics, claim that because the evidence as to sale by defendant and as to possession by codefendant was exactly the same inconsistent verdicts were rendered because codefendant was found guilty of possession was not sustainable where the sale was negotiated by the defendant without the aid of the codefendant and the possession of the codefendant though temporary appeared to be an independent transaction.

Joseph A. Katz, San Bernardino, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., William E. James, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Presiding Justice.

Defendant-appellant Ernest Frias Izzo and defendant Jesus Ramirez were charged in count one of an indictment with selling a narcotic (heroin) [in violation of section 11500 of the Health and Safety Code] on August 9, 1957. In the second count the same charge is made against appellant as occurring on August 16, 1957. Both defendants pleaded not guilty. Ramirez admitted a prior conviction of a felony (possession of narcotics) and that he served a term therefor in prison. Appellant admitted two prior felonies (burglary and robbery). A jury trial resulted in a conviction of appellant as charged and he was sentenced to state's prison. Defendant Ramirez was found guilty of possession of narcotics under count one, a claimed included offense. Motions for new trial were denied. Appellant alone appeals and claims: 1, that the evidence is insufficient to establish (a) his identity; and (b) that the crime was committed in San Bernardino County; 2, that the court gave inconsistent instructions in reference to lesser and included offenses; and 3, that the verdict is contrary to law and inconsistent in that the jury found Ramirez guilty of a claimed included offense (possession of narcotics) and appellant guilty of sale, upon evidence which was exactly the same as to both defendants.

One Edward Nunez, the people's chief witness, a special deputy sheriff, was, on August 9, 1957, at about 7 p. m., on duty in Cucamonga. While driving down 24th street appellant stopped him and asked him what he was doing. Nunez replied he was looking for one Elias. Appellant stated he did not know where he was but if Nunez was looking for "junk" (heroin) he knew where he could obtain some in Pomona. Defendant Ramirez approached them about that time and asked Nunez what he was doing there. Nunez replied he was invited by appellant to obtain some "junk" in Pomona and Ramirez stated he was going with them. After some discussion Nunez agreed to drive his car. They drove to Pomona and parked near a supermarket at appellant's direction. Nunez was then asked by appellant: "How much do you want?" and Nunez replied "two caps" (capsules of heroin). Appellant said: "Why don't you give me $12.00 and I will get you 3"? Nunez then gave him $12 and he left. Several minutes later Nunez and Ramirez picked up appellant. They obtained two paper cups and some water and started back to Cucamonga. En route, appellant sterilized a hypodermic needle, broke a capsule and dropped it into a paper cup. Both defendants injected themselves. Ramirez assisted appellant. Nunez declined to "fix" himself. At one stage of the proceedings Ramirez called appellant "Panadero" (Spanish word for baker,—appellant's trade). Appellant, seated in the back seat, gave the two "caps" to Ramirez, who was seated in the front seat with Nunez, and said: "Give it to him" (Nunez), and defendant Ramirez did so in San Bernardino County, about five miles east of the Los Angeles County line, near Cucamonga. These "caps" were contained in a cellophane bag. After leaving appellant and Ramirez in Cucamonga, Nunez contacted the officers in San Bernardino and the capsules obtained by him from defendants were marked and sealed in an envelope and subsequently identified by Nunez at the trial. A chemist made an analysis of them and found them to contain heroin.

On August 16th Nunez again saw appellant in Cucamonga, San Bernardino County, and purchased "two caps" of heroin from him which were contained in two aluminum foil papers, for which he paid appellant $10. The "caps" were turned over to the officers and a like analysis was made with the same result. After proper identification they were received in evidence.

Appellant testified he did not sell narcotics to Nunez at any time and did not see him at Cucamonga; that appellant wore a mustache in August, 1957 (Nunez did not recall this fact). (He said he believed appellant did wear a light jacket.) Appellant claimed he never had a light jacket. He said he probably was in Cucamonga on August 9th and August 16th. He acknowledged that on occasions he had been called "Panadero" and that he had known Ramirez five or six years.

[1] Appellant's wife testified that appellant helped his father in the bakery on the nights here involved and said appellant wore a mustache during all of August. On rebuttal an officer testified he had known appellant three or four years, and had also known him as "Panadero". Some discrepancy existed between the testimony of Nunez and that of appellant as to the kind and color of appellant's car when they first met in Cucamonga on the night of August 9th. The testimony as to the identification of appellant and his presence at the times indicated was a factual question for the determination of the jury. People v. Mazza, 135 Cal.App.2d 587, 596, 287 P.2d 798; People v. Thomas, 103 Cal.App.2d 669, 672, 229 P.2d 836.

[2] The evidence sufficiently shows that the negotiations for the sale of the heroin was commenced in San Bernardino County. Although the consideration was not passed in that county, the delivery of the heroin to Nunez occurred in San Bernardino County. There were ample facts authorizing the jury to believe that part of the acts constituting the sale took place in San Bernardino County and jurisdiction in that county was sufficiently established. Penal Code, section 781.

[3,4] Appellant argues that the trial court should also have given an instruction that appellant could be convicted of a claimed lesser offense of possession and it erred in not submitting a verdict to the jury to this effect. No instructions, given or refused, have been brought to us in the record on appeal. Error in refusing or giving such claimed instructions cannot be presumed. People v. McClure, 133 Cal. App.2d 631, 633, 284 P.2d 887; Thomas v. Laguna, 113 Cal.App.2d 657, 660, 248 P.2d 929. Since the evidence against this appellant clearly indicates that if he was guilty at all he was guilty of the higher offense of sale, the court was justified in refusing to instruct on any claimed lesser offense even assuming, arguendo, that appellant was in a position to urge that possession is a lesser offense contained within the charge and that he was entitled to an instruction on the subject. People v. McCoy, 25 Cal.2d 177, 187, 153 P.2d 315; Section 1159 Penal Code.

[5] The claim that the evidence as to the sale by appellant and as to possession by defendant Ramirez was exactly the same and accordingly inconsistent verdicts were reached, is not borne out by the record.

Appellant cites People v. Talbot, 220 Cal. 3, 17, 28 P.2d 1057, and People v. Angelopoulos, 30 Cal.App.2d 538, 549, 86 P.2d 873, in support of his contention. The sale was negotiated by and between Nunez and appellant without the aid of Ramirez. Ramirez's possession of the heroin, although temporary, appeared to be an independent transaction and the jury concluded he did not participate in the sale. The verdict rendered against Ramirez, whether justified or not, was not inconsistent with the verdict rendered against appellant to the extent that appellant was thereby prejudiced. People v. Talbot, supra; People v. Edwards, 81 Cal.App.2d 655, 661, 185 P.2d 74; People v. Lamb, 134 Cal.App.2d 582, 585, 285 P.2d 941.

Judgment and order denying a new trial affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 2, 1958.

Action for deceit in sale of certain stock, and for declaratory relief. Defendants counterclaimed for payments of salary allegedly due under agreement in question, and had attachments levied upon property of plaintiffs. The Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Leon T. David, J., entered an order granting certain plaintiffs' motion to discharge the attachments, and defendants appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Ashburn, J., held that where contract for sale of certain stock in a corporation provided that in part consideration thereof buyers agreed that they would cause corporation to employ seller and his mother as consultants and in consideration of such services, buyers agreed to cause corporation to pay a certain sum of money to seller and his mother, buyers occupied the position of guarantors of such salary payments by the corporation, and therefore, attachment could be brought against buyers based on such agreement.

ASHBURN, Justice.

Appeal from order discharging or dissolving attachments. Plaintiffs Rose, Anspach and O. W. Childs Company sued defendants John B. Pearman and Margaret B. Pearman for deceit in the sale to them of all the outstanding stock of Leo G. MacLaughlin Company, a corporation, seeking damages in the sum of $75,000; in a second count of the complaint they sought declaratory relief. Leo G. MacLaughlin Company is a co-plaintiff and joins in seeking declaratory relief. Defendants answered, denying the alleged fraud and asserting counterclaims for payments in the nature of salary alleged to be due them under the terms of the said agreement which plaintiffs allege to have been fraudulently induced. Attachments were levied by defendants upon property of the plaintiffs other than the MacLaughlin Company, later released as to Anspach, and the other plaintiffs, Rose and O. W. Childs Company, moved to discharge same upon the grounds that there was no contract for direct payment of money made by them with defendants, and that the allegations of the attachment affidavits were untrue. Upon conflicting affidavits the trial judge granted the motion and this appeal attacks that order.

The contract is in writing, dated June 26, 1956, John B. Pearman being named as seller and plaintiffs Rose, Anspach and O. W. Childs Company as buyers. Pearman agreed to sell to buyers 2,775 shares of capital stock of the MacLaughlin Company for the sum of $100,000. The contract contains certain representations and warranties upon which the fraud action is based, provides that the purchase price be paid through escrow, and includes an agreement for employment of seller John B. Pearman and his mother, Margaret B. Pearman, by said MacLaughlin Company upon the following terms: "In part consideration hereof, the Buyers agree that they will cause MacLaughlin to employ, and MacLaughlin by its signature hereto appended does hereby employ the Seller and Margaret B. Pearman, who have been with MacLaughlin for many years, as Consultants in connection with the business and affairs of MacLaughlin for a period commencing July 1, 1956, and ending December 31, 1962. * * * In consideration of said services, The Buyers agree that they will cause MacLaughlin to pay, and MacLaughlin by its signature hereto appended does hereby agree to pay to the Seller and Margaret B. Pearman the sum of $100,000 in the following manner: An amount equal to 10 per cent of the gross sums received by MacLaughlin as insurance commissions commencing at July 1, 1956, and continuing until there shall have been so paid the aggregate sum of $100,000; provided that irrespective of the amount of insurance commissions received, the Buyers agree that MacLaughlin will, and MacLaughlin hereby agrees to pay to said parties not less than $7,500 during the period from July 1, 1956, and ending December 31, 1956, and not less than $15,000 during each calendar year thereafter until said entire sum of $100,000.00 shall have been paid." (Emphasis added.) It is also provided that the minimum annual payments be made in monthly instalments of $350 to Margaret B. Pearman and $900 to John B. Pearman. It is further agreed that in the event of death or incapacity of either of the Pearmans prior to December 31, 1962, the payments required by the employment agreement shall continue to be made to the incapacitated employee or the estate of the deceased employee until the entire amount of $100,000 is fully paid. The Pearmans also agree not to engage in insurance or securities business in any form or manner except on behalf of the MacLaughlin Company, and not to disclose its customer lists. Emphasis in the foregoing quotation has been supplied because those words form the heart of the present controversy.

[1] No claim of formal defect in attachment affidavit or any procedural aspect of the attachment is made, nor is it claimed that a counterclaim will not support an attachment. See, Allers v. Beverly Hills Laundry, Inc., 98 Cal.App. 580, 583-584, 277 P. 337; Interlocking Stone Co. v. Scribner, 19 Cal.App. 344, 347-348, 126 P. 178; 1 Witkin California Procedure, § 46 (c), p. 889; 5 Cal.Jur.2d § 6, p. 601.

[2] The argument is that plaintiffs did not agree to employ and did not employ defendants; that they merely undertook to cause the MacLaughlin Company to do so and had discharged their entire obligation when it signed the agreement in question and therein stated that it "does hereby employ" defendants and agreed to pay to them the specified sums of money. The writing will not bear this narrow construction. The employment therein provided was for a term extending from July 1, 1956 to December 31, 1962. MacLaughlin Company did employ them for that period and when that was done plaintiffs had performed part of their undertaking. But MacLaughlin also agreed to pay defendants a total of $100,000 in monthly instalments, and plaintiffs agreed to cause MacLaughlin to do so. That undertaking could not be performed completely until the end of the employment term. Plaintiffs occupy the position of guarantors (Civ.Code, § 2787; Beck v. Shepherd Fruit Co., Inc., 19 Cal. App.2d 590, 597, 66 P.2d 188).

[3,4] An attachment will lie upon an employment contract (Lewis v. Steifel, 98 Cal.App.2d 648, 650, 220 P.2d 769); it is conceded by respondents that the writ would run against the MacLaughlin Company. It is equally well established that the statutory phrase, "contract, express or implied, for the direct payment of money" (Code Civ.Proc., § 537), embraces a guaranty. Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 161, 167-168; Karn v. Wills, 50 Cal.App.2d 604, 609, 123 P.2d 640; Tyson v. Reincke, 25 Cal.App. 696, 701, 145 P. 153; Anderson v. Fidelity Union Casualty Co., 137 Cal.App. 37, 41, 29 P.2d 865; Dunn v. Mackey, 80 Cal. 104, 109, 22 P. 64; County of Monterey v. McKee, 51 Cal. 255; 1 Witkin California Procedure, § 51, p. 893; 5 Cal.Jur.2d, § 21, p. 620. In Bringas v. Sullivan, 126 Cal.App.2d 693, 697, 273 P.2d 336, 339, it is said: "All that is required is that the action be based on a contract calling for the payment of money. The word 'direct' as used in section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure is surplusage, for every contract for the payment of money would be a contract for the direct payment of money. [Citations.] Direct has been defined as meaning an amount ascertainable with reasonable certainty. [Citations.] The essential and material allegation is that the money sued on is due on a contract."

[5,6] Respondents argue that the ruling should be sustained upon the theory that the affidavits warranted the trial judge in concluding that appellants have no valid counterclaim. However, this is a situation in which the affidavits have no proper place. They become pertinent where the issue is a factual one as to whether the writ has been issued in a case not provided by statute (Kohler v. Agassiz, 99 Cal. 9, 13, 33 P. 741); exemplified by questions of whether the debt was secured (Goldman v. Floter, 142 Cal. 388, 390-391, 76 P. 58; Fisk v. French, 114 Cal. 400, 403, 46 P. 161); or whether security has become worthless (Barbieri v. Ramelli, 84 Cal. 174, 176, 24 P. 113); or whether the defendant is a non-resident (Sparks v. Bell, 137 Cal. 415, 419, 70 P. 281). But affidavits cannot be used to negative the existence of the alleged cause of action upon which the attachment rests. The sufficiency of the complaint or the existence of merit in the attaching creditor's claim cannot be canvassed upon a motion to dissolve or discharge an attachment. Pacific Electrical & Mechanical Co. v. Hardiman, 101 Cal.App.2d 699, 226 P.2d 65; Western Title Insurance & Guaranty Co. v. Bartolacelli, 124 Cal.App.2d 690, 696, 269 P.2d 165; Lewis v. Steifel, supra, 98 Cal.App.2d 648, 220 P.2d 769; 1 Witkin, California Procedure, § 93, p. 926. In the Lewis case it is said, at page 651 of 98 Cal.App.2d, at page 771 of 220 P.2d: "An attaching plaintiff may claim in his affidavit the maximum amount of the alleged liability of the defendant, and the fact that within these limits the claim appears to be exaggerated, does not furnish a ground for discharging the attachment, nor does the fact that there appears to be but slight prospect that plaintiff will recover anything."

[7] For these reasons we have assumed as a basis of this opinion that defendants have a good counterclaim, which means an absence of fraud in the negotiation of the agreement. The question of whether such is actually the case is not pertinent upon this appeal.

The order under review is reversed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,

Prosecution on two counts of selling heroin. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Allen T. Lynch, J., entered judgment of conviction and defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Vallée, J., held that there was no error by trial court in questioning defendant during his direct examination as to fact that defendant had entered plea of guilty as to one of the counts in information and had later withdrawn such plea.

Affirmed.

1. Criminal Law ⇨406(4)

In prosecution on two counts for selling heroin, there was no error by trial court, in a nonjury trial, in inquiring of defendant on his direct examination as to circumstances surrounding entry of subsequently withdrawn plea of guilty to one of the counts. Where defendant entered, at preliminary examination, a subsequently withdrawn plea of guilty as to one of the counts in the information, plea of guilty was an

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., and William E. James, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

VALLÉE, Justice.

In a nonjury trial defendant was convicted of two counts of selling heroin. Health & Safety Code, § 11500. He appeals from the judgment.

At the time of his arraignment defendant pleaded not guilty to the two counts charged in the information. Thereafter, defendant, with counsel present, pleaded guilty to count I.<sup>1</sup> At that time at defendant's request further proceedings as to count I and disposition of count II were continued. Later defendant, with counsel present, withdrew the plea of guilty to count I and pleaded not guilty thereto. The trial was had, and defendant was found guilty as charged in both counts.

Defendant testified in his own behalf and denied selling heroin, as charged in count I. In the course of his direct examination the following occurred:

"The Court: Now, on June 10th you appeared before me? The Defendant: Yes, sir, I did.

"The Court: You do that because you are in fact guilty of it? The Defendant: Yes, your Honor.

"The Court: Has anyone promised you anything if you entered a plea of guilty? The Defendant: No, your Honor.

"The Court: You do this freely and voluntarily? The Defendant: Yes, your Honor.

"The Court: All right.

"Mr. Woodmansee: John D. Ivy, under information number 189579, how do you now plead under count 1 thereof to violation of section 11,500 Health and Safety Code, a felony, guilty or not guilty? The Defendant: Guilty."

1. The following took place at the time defendant pleaded guilty to count I: "Mr. Klynn [attorney for defendant]: Your Honor, this is more or less of an associate case to the prior case of Mr. Thomas, and it is also the defendant's desire in this case to enter a plea as to count 1. Is that correct, Mr. Ivy? The Defendant: Yes.

"The Court: Mr. Ivy, you are charged with a violation of section 11,500 Health and Safety Code, selling heroin. Now, do I understand you wish to enter a plea of guilty to that charge? The Defendant: Yes, sir, your Honor.

"The Court: At that time I asked you whether or not you were guilty of Count II which charges the sale of this particular—

"Mr. Chandler: Pardon me, I believe that was Count I.

"The Court: Count I? The Witness: Yes, sir.

"The Court: You told me you were guilty of that charge? The Witness: Yes, sir.

"The Court: Why did you tell me you were guilty of the charge? The Witness: Because the counselor I had at that time, he advised me if I did, it would be more lenient punishment put on me for one count than two.

"The Court: Do you remember my asking you if anybody promised you anything? The Witness: Yes, sir.

"The Court: You told me no one promised you anything? The Witness: Yes, sir, I did say that.

"The Court: Why did you say that if it wasn't true? The Witness: Because it was due to my inexperience and I was somewhat excited. He didn't promise me anything. He said it would be considered and I would have a chance of more lenient punishment if I did plead guilty to one count rather than be found guilty of two; and not having been in Superior Court before, why, I counted on his advice and accepted his advice, being a lawyer, that he would give me the best advice."

Defendant was then examined further by his counsel. In the course of this examination the following occurred:

"The Court: You stated to the Court awhile ago that the reason you pleaded guilty to the one count was because your attorney told you it would be easier for you if you had one count rather than two. But if you were not guilty of any of the counts why did you agree to enter a plea of guilty to one?

The Witness: Judge, your Honor, he was telling me that I was charged with this narcotics, and that there was this public sentiment against it, and the average citizen would look down on it and consider me guilty without any explanation because of the word narcotic. People are prejudiced against the subject.

"The Court: You mean to tell me he told you the Court would find you guilty simply because of public sentiment; the Court would find you guilty regardless of what the truth was? The Witness: More or less, yes, sir, that is what he meant, that my chances were very slim because it involved narcotics; and there was being so many arrests, and people were going to prison for it, and my chances would be very slim, according to the transcript we had read over together."

Defendant's only point is that the court committed prejudicial error in the examination with respect to his plea of guilty to count I. People v. Ryan, 82 Cal. 617, 23 P. 121, held that after a plea of guilty has been withdrawn by permission of the court, and the plea of not guilty substituted, as provided by section 1018 of the Penal Code, the plea of guilty becomes functus officio, and cannot be proved on the trial as an admission or confession of the defendant; that to receive the evidence would defeat the privilege granted by section 1018 of the Penal Code.<sup>2</sup> People v. Boyd, 67 Cal.App. 292, 227 P. 783, was a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses. The defendant's offer to plead guilty to one offense charged if the court would continue the case was admitted in evidence over objection. The District Court of Appeal held that the trial court erred in overruling the objection but that the error was not preju-

2. Penal Code, section 1018, in pertinent part reads: "On application of the defendant at any time before judgment the court may, and in case of a defendant who appeared without counsel at the time of the plea to court must, for good cause shown, permit the plea of guilty to be withdrawn and a plea of not guilty substituted."

dicial. In denying a hearing the Supreme Court said (67 Cal.App. at page 302, 227 P. at page 786):

"We deem it proper, however, to say that we disagree with that portion of the opinion which holds that it was error for the trial court to overrule the objection of the defendant to the admission in evidence of the offer on his part to plead guilty to one offense charged in the information. The action of the defendant in that regard was an admission on his part of the truth of the charge that he obtained money under false pretenses, which, with the other evidence, was properly left to the consideration of the jury. People v. Jacobs, 165 App.Div. 721, 151 N.Y.S. 522. Such an admission was not, of course, conclusive evidence against the defendant. It was competent evidence merely; its weight and sufficiency being proper subjects for consideration by the jury. State v. Bringgold, 40 Wash. 12, 17, 82 P. 132. When the fact was established that the admission had been made by the accused, the admission was not before the jury as testimony by him establishing the truth of all or any part of the allegations of the information, but the fact that he had made it was before them, and was relevant as being inconsistent with his claim to the jury that he did not obtain any money under false pretenses from the complaining witnesses, and was not guilty. State v. Carta, 90 Conn. 79, 96 A. 411. The defendant's own admission, voluntarily made, was clearly competent evidence against him. That he made the admission in court can detract nothing from its relevancy or its competency. Ehrlick v. Commonwealth, 125 Ky. 742, 102 S.W. 289, 128 Am.St.Rep. 269; People v. Gould, 70 Mich. 240, 38 N.W. 232, 14 Am.St.Rep. 493.

"The opinion of this court in People v. Ryan, 82 Cal. 617, 23 P. 121, in which it was held to be error to introduce in evidence a plea of guilty after it had been withdrawn by permission of the court and a plea of not guilty substituted, seems to be out of harmony with what we believe to be the correct and the better rule. It should be noted, however, that the court was there dealing with a case in which there could have been no conviction without the plea of guilty being considered as a 'confession,' and the conviction was accordingly reversed."

The court in People v. Sanderson, 129 Cal. App. 531, at page 532, 18 P.2d 982, at page 983, said:

"Over the objection of appellant's counsel that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, a witness was asked if he heard the defendant make a statement at the preliminary examination with reference to pleading guilty, to which the witness answered, 'I did.' The asking of this question was also cited as misconduct. Thereafter the witness stated that defendant stated at the time in question that 'he wished to waive his entire preliminary and plead guilty in the superior court.' Such evidence would seem very competent to be considered, with the other evidence, on the question whether or not appellant committed the burglary. The statement seemed to be voluntarily made by defendant himself, and it had a direct bearing on the issue raised by the plea of not guilty."

Also see, People v. Snell, 96 Cal.App. 657, 662-663, 274 P. 560.

[1, 2] The effect of the ruling of the Supreme Court in People v. Boyd, supra, 67 Cal.App. 292, 227 P. 783, was to disapprove People v. Ryan, supra, 82 Cal. 617, 23 P. 121, insofar as the latter case held that a plea of guilty which has been withdrawn is inadmissible. In Boyd the evidence held admissible by the Supreme Court was an offer on the defendant's part to plead guilty to one offense charged in the information. At bar the evidence was a plea of guilty to one of the offenses charged. We think it follows that if an offer to plead is admissible in evidence, a plea of guilty is likewise admissible. Defendant's plea of guilty to count I was an admission on his part of the truth of the charge. The admission was not conclusive evidence against him. It, together with his explanation, was competent evidence, its weight and sufficiency being for the consideration of the trier of fact. From the record, the plea of guilty appears to have been made voluntarily and it had a direct bearing on the issue raised by defendant's plea of not guilty. As said by the Supreme Court in Boyd, the fact that defendant made the admission in court does not affect its admissibility.

Prosecutions for conspiracy to commit crime of bookmaking. The Superior Court of San Diego County, William A. Glen, J., entered judgments of conviction and one of the defendants appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Griffin, P. J., held that there was no error in admitting scratch sheets of days on which alleged bets were made with defendants by police officer, since sheets were otherwise admissible to show that horses did run at track mentioned on those dates and it could not be considered prejudicial error to admit sheets with added notations of police officer, and there was no error in denying new trial on ground of newly discovered evidence consisting of testimony to impeach prosecution witness' reputation for truth and veracity.

Thomas Whelan, San Diego, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., William E. James and Arthur C. de Goede, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Presiding Justice.

Defendant-appellant Jack Pierce was indicted in count one with defendant James Springer on a charge of conspiracy to commit the crime of bookmaking (Penal Code, section 182, subdivision 1; and Penal Code, section 337a.) Three overt acts are charged: One, that about June 22, 1957, one Schrader met with defendant Springer at Tony's Newport Cafe and Bar at 5034 Newport Boulevard in Ocean Beach; second, that on or about June 22, 1957, Schrader placed a horse race bet with Springer and he accepted it in the presence of appellant Pierce; and third, that about June 26, 1957, Schrader placed a race horse bet with defendant Springer who then and there accepted it. The fifth count charges appellant Pierce with the crime of permitting the use of premises for bookmaking (Penal Code, Section 337a, subdivision 5), i. e., that about June 22, 1957, while the owner or occupant of a building, to wit, Tony's Newport Cafe and Bar, he permitted same to be used and occupied for the purpose of bookmaking. Both defendants were found guilty of these charges by a jury. Appellant was granted conditional probation. He appealed from the judgment of conviction and order denying a new trial. The first claim is that the verdict was against law and evidence mainly because the verdict was based upon incompetent and irrelevant evidence.

Appellant operated, as the owner, Tony's Newport Cafe and Bar, at the address alleged. An investigator by the name of Schrader was employed in making investigations in reference to bookmaking activities in the county. He testified generally that in June, 1957, he met one Jackson in a bar in San Diego and went to appellant's place of business; that there Jackson introduced him to appellant; that in the course of the conversation appellant informed him that "Herb, the bookie" (defendant Springer) was one of the best around and that Herb would take a bet from just about anyone, probably even from the law; that generally they became interested in horse racing talk and appellant offered to take him to the Tijuana race track; that he said he knew his way around there and knew the right people; that appellant told him about Herb, "the bookie out there"; that several people came in while he was in the restaurant and talked to appellant; that he left appellant's place of business and returned on June 21st alone; that some conversation ensued about him wanting to place a couple of bets; that appellant told him Herb, the bookie, was around and shortly thereafter appellant left the bar and returned with Herb and introduced him to Schrader; that Schrader told Herb, in appellant's presence, that he wanted to make a couple of "investments"; that he (Schrader) made two $5.00 bets on horses running at Hollywood Park, which Herb accepted; that he handed Herb a twenty-dollar bill and said "$5.00 to win on Larks Music running in the fourth race at Hollywood and $5.00 to win on The Pie King running in the seventh race * * *"; that he took the names of the horses from the entries in the National Daily Reporter of that date which he subsequently marked showing the horses and the amounts bet with the notation "Herb" (Exhibit No. 1, received in evidence over appellant's objection); that Herb handed him back $10 and said if he was not around to collect his winnings, if any, he would leave them there with appellant; that Herb told him that he would always be around there or in the card room near-by if he cared to locate him again; that on June 26th, he saw defendant Springer in a card room a few doors from Pierce's bar, sitting at a card table; that in the presence of Jackson he handed him $5 to win on Jaylpee, Jr., eighth race, at Monmouth, and showed him the entry on the scratch sheet he had so marked with the notation "Herb"; and that Herb said "Okay". This scratch sheet (Exhibit No. 2), thus marked and initialed by him was also received in evidence over objections. These horses did not win.

[1] The first objection involves the question of the admissibility of the two exhibits 1 and 2, offered in evidence by the prosecution. These exhibits were identified as scratch sheets of the days on which the alleged bets were made. Appellant contends that the notes placed thereon by Schrader were hearsay evidence and were inadmissible. Respondent concedes these notes were hearsay as to this appellant but contends they were otherwise admissible under the Uniform Business Records as Evidence Act (Sec. 1953f, Code Civ. Proc.), or that the reception of those notes in evidence along with the properly identified scratch sheet was harmless error.

[2] It appears that Schrader testified to the facts related without the aid of the notes, but on cross-examination he did look at them when he attempted to refresh his memory as to the bets in answer to a question propounded by appellant's counsel. It is the general rule that where one uses a writing made by him at the time for the sole purpose of refreshing his memory, the writing does not of itself become admissible in evidence by the prosecution in corroboration of the witness's testimony. It has been held, however, that where the witness testified fully, without refreshing his memory by the use of a memorandum, that although it was error, it was not prejudicial error to later admit the memorandum as evidence. People v. Allen, 37 Cal.App. 180, 188, 174 P. 374; In re Estate of Packer, 164 Cal. 525, 129 P. 778. It does not appear that section 1953f of the Code of Civil Procedure would authorize the receipt of such notes in evidence if they were used merely for the purpose of bolstering or corroborating the testimony of the witness. Since the witness did testify to the facts set forth without the aid of the notes to refresh his memory and since the form chart was otherwise admissible to show that the horses indicated did run at the tracks mentioned on those dates, it cannot be said that it was prejudicial error to admit the exhibits into evidence with the added notations.

[3,4] A Mrs. Motto testified that during July, 1957, she was engaged in book-making and had been convicted of this crime; that she knew defendant Springer and that he called at her home two or three times; that in placing bets she called Atwater 44-722; that she telephoned in bets for "Tommy", the barber, whom she was then unable to locate. A motion to strike this entire testimony was continued for the purpose of allowing the prosecution to connect it up with the appellant. Schrader testified that in the meantime he endeavored to locate Tommy, the barber, but was unable to find him, and the prosecutor remarked in the presence of the jury that he desired a continuance for this purpose although he did not know what his testimony would be, but if called to testify he would be under oath. The court denied the continuance and subsequently granted the motion with definite instructions to the jury to disregard it. It is ordinarily presumed that the jury followed the court's instruction in this respect. People v. Prather, 134 Cal. 436, 66 P. 589, 863. Appellant claims that this error was of the exceptional type and was not cured by the order. It does not affirmatively appear that prejudicial error resulted.

One Myrtle Garvin, sister-in-law of Springer, testified she had known Springer for many years; that within the past three years she was at his home two or three times a week and that he was making books on horse racing by telephone and bragging about it; that appellant Pierce came by there three or four times. On cross-examination she testified that she did not get along with her "in-laws" or other relatives very well and had not spoken to them for some time; that she had not been at Springer's home since the property was sold in 1956. A motion was then made by appellant to strike her entire testimony on the ground that it involved a time prior to the date of the claimed overt acts; that it was therefore inadmissible, but if admissible, it involved a separate conspiracy; that the witness was prejudiced and her testimony was unworthy of belief; and to allow this testimony to remain in evidence after appellant's motion to strike it was prejudicial error of the highest degree, citing such authority as Fiswick v. United States, 329 U.S. 211, 67 S.Ct. 224, 91 L.Ed. 196; Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 90 L.Ed. 1557; and Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391, 77 S.Ct. 963, 1 L.Ed.2d 931.

Defendant Springer testified in reference to Mrs. Garvin's prejudice against him and his family, denied her testimony in general, but said that if she did see anything that looked like bookmaking going on at his home at the time indicated, there was a possibility that she overheard him placing a bet, which he has done for himself on many occasions; that he had played cards in a place a few doors from Pierce's bar; that he did not recall seeing Schrader before the day of trial, but that he may have been in appellant Pierce's bar on June 22nd, 1957. He then testified that appellant Pierce had never been in his home but he had played cards with him at this particular card room.

Appellant Pierce denied seeing Schrader at the time indicated and denied generally his testimony. He particularly claimed that he never permitted defendant Springer to use his place of business as a place to conduct bookmaking of any kind.

[5] It does appear from the testimony of Mrs. Garvin that prior to the time of the alleged overt acts appellant Pierce and defendant Springer were acquainted. The testimony as to the nature and duration of their acquaintanceship was admissible so long as it had some bearing on or tended to prove the formation of the conspiracy charged. People v. Stevens, 78 Cal.App. 395, 248 P. 696; Bompensiero v. Superior Court, 44 Cal.2d 178, 185, 281 P.2d 250; People v. Gordon, 71 Cal.App.2d 606, 628, 163 P.2d 110. While the question of the witness's prejudice against Springer was very well shown, the question of the weight of her testimony was one for the jury. (19 Cal.Jur.2d 230-231, sec. 467.)

[6] The last point involves the denial of appellant's motion for a new trial on the ground of claimed newly discovered evidence. Apparently this is predicated upon some affidavits filed by appellant stating that the witness Mrs. Garvin was possessed of a generally bad reputation for truth and veracity, and upon a new trial her sisters, brothers, mother and others would so testify, and that he had no reason to believe she was going to be a witness at his trial because he did not know her. The record on appeal does not include the affidavits mentioned. Even assuming they would show what appellant contends, such evidence would only amount to possible impeachment of her testimony and it is not believed that a different result would follow. No prejudicial error resulted in the denial of the motion. People v. Vukojevich, 25 Cal.App. 459, 460, 143 P. 1058; People v. Long, 15 Cal.2d 590, 103 P.2d 969.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 10, 1958.

Hearing Denied Nov. 5, 1958.

Prosecution for forgery. The Superior Court, Lassen County, Ben V. Curler, J., denied accused's motion for new trial, denied probation and pronounced judgment on verdict of guilty, and accused appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Schottky, J., held that where ten checks allegedly forged by accused with word "forged" written on them and letter written by accused when in prison were offered in evidence to show handwriting of accused, district attorney was not required to accept accused's stipulation that he wrote checks and letter, but introduction of entire checks with word "forged" on them was improper, however, evidence of accused's guilt was so strong that no miscarriage of justice resulted.

Judgment and order affirmed.

In prosecution for forgery, instruction that law only requires that jury find as fact either that accused falsely forged indorsement knowing same to be forged with intent to defraud, or, that accused attempted to pass as true and genuine check bearing forged indorsement, knowing same to be forged with intent to defraud another, to arrive at verdict of guilty, and that, before bringing in verdict of guilty jury must be convinced beyond reasonable doubt and to moral certainty that accused committed crime of forgery in one or other of two ways just enumerated, was correct.

Harold L. Abbott, Susanville, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., by Lloyd Hinkelman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SCHOTTKY, Justice.

Defendant was charged by information with a violation of section 470 of the Penal Code. The information charged in Count I that appellant, on or about February 22, 1957, "did, with intent to defraud, sign the name of another person to a check, knowing that he had no authority so to do, and falsely forged an endorsement on a bill of exchange, promissory note or check and attempted to pass as true and genuine a check bearing a forged endorsement, knowing the same to be forged, with intent to prejudice, damage or defraud one Merl H. Fincher and/or Ray Randall." The information also charged appellant in Counts II through IV with four prior felony convictions for which he had served a sentence in a state or federal penal institution.

Defendant pleaded not guilty to the offense charged in Count I and admitted the four prior convictions charged. The case went to trial and the jury returned a verdict of "guilty of a violation of Section 470 of the Penal Code of the State of California, as charged in the information."

The court denied defendant's motion for a new trial, denied probation and pronounced judgment. Defendant has appealed from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant urges several grounds for a reversal of the judgment, but before discussing these we shall give a brief summary of the evidence as shown by the record.

On or about February 22, 1957, while in possession of an automobile belonging to Ray Randall, appellant presented to Charles Edwards, Jr., an employee of the White Eagle service station in Susanville, California, a check for $32 (People's Exhibit No. 1) for payment of a service station bill. The check was drawn by appellant on the First Western Bank and Trust Company, Susanville, California, and made payable to Ray Randall. The check was endorsed on the back with the name "Ray Randall." Edwards, mistakenly believing appellant was Ray Randall, accepted the check as payment for an oil change and lube job performed on a gray Hudson automobile. Edwards gave appellant the money difference between the lubrication bill and the amount of the check.

On the following day appellant again visited the White Eagle service station where he procured gas for the gray Hudson automobile and gave Edwards another check (People's Exhibit No. 2) drawn by appellant on the First Western Bank and Trust Company, Susanville, California, made payable to Ray Randall and endorsed on the back with the name "Ray Randall," for the amount of $36. Edwards, still operating under a mistaken belief as to appellant's identity, gave appellant change for the difference in the amount of gasoline purchased and the amount of the check. The two checks were forwarded to the bank for deposit and returned marked "cannot locate account." Mr. Fincher, the owner of the White Eagle service station, has never received payment on the $32 check cashed by appellant on or about February 22, 1957.

During the month of January and part of February appellant helped Ray Randall deliver and collect Bee newspaper subscriptions. Appellant on occasion was given authority by Randall to endorse Randall's name on the back of checks for the purpose of purchasing groceries for the Randall family. Appellant also had authority to procure gasoline on credit by signing Randall's name to such credit receipts. Appellant was not authorized by Randall to endorse or cash People's Exhibits Nos. 1 or 2. Appellant at no time mentioned said checks to Randall, nor did Randall receive any money obtained by appellant from the issuance of said checks.

In November, 1957, Officer Delbert L. Gorbet of the Susanville Police Department flew to Fresno, California, to take appellant into custody. On the return trip Officer Gorbet showed appellant People's Exhibit No. 1 and asked appellant if he had written the check. Appellant responded that he had written People's Exhibit No. 1. Sometime thereafter, while in Susanville, appellant was asked by Officer Elerick if appellant thought People's Exhibits 1 and 2 were in his handwriting. Appellant responded that the checks were not in his handwriting and that the officer could ask appellant's wife and she would verify it.

It was ascertained during the trial by expert testimony that the endorsement on the back of People's Exhibit 1 was in appellant's handwriting and not Ray Randall's.

The appellant did not testify during the trial nor did he introduce any witnesses in his behalf, but limited his defense to the cross-examination of the prosecution's witnesses.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment of conviction. There is no merit in this contention.

[2] Appellant argues that the evidence discloses that he had authority to sign Randall's name to checks and therefore he could not be guilty of forging an endorsement. While the evidence disclosed that the appellant had an implied authority to sign checks received in the course of appellant's business and that Randall or his wife gave appellant authority to sign Randall's name to certain specific checks, there was no authority to sign the check in question. It was not a check received in the course of business nor was it a check for which specific authority was given. Even if it can be said that appellant had authority in certain instances this authority would not exonerate him where it was exceeded. See People v. Caldwell, 55 Cal.App.2d 238, 130 P.2d 495; 38 C.J.S. Forgery § 8.

Appellant contends also that the verdict of the jury is so uncertain and ambiguous as to warrant a reversal. The information charged appellant with forgery with intent to defraud Merl H. Fincher and/or Ray Randall. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty as charged. Appellant contends that since there was no evidence from which an inference of intent to defraud Randall may be drawn, the verdict is void for uncertainty. Appellant argues that the check was never intended for Randall, that he owed Randall no money and that Randall did not see it until after it was passed.

[3] It may be that the evidence does not disclose an intent to defraud Randall, but this would not require a reversal of the judgment because there is ample evidence that appellant intended to defraud Fincher, the owner of the service station. In People v. Ruiz, 103 Cal.App.2d 146, 229 P.2d 73, it was held that failure of proof as to intent to defraud one person named in the information was immaterial where there was proof to sustain the finding as to the others. The court said at page 149 of 103 Cal. App.2d, at page 74 of 229 P.2d:

"The evidence was thus sufficient to establish that the check was forged and uttered by defendant with intent to cheat and defraud Eastern Cabinet and Furniture Company and Bank of America. The fact that the evidence did not establish that defendant intended to cheat and defraud Aurora Romero, who was named in the information as one of the persons he intended to cheat, is immaterial."

[4] The verdict followed the form of the information. The appellant was represented by counsel at all stages of the proceedings. Neither appellant nor his attorney demurred to the information nor did they move to dismiss the information. The appellant failed to make any attempt to perfect the alleged possible defect in the pleading. If it be deemed that the information was uncertain on account of the use of the term "and/or," that defect was waived by appellant's failure to demur. People v. Pryor, 17 Cal.App.2d 147, 61 P.2d 773; People v. Schoeller, 96 Cal.App.2d 61, 214 P.2d 565; People v. Waid, 127 Cal.App.2d 614, 274 P.2d 217; People v. Murphy, 17 Cal.App.2d 575, 62 P.2d 592; People v. Yant, 26 Cal. App.2d 725, 80 P.2d 506.

[5] While it is true that our courts have on occasion criticized the use of the term "and/or" in pleadings, we do not believe that appellant suffered any prejudice in the instant case because of the form of the information or the verdict.

[6] Appellant next contends that the court erred in giving the following instruction:

"The law only requires that you find as a fact either that the defendant falsely forged an indorsement knowing the same to be forged with intent to prejudice, damage, or defraud another, or, that the defendant attempted to pass as true and genuine a check bearing a forged indorsement, knowing the same to be forged with intent to prejudice, damage, or defraud another, to arrive at a verdict of guilty.

"However, before bringing in a verdict of guilty you must all be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that the defendant committed the crime of forgery in one or the other of the two ways heretofore just enumerated."

We do not believe that the court committed error in giving this instruction, which is in the language of CALJIC 401-B.

It should be noted that pleading the offense of forgery in the conjunctive, as was done in the instant matter, has met with approval by our courts. People v. Keene, 128 Cal.App.2d 520, 275 P.2d 804; People v. McDonald, 16 Cal.App.2d 687, 61 P.2d 66. Although such pleading charges appellant with doing a series of acts, such allegations allege the single offense of forgery and is therefore proper. People v. Keene, supra.

In the case of People v. Mitchell, 92 Cal. 590, 28 P. 597, 788, the appellant was charged in the information with making and forging a certain check and with uttering and publishing and passing said forged check. The lower court instructed the jury that it was their duty to convict the appellant if the evidence sufficiently disclosed there was a forgery of the check or an uttering and passing of the check. The court held that the instruction was proper if the two elements of the charge had been properly pleaded.

In the case of People v. Pauli, 58 Cal.App. 594, 209 P. 88, the appellant was charged in the information with the making, forging and uttering of a false check. The appellant requested an instruction to the jury to acquit the appellant if they should find that he made and forged said check but did not utter same. The court held that the lower tribunal properly refused appellant's instruction since the commission of either of said acts constituted a crime; hence, the instruction sought by appellant was contra to the law.

[7] The final and most serious contention of appellant is that the district attorney committed prejudicial error by introducing in evidence, for the limited purpose of showing the handwriting of the appellant, a series of checks admittedly forged by the appellant and a letter written by the appellant when he was incarcerated in Preston. Appellant's counsel offered to stipulate that the exemplars were written by the defendant. The offer was refused. The district attorney then proceeded to offer in evidence 10 checks, allegedly forged by appellant in Fresno in 1949, as exemplars of appellant's handwriting. Although appellant's counsel pointed out that on each of these checks the word "Forged" was written in red and objected that the introduction of the checks was highly prejudicial, the court permitted their introduction in evidence and admonished the jury as follows:

"I will admonish the jury at this time that these checks are being offered not as evidence of this crime directly, or the commission of any other offense, but are only being offered for the limited purpose of giving exemplars of the handwriting in this trial."

While the district attorney was not required to accept appellant's stipulation that the exemplars were written by him, we believe it was highly improper for the district attorney to introduce in evidence the entire check with the word "Forgery." It would have been a simple matter to have made use of the signatures on the checks as exemplars, without permitting the jurors to see the entire check. We can only conclude that the district attorney, in proceeding as he did, desired to get before the jury the fact of these earlier forgeries by appellant. We doubt that the admonition of the court could erase the effect of these checks upon the jury, and were the case a close one on the evidence we would be constrained to hold that the manner in which the 10 checks were introduced was so prejudicial as to require a reversal of the judgment. However, a careful study of the entire record convinces us that the evidence of appellant's guilt was so strong that we cannot say that the improper conduct of the district attorney resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Therefore, bearing in mind the provisions of section 4½ of Article VI of our state Constitution we conclude that no miscarriage of justice has resulted.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

SHINN, Presiding Justice.

In a jury trial, William Harold Lane was convicted of the second degree murder of Casimir Buda. A separate trial was held on Lane's plea of not guilty by reason of insanity; the jury found that defendant was sane at the time the offense was committed. Lane made a motion for new trial, which was denied. Probation was likewise denied, and defendant was sentenced to state prison for the term prescribed by law. Lane appeals from the judgment.

The conviction was based upon evidence of the following facts. Defendant and Buda were patients in the Krueger Sanitarium in Lancaster, which houses about sixty men suffering from tuberculosis. The patients live in cabins; near the cabins is a recreational area provided with tables and chairs. One of the patients, Manuel Carpio, was walking across the recreational area shortly after noon on August 2, 1956. He looked up and noticed Buda on the ground in a half-seated position about 75 feet away from him; Buda was attempting to lift himself up by his hands. Defendant was standing about 5 or 6 feet in front of Buda, whose back was toward Carpio; Lane was holding an ax. Buda took a handkerchief out of his pocket, wiped his forehead, then backed up as defendant followed him. A moment later, defendant walked around a nearby building. Lane was then seen entering his cabin by Paul Mikes, who was also a patient. Defendant was carrying an ax. Mikes was shown a hatchet by the deputy district attorney and stated that it was the same one he had seen in defendant's hand.

Alvin Krueger, manager of the sanitarium, was summoned by Carpio. Krueger assisted Buda to his office and telephoned for an ambulance. Buda was in a state of shock and was bleeding from several lacerations on his head. Krueger searched Buda's clothing, but found no weapons. Shortly thereafter, Krueger had a conversation with defendant outside the office. When asked by Krueger what had happened, Lane said: "Well, I got him; I got him, he got what was coming to him." Krueger attempted to question him further, but defendant replied: "I got my rights; I got my rights, I don't have to say anything."

F. W. Dornberger, a Los Angeles County sheriff's deputy, arrived at the sanitarium at 1 o'clock. Someone handed him an ax that was wrapped in a piece of blue flannel; he examined the ax and the wrapping for blood stains, but found no traces of blood. The hatchet had been retrieved from defendant's cabin by a patient named Taffin-

der. Taffinder testified that he went to Lane's cabin and found the ax resting against his bedside table. He wrapped it in a pajama top and took it to the office. There was no blood on the ax when he saw it in the cabin. He identified an ax shown him by the prosecutor as the one he gave to Officer Dornberger.

After examining the ax, Dornberger went to the recreational area and discovered blood stains on the ground about 5 or 6 feet away from a table and some chairs; a trail of blood led back to the office. Dornberger then had a conversation with defendant. He asked Lane what had happened and Lane replied that he had an argument with Buda over a woman. When asked where the argument took place, defendant said "Over there," but did not indicate any particular place. In response to further questioning, Lane said: "I hit him with a hatchet, it was self-defense, and he pulled a knife on me."

Defendant was arrested and taken to the sheriff's station, where he was questioned later that afternoon by H. A. Waldrip, who was one of the investigating officers in the case. When asked whether he had struck Buda, defendant replied that he did not want to talk and that he would only talk to the district attorney. Buda died August 11th. Waldrip had another conversation with defendant on the following day. The officer asked Lane if he killed Buda and defendant again answered that he did not want to talk.

An autopsy was performed on the body of Casimir Buda shortly after his death. Dr. Chapman, the autopsy surgeon, testified that death was caused by a skull fracture, with cerebral laceration and hemorrhage. In the doctor's opinion, the fracture was probably caused by a blow struck by a hard object; the ax identified by Mikes and Taffinder could have produced the injury. On cross-examination, Chapman admitted that Buda could possibly have struck his head against a hard object, though that was very unlikely. The doctor also admitted that Buda had a collapsed lung and his life expectancy was poor.

Defendant testified in his own behalf that he did not know Casimir Buda and had never heard of him. On August 2nd he had breakfast in the mess hall at 8 a. m. He took a short walk, then returned to his cabin and read a newspaper and a magazine. Around 10 o'clock, he "blacked out" and did not recover consciousness until sometime in the afternoon, when he found himself sitting in a police car. He had suffered previous blackouts, the last one occurring in 1954 at another sanitarium. He did not tell anyone about losing consciousness on August 2nd. Lane denied having a conversation with Officer Dornberger at the sanitarium and denied having met Officer Waldrup. He did not talk to Krueger and did not tell him he hit Buda with an ax.

As mentioned earlier, defendant was convicted of murdering Buda and the jury determined the offense to be murder of the second degree. At the commencement of the sanity proceeding, Lane's attorney moved that the matter be heard by a different jury upon the ground that the jurors were prejudiced against his client and could not try the question fairly; the motion was denied by the court.

The evidence at the sanity trial consisted of the testimony of Lane, of Krueger, who was called as a defense witness, and of Doctors Smith, Olsen and McGinnis, three psychiatrists who had been appointed by the court to examine defendant. It was stipulated that the jury might also consider the evidence introduced with respect to the criminal charge.

Krueger testified that Lane had lived in the sanitarium for a year prior to August 2, 1956. He had spoken to defendant on several occasions and had observed his conduct. In his opinion, Lane had the capacity to distinguish between right and wrong on the date of the offense. Defendant was bitter and resentful toward everyone because of his confinement in a sanitarium. On one occasion, he heard Lane say: "When I am emperor of this universe, I am going to change all of these things." Defendant kept a club and a piece of iron pipe on his bedside table; he told Krueger that he did so for protection.

Lane testified that he had been suffering from tuberculosis since 1930 and had spent considerable time in various sanitariums; Carpio and Mikes appeared as witnesses for the People because they hated him as he was a police informer; when he was in other cities, he informed the police about "crimes in general"; he had asked his attorney to excuse one of the jurors, who was Chinese, because he had many enemies among the Chinese. Ever since childhood he had suffered from symptoms of insanity, such as having hallucinations and hearing voices. He did not tell the psychiatrists about the hallucinations but he told them about his blackouts. On cross-examination Lane was asked if he realized that it was wrong for one person to take a human life without any justification; defendant replied that it was wrong.

Dr. Smith testified that he examined defendant on two occasions while he was in custody. In the opinion of the witness, Lane's mental condition was good, although he had paranoid and schizophrenic tendencies, and he knew the difference between right and wrong on August 2, 1956. Dr. Olsen testified that he had examined Lane twice in December, 1956. In his opinion, defendant was legally sane on August 2nd, although he "deviated from the normal mentally" and was exceptionally suspicious and apt to interpret the behavior of others as hostile or unfriendly toward him. These are characteristics of a paranoid personality. Dr. McGinnis examined defendant once in October, 1956. He gave his opinion that Lane was suffering from an emotional disorder, but was legally sane both at the time of the examination and at the time he committed the offense. In the doctor's opinion, Lane had either a personality disorder with a paranoid state or was afflicted with schizophrenia of a paranoid type.

[1,2] The first contention to be considered is the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the conviction. In support of this contention, defendant urges the following points: (1) Buda had a poor life expectancy on August 2, 1956, hence his death on August 11th was probably due to tuberculosis or other natural causes; (2) No blood stains were found on the ax that was claimed to be the murder weapon; (3) Lane denied knowing Buda. The argument is without merit. The weight to be accorded to Dr. Chapman's opinion respecting the cause of death was a question for the jury. People v. Tucker, 88 Cal.App. 2d 333, 340, 198 P.2d 941. The jurors were warranted in giving credence to his testimony that Buda died as the result of being struck on the head by a hard object and that the ax defendant was seen holding could have produced the fatal injuries. The jury could reasonably infer from this testimony, together with the testimony of the other patients in the sanitarium, the evidence of Lane's statements to Krueger and to Officer Dornberger, and the evidence of his failure to deny the commission of the crime when questioned by Officer Waldrip, that defendant was guilty of murdering Buda. Lane's denials of guilt merely created a conflict in the evidence, which was resolved against him by the triers of fact. People v. Newland, 15 Cal.2d 678, 104 P.2d 778.

[3,4] The remaining contention to be considered is the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that defendant was legally sane at the time of the offense. The matter was properly submitted to the same jury which tried the criminal charge. Penal Code, § 1026. Under well-established rules, which we may not question, the jury had to determine whether Lane was suffering from such "a defect of reason, from disease of the mind * * * as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong." People v. Wells, 33 Cal.2d 330, 350, 202 P.2d 53, 65. See, also, People v. Berry, 44 Cal.2d 426, 433, 282 P.2d 861.

[5-7] A person charged with crime is presumed to be sane until the contrary is shown by a preponderance of the evidence. People v. Hickman, 204 Cal. 470, 477, 268

P. 909, 270 P. 1117; People v. Daugherty, 40 Cal.2d 876, 901, 256 P.2d 911. And where a finding of sanity is based upon substantial evidence in the record, it may not be disturbed on an appeal. People v. Greig, 14 Cal.2d 548, 553, 95 P.2d 936. The testimony of the three psychiatrists called by the People, together with the testimony of Krueger, amply sustains the conclusion of the jury that defendant was sane at the time he committed the offense.

The judgment is affirmed.

E. Werden Conway, San Diego, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., and William E. James, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

MUSSELL, Justice.

[1,2] Appellant was charged with the wilful, unlawful and felonious possession of the narcotic marijuana in violation of section 11500 of the Health and Safety Code. He admitted two prior felony convictions charged in the information. He was found guilty by a jury of possession of narcotic, to wit, marijuana, and it was adjudged that he be punished by imprisonment in the State's prison. It is stated in appellant's notice of appeal that "he will take, appeal in forma pauperis, from the verdict of the Superior Court of San Diego county * * *." No appeal lies from a "verdict". People v. Goldstein, 136 Cal.App.2d 778, 793, 289 P.2d 581. However, appellant was acting in propria persona and notices of appeal should be liberally construed to permit, if possible, a hearing on the merits. Collins v. City & County of San Francisco, 112 Cal.App.2d 719, 722, 247 P.2d 362. We will, therefore, in the interest of justice, review the merits of defendant's appeal. People v. Robinson, 43 Cal.2d 143, 146, 271 P.2d 872.

On October 26, 1957, Champion Williams entered a room which he had previously rented to the appellant and found therein, under the seat of a chair, three packages containing marijuana. The packages were wrapped in a newspaper bearing the date October 20, 1957, which was the date on which appellant had rented the room. Williams telephoned the police and when they arrived, appellant ran from the dining room into the kitchen and attempted to leave the premises through the back door. He was placed under arrest and his room was searched by the officers. In addition to the packages found by Williams, the officers found an empty tobacco can which appellant stated that he had used to "put things in". Particles of marijuana were found in this can, in the debris removed from the pockets of the clothing worn by appellant at the time of his arrest, and in the debris removed from the pockets of clothing hanging in appellant's room. Appellant stated that no one else had worn the clothing since he had acquired it a few months previously and that it had all been cleaned several times since its acquisition. He also stated he had not used any marijuana since he "got out of the pen", where he had smoked some during his term. Appellant also claimed that he was being "framed" by his landlady, Mrs. Williams.

[3] Appellant first contends that the trial court was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in permitting the District Attorney to make inflammatory statements and prejudicial misconduct in referring to alleged actions of the appellant prior to the alleged commission of the present offense, imputing to appellant a disposition of idleness, disposition toward falsehoods and association with alleged criminals and persons of ill repute. This contention is not supported by any argument, citation of authority, or transcript reference, and will, therefore, be disregarded. People v. Serpa, 67 Cal.App.2d 327, 333, 154 P.2d 6; People v. Van De Wouwer, 91 Cal.App.2d 633, 641, 205 P.2d 693.

[4] Appellant's next contention is that the trial court and the District Attorney prejudicially erred in commenting on the evidence during the trial and before the jury. It is claimed in this connection that such conversation was at the bench and concerned a request by defense counsel for withdrawal. However, we are unable to find any reference in the transcript to such a conversation and appellant has not set forth in his brief, or otherwise, the remarks, if any, upon which he predicates error. As was said in People v. Rocha, 130 Cal.App.2d 656, 663, 279 P.2d 836, 840:

"The law is clear that 'any irregularity in the conduct of the trial court, and its possible effect on the outcome of the case, can only be considered on appeal to the extent that the facts in relation thereto are clearly set forth in the record.' 4 Cal.Jur.2d, sec. 468, p. 298. If defendant desires this point considered, it was incumbent upon him to present a supplementary record which would lay an appropriate foundation therefor."

If such a conversation took place, it was incumbent upon appellant to have it included in the record. People v. Simeone, 132 Cal.App.2d 593, 595, 282 P.2d 971.

[5] It is further argued that the court gave improper instructions to the jury. However, the instructions are not contained in the record on appeal and the correctness of instructions not incorporated in the record must be presumed and will not be reviewed on appeal. People v. Brickman, 119 Cal.App.2d 253, 264, 259 P.2d 917; People v. Denne, 141 Cal.App.2d 499, 514, 297 P.2d 451.

[6] Finally, appellant claims that the court committed prejudicial error in admitting the testimony of an officer to the effect that he had investigated a great number of cases involving possession of marijuana and in all except two of such cases, where the defendant admitted the possession of marijuana on his person, it was found in the investigation that dregs and particles of said marijuana were found in each of said cases to be in the pockets of the accused. There was no reversible error in admitting this evidence. As is said in People v. Geibel, 93 Cal.App.2d 147, 176, 208 P.2d 743, 760:

"The examination of an expert witness as to his qualifications and competency before he gives his opinion is a question of procedure which lies within the discretionary power of the trial court. Unless there is an obvious abuse of discretion an appellate tribunal will not interfere with the ruling."

The sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment in the instant case is not argued as a ground of appeal and counsel for appellant concedes that the first three contentions on appeal do not constitute reversible error. We have examined the entire record, including the reporter's transcript of the proceedings at the trial, and find no reversible error in the rulings made by the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 30, 1958.

Hearing Denied Oct. 28, 1958.

Action for judgment declaring unconstitutional zoning ordinances expressly designed to compel discontinuance of use of plaintiff's property as a decomposed granite quarry. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Caryl M. Sheldon, J., rendered judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Vallée, J., held that evidence would sustain findings that (1) plaintiff had established a lawful nonconforming use of his land prior to enactment of ordinances and (2) that use did not constitute a nuisance.

Affirmed.

1. Municipal Corporations ☞601(23)

A nonconforming use is a lawful use existing on effective date of zoning restriction and continuing after that time in nonconformance to ordinance.

2. Municipal Corporations ☞601(19)

General rule against interpretation of statute or ordinance to give it retrospective operation, and especially where vested rights are affected, is applicable to construction of zoning laws.

3. Constitutional Law ☞278(1)

Zoning ordinance which requires discontinuance forthwith of a nonconforming use existing when ordinance was adopted is a deprivation of property without due process of law, unless use is a public nuisance.

4. Declaratory Judgment ☞346

In action for judgment declaring unconstitutional zoning ordinances expressly designed to compel discontinuance of use of plaintiff's property as a decomposed granite quarry, evidence would sustain findings that (1) plaintiff had established a lawful nonconforming use of his land prior to enactment of ordinances and (2) that use did not constitute a nuisance.

5. Municipal Corporations ☞601(7)

The very nature and use of an extractive business contemplates continuance of such use of entire parcel of land as a whole, and where operation of quarry did not constitute a nuisance, and quarry had been in operation prior to adoption of zoning ordinance, ordinance could not validly limit quarrying operations to immediate area excavated at time when ordinance was passed.

6. Nuisance ☞3(5)

Operation of quarry is not a nuisance per se.

7. Municipal Corporations ☞625

Purpose or motive of city officials in passing ordinance is irrelevant to any inquiry concerning reasonableness of ordinance.

VALLÉE, Justice.

Appeal by defendants from a judgment for plaintiff permanently enjoining defendants from enforcing the provisions of two zoning ordinances expressly designed to compel the discontinuance of the use of plaintiff's property as a decomposed granite quarry. The question is the validity, as applied to plaintiff's operations, of provisions of zoning ordinances of the city of Monterey Park.

Plaintiff, since 1937, has been the owner of a large tract of land in the city of Monterey Park, called the city, of which a portion comprising about 70 acres is now and since 1944 has been used as a site for mining decomposed granite. The property is located on the southeast boundary of the city limits. Substantially throughout its entire area the property is comprised of decomposed granite. The structures on the land used in connection with the operation consist of a roofed screening plant and several small buildings, all of which were on the land prior to 1950.

Contiguous to the northeasterly portion of plaintiff's property is a rifle range used by the city's police. On the east boundary line and just over the city boundary is a 10-acre nursery. Traversing the easterly portion in the city are high tension lead-in wires and poles of the Edison Company leading to the company's substation located immediately adjacent to plaintiff's property to the south, but separated by a street known as Potrero Grande. The Edison Company substation occupies about 80 acres. Immediately to the south of the Edison Company property is a dump and salvage operation, established in 1949; and in this same area to the southwest is a gravel pit and dump, which operation began in 1953. West of plaintiff's property is a residential area of single family dwellings which developed during the years 1947 to 1954. Contiguous to the property there is a ready-mix concrete plant. To the southeast there is a 145-acre cemetery, established about 1950.

The property was purchased by plaintiff in 1937. From that time until early in 1944 it was used exclusively for grazing purposes. The first zoning ordinance passed by the city was ordinance 349, approved March 12, 1938, which zoned plaintiff's property "R-5" (residential-agricultural). Early in 1944 plaintiff leased the property to Dwain O'Neal for the purpose of mining decomposed granite under a contract he had with the Maywood Air Services Supply Depot to furnish them with base material. The Board of Adjustments of the city granted O'Neal a variance on July 17, 1944 permitting the processing and removal of decomposed granite from the property. This was followed early in 1945 by another lease of the property to Bryce for one year for mining decomposed granite under a similar variance granted the lessee by the city's Board of Adjustments on April 10, 1945.

On June 25, 1945 the city enacted ordinance 448 repealing the 1938 ordinance. Plaintiff's property was again zoned "R-5"; however, under section 11(a) it was provided that "Any existing use of any building, structure or premises at the time this ordinance or any amendment thereto becomes effective may be continued, providing such existing use is not in violation of any other ordinance or law."

At the expiration of the year's lease Bryce continued operating the quarry on a month-to-month basis. Plaintiff returned from the service about September 1945 and continued the same type operation under the name "McCaslin Materials Company."

Some time in 1947 plaintiff was approached by the then mayor of the city, three councilmen, and an official of the Edison Company with respect to the sale of a portion of his land to the Edison Company for the erection of an electrical substation. Plaintiff advised them that as his property was zoned residential-agricultural, the locating of a substation would require rezoning and he could agree to sell some of the land to the Edison Company only if the property were zoned industrial. It was thought that the Edison Company's improvements would be advantageous to the city in realization of about $15,000 a year in taxes therefrom. At the mayor's suggestion plaintiff retained an industrial real estate salesman who worked with the city attorney in drafting an industrial ordinance.

On March 24, 1947 the city council enacted ordinance 477 amending the 1945 ordinance (448) creating, among other things, an industrial district zone which included all but a 200-foot strip on the westerly side of plaintiff's property. Plaintiff then sold about six acres to the Edison Company, in addition to two and a fraction acres previously granted as rights of way; and the electrical substation was built.

On December 8, 1947 an urgency ordinance (494) was adopted limiting the operation of gravel pits and quarries to daylight hours and declaring the operation of a gravel pit or quarry then operating within the city on Sunday and late and unusual hours of the night constituted a nuisance. Substantially the same type ordinance (524) was adopted November 8, 1948.

Effective January 19, 1950 the city council adopted a city-wide zoning ordinance (556), as a result of which plaintiff's property was rezoned from industrial to residential-agricultural. This ordinance eliminated all reference to industrial zones within the city and substituted therefor certain limited "M-1" zones for light manufacturing. Section 9220 provided for continuance of nonconforming buildings and for continuance of their use for a period of their normal life, but in no event less than 20 years from their original construction. Section 9221 provided for the continuance for not more than two years of nonconforming uses of land where no structure thereon is employed therefor,<sup>1</sup> and that no nonconforming use of land should be expanded or extended on the same property. Section 9226<sup>2</sup> declared the production and development of natural resources to be a special use permitted in any zone on condition that a permit for the location and operation thereof be obtained under the procedure set forth in the chapter relating to variances. Ordinance 556 is one of the two ordinances the validity of which is attacked by plaintiff as applied to him.

Plaintiff was not aware of this rezoning of his property to residential-agricultural until some time in 1953. On February 11, 1954 he filed an application for a special use permit and on March 4, 1954 the application was heard and denied by the city planning commission. On April 12, 1954 the city council denied plaintiff's application for the permit and the action of the planning commission was affirmed.

Despite these actions of the planning commission and the city council in denying the special use permit, during the entire period of plaintiff's mining operations he was issued each year a business license by the city for the operation of the gravel pit, including the calendar year 1956.

On January 9, 1956 sections 9221 and 9226 of ordinance 556 were amended by ordinance 727. Ordinance 727 is entitled: "An Ordinance of the City Council of the City of Monterey Park Amending Certain Sections of the Monterey Park Municipal Code Relating to the Excavation and Processing of Decomposed Granite, Sand, Rock and Gravel." It expressly prohibits the expansion or extension of nonconforming use of land to the same or adjoining property, limits the mining of decomposed granite under special use permits status to M-1 and M-2 zones only, provides for discontinuance of existing nonconforming uses within 60 days after the date such use becomes nonconforming, and declares that such mining operations in any zone other than M-1 and M-2 zones shall constitute a public nuisance.<sup>3</sup>

1. There was no provision relating to the use of land where structures thereon were employed therefor, as in the present case.
2. Section 9226 in pertinent part reads: "Location and operation of all of the following, and all matters directly related thereto, are declared to be special uses permitted in any Zone provided and on condition that a permit for the location and operation thereof shall be granted and obtained under the procedure set forth in this Chapter relating to variances. This declaration is based on the fact that all of the uses here enumerated possess characteristics of such unique and special forms as to make impractical their being included automatically in any classes of use as set forth in the various zones herein defined. * * *

"6. Natural resources, production and development of, together with necessary buildings, apparatus or appurtenances incident thereto."

3. Pertinent parts of ordinance 727 are:
 "Section 9221. Non-conforming Uses.
 (a) The non-conforming use of land where no structure thereon is employed

The effect of the amending ordinance was to declare plaintiff's further operation of the quarry a public nuisance 60 days after its passage.<sup>4</sup>

Plaintiff filed this action praying that ordinances 556 and 727 be declared unconstitutional and void as applied to him, and that their enforcement be enjoined. The city filed a cross-complaint praying that the ordinances be declared constitutional; that plaintiff be enjoined from using the land for mining decomposed granite; and that such use be declared a nuisance.

The trial court found: ordinance 727 "was directed specifically at plaintiff's operations and business and at no other business"; use of the property by plaintiff for mining decomposed granite is a permitted use under ordinance 477 which zoned the property "industrial" in 1947; and such use does not constitute a public nuisance. The court concluded that ordinances 556 and 727 are unconstitutional as applied to plaintiff in that they prohibit the continuance of the mining operations and business which existed at the time they were passed, thereby taking from plaintiff a valuable property right without the payment of compensation. Judgment was in favor of plaintiff, and defendants were permanently enjoined from enforcing or attempting to enforce the ordinances as to him. Defendants appeal.

Defendants contend that ordinance 556 and amendatory ordinance 727, requiring the mandatory discontinuance of the non-conforming use after a period of 60 days, constitute a reasonable exercise of the police power under the facts and that such legislation is a valid exercise of such power as applied to plaintiff.

Plaintiff contends the ordinances may not be constitutionally applied to him so as to prohibit the continuance of his lawful business which was in existence at the time the ordinances were enacted.

"1. That no non-conforming use of land shall in any way be expanded or extended either on the same or adjoining property.

"2. That if the non-conforming use of land existing at the time this Chapter became effective is thereafter discontinued or changed, any future use of such land shall be in conformity with the provisions of this Chapter.

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Section or of Section 9220, the non-conforming use of land in any zone other than an M-1 Zone or an M-2 Zone for the excavation, extracting, production or processing of decomposed granite, sand, rock or gravel shall be discontinued and completely terminated within sixty days after the date such use becomes non-conforming; and the use of land for the excavation, extracting, production or processing of decomposed granite, sand, rock or gravel in any zone other than an M-1 Zone or an M-2 Zone is hereby found and declared to be a public nuisance.

Natural resources, exploration, production and development of, together with necessary buildings, apparatus or appurtenances incident thereto; provided, however, that the excavation, extracting, production, or processing of decomposed granite, sand, rock or gravel shall not be permitted in any zone other than in an M-1 Zone or M-2 Zone, and no such permit shall be issued or granted therefor in any zone other than an M-1 Zone or an M-2 Zone." (Italics added.)

4. It appears to be conceded that ordinance 727 was expressly aimed at plaintiff's quarrying operations.

[1-3] The use of plaintiff's property for quarrying decomposed granite existed at the time ordinance 556 was enacted in 1950 and has continued at all times since. A nonconforming use is a lawful use existing on the effective date of the zoning restriction and continuing since that time in nonconformance to the ordinance. City of Los Angeles v. Gage, 127 Cal.App.2d 442, 453, 274 P.2d 34. The general rule against the interpretation of a statute or ordinance to give it a retrospective operation, especially where vested rights are affected, is applicable to the construction of zoning laws. "The rights of the users of property as those rights existed under prevailing zoning conditions are well recognized and have always been protected." Livingston Rock & Gravel Co. v. County of L. A., 43 Cal.2d 121, 127, 272 P.2d 4, 8; City of La Mesa v. Tweed & Gambrell Mill, 146 Cal.App.2d 762, 768-771, 304 P.2d 803. A zoning ordinance which requires the discontinuance forthwith of a nonconforming use existing when the ordinance was adopted is a deprivation of property without due process of law unless the use is a public nuisance.<sup>5</sup>

In Wilkins v. City of San Bernardino, 29 Cal.2d 332, at page 340, 175 P.2d 542, at page 548, Mr. Chief Justice Gibson, writing for the court, stated:

"An examination of the California decisions discloses that the cases in which zoning ordinances have been held invalid and unreasonable as applied to particular property fall roughly into four categories: 1. Where the zoning ordinance attempts to exclude and prohibit existing and established uses or businesses that are not nuisances. [Citations.] 2. Where the restrictions create a monopoly. [Citations.]

4. Where a small parcel is restricted and given less rights than the surrounding property, as where a lot in the center of a business or commercial district is limited to use for residential purposes, thereby creating an 'island' in the middle of a larger area devoted to other uses."

It is held that when a sand and gravel pit has been in operation prior to the passage of a zoning ordinance and continuously thereafter, a nonconforming use existed and operation of the pit cannot be enjoined. Town of North Hempstead v. De Pasquale Bros., 280 App.Div. 991, 116 N.Y.S.2d 564; Town of Somers v. Camarco, Sup., 126 N.Y.S.2d 154, 156; Marple Township v. Tarquinio, 81 Pa.Dist. & Co.R. 210, 38 Del.Co. 362.

Plaintiff had a vested property right in the use of his property as a quarry of decomposed granite of which he could not be constitutionally deprived without due process of law. The legislation in question does not attempt to regulate plaintiff's operations but prohibits the continuance of the prior nonconforming use altogether. Such legislation can be sustained under the police power only if it is reasonably related to the object sought to be accomplished and is not arbitrary and discriminatory in its application to plaintiff. 35 Cal.Jur. 2d 70, § 247.

Applying the above principles to the present case, the trial court correctly found the legislation in question constitutes an unwarranted and arbitrary interference with plaintiff's right to carry on a lawful business and that "Ordinance No. 727 was adopted for the purpose of discriminating against plaintiff and compelling the discontinuance of plaintiff's business; * * * and does in fact discriminate against plaintiff by requiring the discontinuance of his business and operations while not requiring discontinuance of any other business based upon the extraction of natural resources;" and "purports to take from plaintiff a valuable property right inherent in the ownership of such property." As held by the trial court, ordinances 556 and 727 are invalid as applied to plaintiff.

A further contention of defendants is that it has been the continued policy of the city to classify plaintiff's property as residential-agricultural from 1938 to the present time, except for the 21 months during the time ordinance 477 classified the major part of it as industrial; and since plaintiff has never applied for rezoning of the property or appealed from the denial of his application for a special use permit by the planning commission and city council, his continued use of the property for mining decomposed granite has been illegal and a nuisance.

[4] There is substantial evidence in the record to support the trial court's findings to the effect that (1) plaintiff had established a lawful nonconforming use of his land prior to enactment of ordinances 556 and 727 and (2) the conduct of the operation does not constitute a nuisance. The record shows that the nonconforming use was established as early as 1944. The zoning ordinance of June 1945 (448) provided for the continuance of such nonconforming use. There was no abandonment or interruption in the mining operations from the time the second lessee commenced operations early in 1945 until the present. Thus, when most of the land was zoned from residential-agricultural to industrial for a period of 21 months in 1947 by ordinance 477 and then rezoned to residential-agricultural in 1950 under the comprehensive zoning ordinance which required a special use permit for production and development of natural resources on one's land in any zone, plaintiff's nonconforming use was unaffected by denial of a permit to continue operating under that ordinance. Having established the nonconforming use, he was entitled to continue his operations as a matter of right. He was not required to obtain a special use permit.

[5] Defendants contend the trial court erred in failing to make a finding as to the scope and limitation of plaintiff's nonconforming use. They complain that the court ignored the provision of section 9221 of ordinance 556, "[T]hat no non-conforming use of land shall in any way be expanded or extended either on the same or adjoining property." Defendants assert that by such provision plaintiff was limited to excavating that portion of the property already excavated. We do not agree. The very nature and use of an extractive business contemplates the continuance of such use of the entire parcel of land as a whole, without limitation or restriction to the immediate area excavated at the time the ordinance was passed. A mineral extractive operation is susceptible of use and has value only in the place where the resources are found, and once the minerals are extracted it cannot again be used for that purpose. "Quarry property is generally a one-use property. The rock must be quarried at the site where it exists, or not at all. An absolute prohibition, therefore, practically amounts to a taking of the property since it denies the owner the right to engage in the only business for which the land is fitted." Morton v. Superior Court, 124 Cal.App.2d 577, 582, 269 P.2d 81, 85, 47 A.L.R.2d 478; Lockard v. City of Los Angeles, 33 Cal.2d 453, 467, 202 P.2d 38, 7 A.L.R.2d 990; Trans-Oceanic Oil Corp. v. City of Santa Barbara, 85 Cal.App.2d 776, 789, 194 P.2d 148; Wheeler v. Gregg, 90 Cal.App.2d 348, 364-365, 203 P.2d 37; Borough of Cheswick v. Bechman, 352 Pa. 79, 42 A.2d 60; Lamb v. A. D. McKee, Inc., 10 N.J.Misc. 647, 160 A. 563; Village of Terrace Park v. Errett, 6 Cir., 12 F.2d 240, 243. An entire tract is generally regarded as within the exemption of an existing nonconforming use, although the entire tract is not so used at the time of the passage or effective date of the zoning law. 58 Am.Jur. 1023, § 151. While it is true that the area already excavated up to the time of trial contained 150,000 to 200,000 tons yet to be mined, to hold that plaintiff's operations must be confined to extracting what remains in that area only would mean processing that portion of the land below the street level. This would result in the particular area taking on the aspect of an unsightly pit which could serve no useful future purpose other than perhaps a dump. The property is hilly. Plaintiff testified that his intention is to remove the material so as to bring the grade down in conformity with existing street levels, which is consonant with the highest and best use of the land for subdivision purposes. The evidence shows plaintiff has conducted his operations in such a way as to create a future beneficial use of the land for this purpose. Defendants' own witness, a licensed real estate broker, testified: "The grading which has already taken place has, I believe helped it, in that the grading, in my opinion, has not been a—and to Mr. McCaslin's credit—has not been haphazard operation; instead of a pit kind of operation he have [sic] had an operation which has covered some of that area and it in effect leveled it, and I think that helps for subdivision purposes." Of course, plaintiff's nonconforming use of the property in question cannot be expanded or extended to a separate parcel, called Parcel 2 in the record, or to the 200-foot buffer area along the westerly end of the property in question adjacent to the residential area. To this extent the ordinance prohibiting the expansion or extension of nonconforming use to "the same or adjoining property" is applicable to plaintiff.

[6] The ordinances in question cannot find support in the legislative power to prohibit a nuisance. It is established law in this state that the business of excavating rock and gravel is a lawful and useful operation. Wheeler v. Gregg, 90 Cal.App.2d 348, 369, 203 P.2d 37. The operation of a quarry is not a nuisance per se. Morton v.

Superior Court, 124 Cal.App.2d 577, 581, 269 P.2d 81, 47 A.L.R.2d 478. The trial judge, in addition to viewing the premises and plaintiff's operation thereon, heard extensive evidence as to whether plaintiff's quarrying operations constituted a nuisance in fact, an issue raised by defendants' pleadings. He found on substantial evidence that plaintiff's operations "do not create dust, dirt, smoke, noise or vibrations to a degree sufficient to impair the public health, safety, morals or general welfare or to a degree sufficient to constitute a public nuisance"; plaintiff's use of his property and the operations "have never impaired and do not now impair the public health, safety, morals or general welfare"; and the operations "have never constituted and do not now constitute a public nuisance." Defendants say these findings are "contrary to the preponderance of the evidence." While much of the testimony was conflicting, the evidence most favorable to respondent must be accepted. The evidence is sufficient to support the finding that the operation of the quarry was not a nuisance, and the trial court was justified in adhering to the rule that in a proper case it will not enjoin the conduct of an entire business operation where it is not a nuisance per se. We are bound by the oft-repeated rule that findings supported by substantial evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

[7] The court excluded testimony of two members of the city council proffered by defendants with respect to their purposes and motives in voting for passage of ordinances 556 and 727. Defendants assert error. There was no error. The purpose or motive of the city officials in passing an ordinance is irrelevant to any inquiry concerning the reasonableness of the ordinance. Sunny Slope Water Co. v. City of Pasadena, 1 Cal.2d 87, 99, 33 P.2d 672.

Allan L. Leonard, Los Angeles, for respondent.

By his complaint in this action, plaintiff, hereinafter called Leonard, sought judgment against the defendant for breach of a contract to pay a commission upon the sale of real estate. Defendant appeals from the judgment of the trial court awarding plaintiff $8,000 as damages for breach of the alleged contract.

By his complaint the plaintiff alleges that on February 29, 1956, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract in writing whereby the defendant granted to the plaintiff (a licensed real estate broker) the exclusive right to sell certain property owned by the defendant, for a period expiring on March 22, 1956, at a price of $243,000. By the terms of the contract, defendant agreed to pay a certain agreed percentage of the selling price "if said property is sold on the above terms or any other terms acceptable to me while this contract is in force, or if sold within 90 days after its termination to anyone whose name is registered with me in writing as of the termination date." (Italics ours.) That on March 7, 1956, the plaintiff, in writing, registered with the defendant the name of Morgan Adams as a person to whom he had submitted the property. That on June 7, 1956, the defendant sold the subject property to said Adams for the sum of $220,000 and that plaintiff's "earned commission" was in the sum of $8,000. That plaintiff had done and performed every act and thing to be performed by him under the terms of the contract. That defendant had failed and refused to pay to the plaintiff the said sum of $8,000 or any part thereof.

By his answer the defendant admitted the execution of the contract; admitted that the plaintiff had in writing designated Adams as a person to whom the property had been submitted; admitted the sale of the property to Adams; denied that the plaintiff's "earned commission" was in the sum of $8,000 and denied that the plaintiff had performed the terms of the contract upon his part to be performed.

By one of the affirmative defenses pleaded, the defendant alleged that said Adams was not a prospective purchaser of the property in question at the time of the termination of plaintiff's exclusive right to sell and that the sale to Adams was negotiated by and through a real estate broker other than the plaintiff and that plaintiff "did no act, nor performed any services which in any way brought about, induced, influenced or caused" the offer of Adams to purchase said property or the sale of said property to Adams.

The court found the existence of the contract; found further that plaintiff had made contact with one Morgan Adams "in respect of the possible purchase by the said Adams of the said real property; that plaintiff under date of March 7th, 1956, and on March 22nd, 1956 by reference to the said letter of March 7th, 1956, registered with defendant in writing the name of Morgan Adams (among others) as a prospective purchaser." The court further found that defendant had sold the property to Adams on June 7, 1956 (within the 90 day period after the expiration of plaintiff's exclusive right) through the agency of real estate brokers other than the plaintiff for the sum of $220,000. The court expressly refused to find upon any other issues tendered by the pleadings.

[1] As a conclusion of law from the facts, the court concluded that the plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $8,000 and the plaintiff was entitled to judgment in that amount together with interest at seven per cent per annum from June 7, 1956.<sup>1</sup>

[2] We have reached the conclusion that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment and that the court erred in failing to find upon the issues tendered upon the allegations of the complaint which were denied by the answer that plaintiff had performed all of the terms and conditions of the contract on his part to be performed, and the issues tendered by the affirmative defense which we have noted above.

[3] Plaintiff bases his right to recover upon that portion of the contract which we have heretofore italicized and which required the payment of commission to him if the property should be sold to any person whose name he had registered with the defendant in writing prior to the termination date of the contract and if said sale be made within 90 days after the termination date. This language in the contract implies an obligation on the part of the broker to do something more than merely contact the

1. The court further concluded that the defendant had breached his contract with the plaintiff and had thereby prevented plaintiff from performing his contract.

This conclusion could not be supported by the findings and was beyond the issues tendered by the complaint and is purely surplusage.

prospect and list his name with the owner. In order that he may be entitled to a commission under the terms of the contract he must allege and show, and by his evidence prove that his efforts were a procuring or efficient cause of the subsequent sale. Wright & Kimbrough v. Dewees, 52 Cal. App. 42, 197 P. 957; Hobson v. Hunt, 59 Cal.App. 679, 211 P. 242; Mills v. Hunter, 103 Cal.App.2d 352, at pages 358, 360, 229 P.2d 456, at pages 459, 461.

The facts found by the court fall far short of providing a basis for the judgment. Although the issue was directly tendered by the answer as well as by the denied allegations of the complaint, there is no finding that any act of the plaintiff was a "procuring or efficient cause" of the sale eventually made by the defendant.

The judgment is reversed.

That heroin, of which defendant was convicted of unlawfully possessing, had been procured by officer by ordering defendant to open her mouth violated none of her constitutional rights, where there was no force or violence or brutal or shocking conduct used in causing defendant to emit heroin she had in her mouth and she was not choked but was merely asked to open her mouth. West's Ann.Health & Safety Code, § 11500.

VALLÉE, Justice.

In a nonjury trial defendant was convicted of the unlawful possession of heroin. Health & Safety Code, § 11500. Her only contention is that after she was placed under arrest, the officers violated her constitutional rights in ordering her to open her mouth and to expel contraband therefrom.

Defendant was placed under arrest at about 12:20 p. m. on July 9, 1957 by Robert Nichols, a Deputy Sheriff. Nichols summoned Katherine Carruth, a female Deputy Sheriff, to the place where the arrest was made. Deputy Carruth testified: "When I arrived at the location, Sergeant Howell requested my searching Mrs. Zamora for the possibility of finding narcotics. I accompanied her to the rear of the house—I believe it is a bedroom at the rear of the home—and while I searched her, I asked her to open her mouth, and she appeared to gag. I noticed a white substance appear in her mouth. I held my hand just below her chin. She bent her head forward and spit an object into my hand."

Officer Carruth called Nichols into the room and gave him the object. Nichols said to defendant, "What is this?" Defendant replied, "Heroin." The object contained heroin. Defendant did not testify or offer any evidence in her own behalf.

Defendant asserts the conduct of Officer Carruth comes within the principle of Rochin v. People of California, 342 U.S. 165, 72 S.Ct. 205, 96 L.Ed. 183, 25 A.L.R. 2d 1396. There is no basis for the assertion. In Rochin the conduct of the officers condemned was brutal and shocking. In the present case there was no force or violence or brutal or shocking conduct used in causing defendant to emit the object she had in her mouth. She was not choked—she was asked to open her mouth, appeared to gag, and then spat the object into the officer's hand. No constitutional right of defendant was violated. *People v. PER CURIAM.

Defendants appeal from a judgment against them in the sum of $5,500 plus attorneys' fees.

By its complaint in this action the plaintiff alleged that on June 3, 1956, the defendants delivered to the plaintiff their promissory note in the sum of $5,500 by the terms of which they promised to pay, 29 days after date, to the order of "Hollypark Realty, Trust Account," the sum of $5,500 without interest and, in case of suit, to pay an additional reasonable sum as attorneys' fees. It further alleged that by the terms of the note defendants promised to pay plaintiff the sum of $5,500 on or before July 2, 1956, without interest and that no part of said sum of $5,500 had been paid.

By their answer, the defendants denied all the allegations of the complaint and in addition thereto alleged certain special defenses including want of consideration. The details of these special defenses pleaded are not material in view of the conclusion which we have reached.

The plaintiff seeks to enforce the note pleaded as the trustee of an express trust and not as the beneficial owner and holder of the note. At the trial the plaintiff did not content itself as it might have with proof of the execution of the note and that plaintiff was the holder thereof but, in addition thereto, introduced evidence which established the following facts: The plaintiff had been employed as a real estate broker by one Westerman and his wife to sell an apartment house commonly known as 11620 South Crenshaw Boulevard, Inglewood. On June 3, 1956, the property was being shown as an "open house" by one Stein, a real estate salesman employed by the plaintiff, and on that day Stein showed the defendants through the property as well as other properties and thereafter took them to the office of the plaintiff where he prepared two instruments; the first in the form of a deposit receipt. This deposit receipt is very uncertain in its terms but the body thereof, in substance, provides as follows: That Stein, as a broker, acknowledged the receipt of "$5,500 form note" to be applied on the purchase price of $55,000 for the subject property; that the terms of sale were that the buyers were to assume existing first and second trust deeds in the approximate aggregate amount of $37,500; give their note secured by a third deed of trust in the approximate sum of $6,000 and make a cash down payment of $11,500 (this includes the $5,500 evidenced by the note).

The defendant signed an endorsement on this receipt by which they agreed to purchase the property upon the above terms. At the same time Stein drafted and the defendants signed the note sued upon. The note on its face showed it was given as a deposit upon the subject property. On the same day Stein took the original and a copy of the deposit receipt and the note to the owners and they signed endorsement on the deposit receipt agreeing to sell the property upon the terms set forth in the receipt. Stein left a copy of the deposit receipt with the sellers but retained the note. On the same day he notified defendants that the owners had accepted the offer. On the following day Stein caused to be prepared escrow instructions. He then telephoned the defendants who advised him they could not raise the money to purchase the property and that they did not intend to go through with the deal. Thereafter Stein notified the owners of defendants' repudiation of their contract and at some later date caused the owners to sign the escrow instructions. The owners did not deposit in the escrow any deed or other instrument of conveyance.

Thereafter the owners sold the subject property to third persons at a purchase price of $51,000. This sale took place after the present action was at issue.

[1] Although the defendants did not amend their answer so as to plead the fact that seller had sold the subject property and had thereby discharged defendants' obligation under the note, the evidence to this effect having been offered by the plaintiff, the issue of discharge of the obligation was clearly before the court and is determinative of the present action. Smith v. Smith, 115 Cal.App.2d 92, 99, 251 P.2d 720; Moeller v. Packard, 86 Cal.App. 459, 460, 261 P. 315; Kalmus v. Cedars of Lebanon Hosp., 132 Cal.App.2d 243, 246, 281 P.2d 872; 39 Cal.Jur.2d 456, 457.

[2] When the defendants repudiated the contract the owners had a choice of remedies which they might pursue. They might have sued for specific performance (assuming that the contract was certain enough and that the other conditions to specific performance were present). Laske v. Lampasona, 89 Cal.App.2d 284, 287-289, 200 P.2d 871. They might have treated the contract as breached and have sued the defendants for damages they suffered by reason of the breach. Backman v. Park, 157 Cal. 607, 108 P. 686; 25 Cal.Jur. 772; Civ.Code, § 3307.

[3] If they chose the first remedy the owners were obligated to be in a position to convey the property to the defendants. Kelly v. Mack, 45 Cal. 303; Smith v. Taylor, 82 Cal. 533, 541, 23 P. 217; 23 Cal. Jur. 499; 25 Cal.Jur. 772, 773.

[4] When the owners elected to sell the property to a third person they terminated the contract of purchase and no longer had the right to pursue either of the two remedies above-mentioned. By terminating the contract they terminated the defendants' obligation to pay the contract price or any part thereof. Glassell v. Coleman, 94 Cal. 260, 266-268, 29 P. 508; Yakoobian v. Johnson, 102 Cal.App. 10, 14, 282 P. 522; California Raisin Pool v. Dalian, 139 Cal. App. 343, 348, 34 P.2d 227.

[5] The note sued upon was not given in payment of the contract price but merely evidenced defendants' obligation as to a part of that contract price. A note given which evidences an antecedent or contemporaneous obligation is not payment of that obligation unless the parties expressly agree that it shall be taken in payment or the facts are such as to compel that inference. Dellapiazza v. Foley, 112 Cal. 380, 386, 44 P. 727; Woodhead Lumber Co. v. E. G. Niemann Investments, 132 Cal.App. 115, 117, 22 P.2d 252; Weger v. Rocha, 138 Cal.App. 109, 117, 32 P.2d 417; 38 Cal.Jur.2d 256-257; 40 Am.Jur. 775-777.

[6] Here the evidence clearly shows that the note was not given in payment of the obligation but only as evidence of it.

The plaintiff sued for that portion of the contract price evidenced by the note. When, however, the owners sold the subject property they terminated the obligation which the note evidenced and the note thereupon ceased to be an obligation binding upon the defendants. After the sale of the property the defendants were no longer obligated to pay the purchase price and the owners could not enforce its payment. The plaintiff has no right beyond theirs.

The evidence offered by the plaintiff having conclusively shown that, at the time of trial, the obligation sued upon had been discharged, the findings and judgment are contrary to the evidence.

The judgment is reversed with directions to enter judgment for defendants.

Action to recover value of distilled spirits removed from plaintiffs' liquor store and allegedly appropriated by defendants. The Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, Eustace Cullinan, Jr., J., entered judgment against defendants and they appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Dooling, J., held that defendants had failed to show prejudice in production of their evidence by court's irregularity in not ruling upon admissibility of deposition of alleged co-conspirator before close of trial, and admission of some hearsay testimony in an action tried by court without jury, was not prejudicial error where there was otherwise enough competent evidence to support findings.

1. Appeal and Error ⇨1043(6)

In action to recover value of goods allegedly appropriated from plaintiffs' store, admission into evidence of alleged coconspirator's deposition which was never read, corrected or signed was not prejudicial since witness' refusal to answer resulted in a deposition containing no substantial evidence against defendants.

2. Appeal and Error ⇨1043(6)

In action to recover value of goods allegedly appropriated from plaintiffs' store, failure of court in not ruling on admissibility of deposition of alleged coconspirator before close of trial resulted in irregular procedure, but there is no legal showing that defendants, under circumstances, were prejudiced in production of their evidence by such irregularity.

Morris M. Grupp, San Francisco, for appellant, Teplin.

Garry, Dreyfus, McTernan & Keller, Francis J. McTernan, Jr., San Francisco, for respondents.

DOOLING, Justice.

Defendants Daniel Teplin and Morrie Teplin appeal from a judgment against them in the sum of $17,786.11, based upon findings that appellants conspired with defendant Henry Albers to remove distilled spirits from plaintiffs' liquor store and to appropriate the same to their own use and that pursuant to said conspiracy appellants did remove and appropriate from plaintiffs' store property of the value of $17,786.11.

Henry Albers was for many years a trusted employee in the liquor stores operated by respondents and their assignors. There were two of such stores in San Francisco. In November 1954 respondents suspected that an inventory loss had occurred in their stores. An investigation led them to believe that their employee, Albers, was responsible for this loss. Albers admitted that he had taken substantial quantities of liquor from the stores in 1953 and 1954 and further stated that he had disposed of these liquors to appellants herein receiving from appellants about  $\frac{1}{3}$  of their sale value and appropriating the money so received to his own use. He gave respondents a statement in writing to this effect. Thereafter Albers gave a written statement to the police of the same character. (Both statements were hearsay as to the complicity of appellants in Albers' wrong-doing and the recital of his implication of appellants in these statements is here given solely for the purpose of clarifying the background of what followed.)

This action was thereupon commenced joining Albers, appellants, and certain others not here material, as defendants.

Albers was arrested under a charge of grand theft based upon his appropriation of such liquors and while he was under arrest on this charge his deposition was taken by respondents at the city prison on May 17, 1955. Counsel for appellants was present and representing appellants at that time. Albers refused to answer any and all questions relating to his taking of liquor from respondents' stores, or relating to the connection of appellants, if any, therewith, and refused to answer any and all questions as to the truth of the written statements above referred to. The notary, at the request of counsel for respondents, instructed Albers to answer many of these questions and he persisted in his refusal. The notary certified the proceedings before him and on June 8, 1955, at 10 a. m. proceedings were taken in open court by respondents to obtain the order of the superior court to compel the witness to answer the questions which he had refused to answer after being instructed by the notary to do so.

The witness Albers was present at that time without counsel. No one representing the appellants was in court but counsel for the respondents stated to the court at the beginning of the proceedings: "Mr. Jackson represents all of the defendants except the one in question, Henry Albers, and I spoke to Mr. Jackson this morning, and he permitted me to inform your Honor that he had been given notice but had no desire to appear."

After somewhat informal proceedings before the superior court it was suggested that the taking of Albers' deposition should be continued in the court room that same afternoon at 2 p. m. before a notary public in the absence of the judge. After some discussion Albers said: "At 2:00 o'clock, then?" The judge asked: "Will that be all right?" and Albers answered: "That will be fine."

At 2 p. m. on June 8, 1955, before a different notary Albers was again sworn and the taking of his deposition proceeded. The deposition as certified by the notary shows that "Joseph A. Jackson * * * appeared as counsel for the defendants Morrie Teplin and Daniel Teplin." It further appears therein: "It was stipulated by and between counsel for the respective parties that the said deposition shall be reported by Holmes Christian * * * and thereafter transcribed by him into typewriting, to be read to or by the said witness, who, after making such corrections therein as may be necessary, will subscribe the same.

"It was further stipulated that if this deposition has not been signed by the time of trial, provided the witness has had a reasonable opportunity to read, correct and sign the same, it may be used by either party at the trial with the same force and effect as if signed by the witness."

Mr. Jackson thereupon requested a continuance of the taking of the deposition on behalf of Albers to permit Albers to procure counsel. He prefaced this request by the words: "In the case wherein Mr. Margolis appeared this morning before Judge Deasy, and Henry Albers appeared as a witness for the purposes of being certified to the Superior Court in this matter to answer certain questions propounded by him in a deposition, taken while he was temporarily a resident of the City Prison * * *"

After requesting the continuance on behalf of Albers Mr. Jackson continued: "I might add that this matter of certification came to my attention through Mr. Margolis a day or so ago. It is the first time I knew about it, as to the date, and I have never been served with copies of the questions propounded for certification, although I appeared at the time the deposition of Mr. Albers was taken * * * and though at said time I requested of the Court Reporter that I be given copies of that.

"Let the record show that Mr. Albers also has no copy of the questions to be propounded to him; for whatever effect that may have on this proceeding—I do not know at this time.

"It is now incumbent upon me to appear in Judge Arata's Court * * *"

Whereupon the record shows that Mr. Jackson left the court room.

The taking of the deposition then proceeded. The deposition after being transcribed was later signed by Albers and duly certified by the notary.

At the trial the deposition of May 17, which had been certified by the notary but never signed by the witness, and the deposition of June 8 were both offered in evidence by respondents. Counsel for appellants objected to their introduction and after some discussion, at the court's suggestion, it was stipulated that the depositions shall be deemed read without waiving any objections made to the admissibility of the depositions and subject as to "[a]ll the questions—all objections that would be available." The court reserved the ruling and did not act on the offer at any time during the trial. However the findings recite: "Evidence both oral and documentary was offered, including the deposition and affidavits of defendant Henry Albers, which the Court admitted into evidence * * *"

[1] So far as the deposition of May 17 is concerned we may concede the validity of appellants' objection that it was never read, corrected or signed by the witness. However we can find no prejudice in its admission since, because of the witness' refusal to answer, it contains no substantial evidence against these appellants.

The deposition of June 8 stands on a different basis since therein is found the only substantial evidence, apart from the admission of Morrie Teplin as to one isolated transaction, to support the findings upon which the judgment against appellants is bottomed.

[2, 3] Appellants correctly complain of the irregular procedure of the court in not ruling on the admissibility of this deposition before the close of the trial. Clopton v. Clopton, 162 Cal. 27, 32-33, 121 P. 720; DeTray v. Higgins, 31 Cal.App.2d 482, 487, 88 P.2d 241. However appellants not only produced their own testimony and that of other witnesses in contradiction of their implication in the appropriation of liquor from respondents' stores, but the court admitted by way of impeachment an affidavit of Albers repudiating his implication of appellants and expressly denying that they improperly received any of respondents' liquor from him. This affidavit could only have been introduced for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of Albers contained in the June 8 deposition. The only showing of additional testimony that might have been produced by appellants to contradict or impeach the testimony of Albers is a so-called affidavit of Albers' mother offered in support of appellants' motion for new trial reciting certain alleged conversations with Albers, Margolis and Ersunoff. This so-called affidavit is not in fact an affidavit. The certificate of the notary attached thereto is not a jurat but a certificate of acknowledgment. It does not recite that the witness was sworn by the notary but only that Maud Albers "duly acknowledged to me that she executed" the instrument. There is no legal showing that appellants were prejudiced in the production of their evidence by the irregularity in not ruling on the admissibility of the deposition before the close of the trial. The burden is on appellants to show prejudice from the action of the court in this regard. DeTray v. Higgins, supra, 31 Cal.App.2d 482, 489, 88 P.2d 241; Ebner v. West Hollywood Transfer Co., 45 Cal. App. 186, 191, 187 P. 114.

[4] Appellants also argue that they did not receive the statutory notice of the proceedings held on the morning of June 8 before the superior court nor of the taking of the deposition on that afternoon. There was testimony by Margolis offered to establish that appellants' counsel had orally agreed to the hearing on the morning of June 8 and no testimony was offered to contradict this showing. The quotations from the deposition above set out indicate the familiarity of counsel for appellants with this proceeding and while he stated that he had had only one or two days oral notice of the exact date of the hearing he not only made no objection to the taking of the deposition on this ground but he entered into a formal stipulation to the taking of the deposition and that it might be used by either party. This constituted a waiver of more formal notice. The only motion that he made was for a continuance, not on behalf of his clients, but of Albers. Albers had clearly consented before the court to the taking of his deposition at 2 p. m. on that day and Albers afterwards signed the deposition without correction or amendment. The only possible objection that counsel for appellants voiced on behalf of his clients was that he had not received a copy of the questions certified by the notary to the court. Counsel has furnished us with no authority that this need be done and we find no such provision in section 1991 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In any event counsel's consent to the hearing without such service was established.

The witness proved a very reluctant one and counsel for respondents called his attention to the statements theretofore made by him, stating that they were made under oath and threatening him with prosecution for perjury if he repudiated them. Concerning the statement made to the police the witness finally testified: "Well, if that is a sworn statement, then I did not know it was a sworn statement. For the record, I will have to say that it is true."

"Q. On the same basis, the entire statement is true, isn't it? A. Yes." The statement to the police was copied into the deposition.

[5] Counsel for appellants argue that in thus questioning the witness about the police statement respondents acted contrary to the instructions of the court and the taking of the deposition was for that reason manifestly unfair. The fact is, however, that the witness afterwards signed the deposition as taken without any correction or comment. He is not complaining and the privilege if any was his, not appellants'. The deposition as returned was under the oath of the witness and properly admissible against the appellants.

[6] While the witness was very reluctant to implicate these appellants enough appears in the direct questions and answers (without reference to the previous written statements) to support the findings of the court that appellants conspired with Albers to receive liquor belonging to respondents and did receive such liquor. While the written statements may be hearsay as to appellants, the error in the admission of some hearsay evidence (in an action tried by the court without a jury) is not prejudicial error, where there is otherwise enough competent evidence in the record to support the findings. Bixby v. Bixby, 120 Cal. App.2d 495, 499, 261 P.2d 286 and cases cited.

The amount of damages found is based upon testimony that alcoholic beverages were handled under fair trade agreements under which the liquor was purchased at fixed wholesale prices and sold at fixed retail prices. By taking the inventory on hand at the beginning of 1953 and 1954 respectively and adding thereto the purchases of liquor during each year and subtracting the inventory on hand at the end of each year respondents established the amount of such liquor withdrawn from their stock in each year. By comparing the actual receipts from sales of liquor in each year with the figure that should have been received from the retail sale of the amount of liquor withdrawn from stock in each year at the established mark-up price they established a loss aggregating the amount of the judgment.

[7] Appellants complain that the figures for both stores were combined in these calculations, but the testimony shows that liquor was transferred from one store to the other freely and no other source of loss in either store was established. They also complain that an average mark-up was used in these calculations. Appellants cannot complain, however, that the loss occasioned by their wrong-doing cannot be established with complete mathematical precision.

[8] Appellants' complaint that the witness Margolis' testimony was based on a summarization of the records is met by the fact that the records were in court for use on cross-examination or otherwise as appellants might desire and Margolis testified to his familiarity with the records from which the summaries were made and their correctness. v.

Lloyd W. DICKEY, D.D., Defendant and Respondent.

Civ. 17766.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Sept. 11, 1958.

Action by a patient against a dentist for alleged malpractice and for assault and battery in alleged removal of a sound tooth. Judgment for the defendant in the Superior Court, City & County of San Francisco, Milton D. Sapiro, J., and the patient appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Peters, P. J., held that the evidence was insufficient to carry the case to the jury and that the consent of the patient to the removal of the sound tooth was a complete defense to the assault and battery charge.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Physicians and Surgeons ⇨18(6)

Doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable only where the consequences of professional treatment were not such as ordinarily would have followed if due care had been exercised.

2. Negligence ⇨121(2)

Generally "res ipsa loquitur" is applicable where the accident is of such a nature that it can be said in the light of past experience that it probably was the result of negligence by someone and that defendant is probably the person who is responsible.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Res Ipsa Loquitur".

For doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" to be applicable, there must be a basis of experience from which it may reasonably be concluded that the accident is of a kind which does not normally occur unless someone has been negligent, it must be caused by an agency within the exclusive control of defendant, and it must not have been due to any voluntary action by plaintiff.

4. Physicians and Surgeons ⇨18(9)

In action against a dentist for malpractice in the extraction of a tooth of plaintiff, evidence was insufficient to carry the case to the jury under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur or to show that the defendant was negligent in any way.

5. Assault and Battery ⇨11

In action against a dentist for assault and battery on the ground that defendant extracted a tooth that was sound and perfect and allowed a tooth that was diseased to remain in the plaintiff's jaw, consent of the patient to the removal of the diseased tooth was a complete defense.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff, Arline Carr, brought this action against defendant, Lloyd Dickey, a dentist, for malpractice and for an assault and battery. At the close of plaintiff's case the trial court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit as to both causes of action. Judgment was entered accordingly, and plaintiff appeals.

The case involves the extraction of a tooth of plaintiff by defendant. For purposes of clarity, something should be said about how the teeth involved are indicated in the record. According to the system used by defendant, the lower left wisdom tooth is designated number 17. That tooth had been extracted by defendant prior to the events here involved. The molar next to the wisdom tooth, the second lower left molar, and the back tooth after the wisdom tooth was removed, is designated as number 18. The next tooth in front of that or the first lower left molar, is designated as number 19.

The complaint alleges, in the malpractice count, that defendant negligently extracted the first lower left molar (No. 19) of plaintiff, a tooth that was sound and perfect, and allowed the second lower left molar (No. 18), a diseased and decayed tooth, to remain in plaintiff's jaw. The assault and battery count charges that defendant was employed by plaintiff to extract a designated tooth but extracted a different one without cause, and without plaintiff's consent.

As already pointed out, the trial court granted a nonsuit as to both counts. In the course of its ruling the court, after reviewing the evidence, stated, in reference to the first count, "I am satisfied that there is no evidence in this case to establish negligence as required by law. * * * There was no negligence shown in the manner of pulling the tooth. * * * The Court cannot find any evidence of negligence whatsoever in the evidence that has been presented * * *" The court also ruled that the assault and battery count could not be sustained "because the action,

Jack H. Werchick, San Francisco, for appellant.

Lamb & Hoge, San Francisco, for respondent.

as testified to by the plaintiff, was taken with her consent. * * * she consented to the fact that the tooth be removed."

Tested by the standards applicable to nonsuits, the record shows that these rulings of the trial court were correct.

The defendant is a dentist and oral surgeon. Called as an adverse witness, he testified that he first treated plaintiff in September of 1953. At that time he took full mouth X rays, and took the patient's dental history, and made a clinical examination of her mouth. He filled three of her teeth. At that time he discovered no reason to treat the lower left molars. On June 10, 1954, plaintiff called at his office and complained of pain in the lower left molar area. Upon examination he found no emergency situation requiring immediate extraction. He took an X ray of the two lower left molars and discovered a cavity in the back molar (No. 18) which he thought could be filled. He also discovered a radiolucent area in the first molar (No. 19). The plaintiff complained that both teeth hurt and requested that they be extracted. The doctor told plaintiff to go home to see if the pain became localized. He knew that plaintiff was a constant and chronic complainer of pain, and also knew that it was frequently difficult for a patient to localize the pain. He did not want to extract either of the teeth until he was sure that the pain was of such a type and character that such remedy was required.

A few days later plaintiff returned, complaining that both molars still bothered her. He had carefully examined the X rays and came to the conclusion that tooth numbered 18 could be saved by filling the cavity, but that number 19 should be removed. Neither molar was abscessed, but both were diseased. The radiolucent area shown in the X ray on tooth number 19 gave all the indications of decay. It was either decay, or a wasting away of the tooth. The condition had just about reached the nerve of the tooth. There was a discoloration in or close to the nerve. A radiolucent area in an X ray indicates that there is a lesion in the tooth, a wasting away of the tooth, indicating a loss of tooth structure. It can indicate decay or a change in density of the tooth. After re-examining the X ray he came to the conclusion that plaintiff's pain was coming from tooth No. 19. He based this conclusion upon the fact that the radiolucent area was on the back surface of the tooth, below the gum line in the root of the tooth. When decay reaches the nerve of a tooth, extraction is one remedy. Plaintiff had stated that taking hot or cold substances into her mouth caused pain.

Under these circumstances defendant told the plaintiff that he could fill tooth number 18 and save that tooth, but advised the removal of No. 19. He showed the patient the X rays and called her attention to the radiolucent area in tooth No. 19, and pointed out to her how close it was to the pulp. Plaintiff agreed to the suggested procedure. He filled tooth No. 18, and extracted tooth No. 19. He extracted the tooth because of what he had observed from the X rays and because the symptoms of plaintiff as described by her indicated to him that the nerve of the tooth was involved, and extraction was indicated. He could not remember if his office radio was tuned to the Charles-Marciano fight during the extraction.

The testimony given by plaintiff does not substantially differ from that given by defendant. She testified that when she visited defendant in June of 1954 she told him that her back teeth were hurting, and that she thought it was the back lower tooth on the left side, which would be tooth No. 18. The doctor examined her mouth, and took some X rays. Then he told the witness that it was not tooth No. 18 that was hurting, but the tooth next to it, No. 19. Then "I told him it felt like it was the tooth in the back, I told him, but he is the dentist and he should know." She told the doctor that if she ate anything sweet, chewed gum, drank water, or opened her mouth so that the air got in, her tooth would ache. It was not an excruciating or continuous pain, nor did it keep her awake at night

The doctor told her to come back in a few days. This she did, coming in about 6:30 or 7:00 p. m. The doctor first took care of the teeth of her child and then brought her into his office. All of the time she was there the radio was on tuned to the Charles-Marciano fight. The doctor first filled several cavities in her front teeth. Then plaintiff asked the defendant about her back tooth, which was the one she thought was hurting, although she was not sure. The defendant took another X ray and then told her it was not the last molar, but the one next to it, that was giving the trouble. After showing her the X ray, he recommended that tooth No. 19 should be pulled, and No. 18 should be filled. When asked if she consented to this procedure, she replied: "Well, I told him he should know." Then defendant extracted tooth No. 19. Plaintiff then asked defendant for the extracted tooth. He gave it to her and she took it home. It was introduced into evidence in this case.

After the tooth was extracted the sensitivity and pain continued. About a week after the extraction plaintiff again visited defendant and told him that the condition still persisted. She accused defendant of pulling the wrong tooth and refused to permit him to work on tooth No. 18. Some time later she went to Dr. Brady, another dentist, showed him the extracted tooth and asked him to extract tooth No. 18. This he did.

The only other witness called by plaintiff was Dr. Brady. He testified that he extracted tooth No. 18 (he used a different numbering system) on June 23, 1954. He first took an X ray and then determined from it, and the complaints of the patient, that the tooth should be extracted. He found erosion around the gum line leading down towards the nerve. When shown the tooth that defendant had extracted (No. 19) he stated that it showed "quite a bit of erosion out at the gum line * * * quite a bit of it," and that it had a "gum line cavity." When shown the X rays of tooth No. 19 he found "quite a bit of decay or erosion" on both the front and back of the tooth, and several radiolucencies. The condition disclosed could be a reason for extraction, depending upon the sensitivity of the patient. He also stated that from the X rays you cannot tell whether there is decay or erosion unless you examine the tooth and pick at it with an explorer to see if it is soft. By just looking at the tooth that had been pulled he could not tell whether it should have been extracted. From the X rays, it looked to him as if the tooth had an extensive sensitive area. When asked if, in his opinion, tooth No. 19 should have been extracted, he said: "I would take that tooth out." As far as the X rays taken by defendant of tooth No. 18 were concerned, they showed a condition that raised a question whether that tooth could be saved.

On this evidence the trial court granted a nonsuit as to both causes of action. Appellant argues that the evidence presented questions of fact which could have been decided by a lay jury without expert evidence and which entitled her to the benefit of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. In addition, she asserts, that, independently of that doctrine, the evidence established a prima facie case that the respondent had failed, negligently, to use the requisite standard of care in his treatment of her.

[1] The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is not applicable to the facts of this case. In 36 Cal.Jur.2d p. 72, § 337, the proper rule, applicable to malpractice cases, and supported by many cases, is stated as follows: "Medical malpractice cases are an abundant field for application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. Of course, the mere fact that a medical treatment may have been unsuccessful is insufficient to bring the doctrine into operation. It is applicable only where the consequences of professional treatment were not such as ordinarily would have followed if due care had been exercised, and where under the evidence the hypothesis that the patient's prior condition was the proximate cause of the accident may be rejected by the trier of fact."

[2] In Bauer v. Otis, 133 Cal.App.2d 439, 443, 284 P.2d 133, 136, the applicable rules are summarized as follows:

"As a general rule, res ipsa loquitur is applicable where it appears that the accident is of such a nature that it can be said, in the light of past experience, that it probably was the result of negligence by someone and that the defendant is probably the person who is responsible. * * *

[3] "The conditions required for the application of the doctrine are: (a) There is a basis of experience, either common to the community or brought out in evidence, from which it may reasonably be concluded that the accident is of a kind which does not normally occur unless someone has been negligent. (b) It must be caused by an agency or instrumentality within the exclusive control of the defendant. (c) It must not have been due to any voluntary action or contribution on the part of the plaintiff. [Citations.]" For a full review of most of the applicable cases see Salgo v. Leland Stanford Jr. University Bd. of Trustees, 154 Cal.App.2d 560, 317 P.2d 170.

Tested by these standards the doctrine is not here applicable. There is no evidence at all that plaintiff has suffered any legal injury. There is no evidence that tooth No. 19 was not diseased and should not have been extracted. No subsequent injury followed as a result of the extraction. Plaintiff's evidence is to the effect that tooth No. 19 was extracted after the condition existing was fully explained to her and after she had consented to its removal. The evidence as to tooth No. 18, the tooth respondent filled and that Dr. Brady subsequently removed, is to the effect that it was a matter of reasonable judgment as to whether that tooth should have been extracted or an attempt made to save it by filling it. Respondent, with praiseworthy caution, determined to save that tooth if he could. The fact that Dr. Brady, after the pain continued, decided to remove that tooth is no reason to apply the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. The appellant admitted that, when she returned to respondent's office after the extraction and complained of continuing pain, she refused to allow him to treat tooth No. 18. Thus, res ipsa loquitur is not applicable to the facts.

[4] Nor does the evidence show that respondent was negligent in any way. Quite to the contrary, the evidence shows that respondent exercised the highest degree of care and skill. There was not one word of testimony that the extracted tooth was a sound tooth. The testimony was to the contrary. Respondent and Dr. Brady both testified that the X rays of tooth No. 19 showed decay in or a wasting away of the tooth structure below the gum line and leading towards the nerve. The fact that pain continued after the extraction of tooth No. 19 is not evidence that that tooth was negligently removed. Nor does the fact that Dr. Brady subsequently removed tooth No. 18 raise an inference that respondent was negligent in not extracting that tooth. The evidence is uncontradicted that respondent, in the exercise of a sound judgment, felt that the tooth might be saved by filling it. There is not one word of testimony that tooth No. 18 was so diseased that a dentist, acting reasonably, should have known that it had to be extracted.

The theory of appellant was that respondent was so interested in the fight broadcast that he negligently removed tooth No. 19, a sound tooth, when he intended to remove tooth No. 18. The theory sounds good, but the difficulty is that the evidence of appellant and of her witnesses not only does not support it, but is quite to the contrary. There was no mistake in removing tooth No. 19. When appellant first visited respondent to complain of pain in the molar area, respondent, after taking and examining the X rays, and after visually examining the teeth, told appellant that it was his belief that it was tooth No. 19 causing the trouble, and that that tooth should be removed and tooth No. 18 should be saved. Before the tooth was extracted respondent, according to appellant, carefully explained the X rays and told her that tooth No. 19 should be extracted. Appellant consented. No mistake was made. What was done was intentionally done, and done with appellant's consent. There is no evidence nor any inference from the evidence to support appellant's theory.

[5] The consent of appellant to the removal of tooth No. 19 was, of course, also a complete legal defense to the assault and battery charge.

Thus, the nonsuit was properly granted as to both charges involved.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.
Sept. 17, 1958.

Action for divorce. From a portion of an order of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Elmer D. Doyle, J., modifying the alimony provisions of an interlocutory judgment of divorce, the husband appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Herndon, J., held that evidence supported order modifying alimony provisions of an interlocutory judgment of divorce by providing that the husband should pay nominal sum of $1 per month until further order of the court.

Order affirmed.

1. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 245(1)

Where application for modification of an award of alimony by the wife was filed before the expiration of the period covered by the original award, the trial court had the power to order the continuation of alimony after the expiration of such period if there was sufficient showing of a change of circumstances.

2. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 245(3)

Testimony that since rendition of judgment making an award of alimony the wife had suffered a heart attack and that her health had seriously deteriorated constituted a sufficient showing of change in circumstances to justify a modification of the award so as to retain jurisdiction in the court so that it might have power in the future to make such further order as the eventualities might require.

3. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 235

The question of making a nominal award of alimony for the purpose of retaining jurisdiction to deal with future possibilities is within the sound judicial discretion of the trial judge.

4. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 245(3), 286

The determination of whether there has been sufficient change of circumstances to justify modification of an alimony award rests largely in the discretion of the trial judge and such determination will not be disturbed unless an abuse of that discretion is clearly shown.

5. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 245(3)

Evidence supported order modifying alimony provisions of an interlocutory judgment of divorce by providing that the husband should pay nominal sum of $1 per month until further order of the court, where though the trial court could reasonably conclude that the circumstances of the parties were not such that a substantial alimony award should be made, the disabling potentialities of the wife's ailments were of such a character as to justify a retention of jurisdiction.

HERNDON, Justice.

The order here presented for review modifies the alimony provision of an interlocutory judgment of divorce. The judgment required the husband to pay the wife alimony in the sum of $40 per week beginning on October 19, 1956, and continuing for a period of 52 weeks. Before the expiration of the period covered by the original award the wife applied for a modification which would increase the payments to $50 per week and require their continuation "until further order of the court." Upon the hearing the trial court concluded that the wife had "failed to establish sufficient change of circumstances since the granting of the interlocutory decree, upon which to grant an order requiring [the husband] to pay continued support" but that the husband should be required to pay the nominal sum of $1 per month commencing on November 1, 1957, and continuing until further order of court. The husband appeals.

The essence of appellant's argument is that the evidence shows no substantial change in the circumstances of the parties, and that the lack of this requisite basis for the modification order is conclusively established by the "finding" that there was no sufficient change of circumstances to justify the extension of alimony payments except in a nominal amount. A brief review of the record will demonstrate that appellant's position is untenable.

At the time of their separation, the parties had been married more than 31 years and had two adult children. The divorce was granted to respondent wife on the ground of extreme cruelty. She was awarded 51% of the community property which consisted of approximately $38,000 in cash and a few other items of personal property. At the time the divorce case was tried, appellant was earning take-home pay averaging about $80 per week. Respondent testified that she had not worked for some 14 years and that she was at that time physically unable to work by reason of extreme nervousness, arthritis and migraine headaches.

Turning now to the hearing of the modification proceeding, the testimony may be briefly summarized. Respondent testified that she still retained at least $18,000 of the approximately $19,000 which she had been awarded from the community property; that since the trial of the divorce action she had suffered a heart attack; that her health had become further impaired with a severe worsening of her previous ailments; that due to her recurring illnesses she had been bedridden at frequent intervals with the result that her expectation of being able to find gainful employment had been defeated. Respondent's testimony with respect to the deterioration of her health was substantially corroborated by a neighbor who testified to her observations that respondent's feet were so swollen that she walked with difficulty; that at frequent intervals she was confined to her bed by her illnesses for varying periods of time, and that respondent had "aged at least 10 or 12 years in the last 6 to 8 months."

The evidence revealed that appellant also had conserved his share of the community property. His average earnings had increased from $80 to approximately $86 per week, the increase being partially attributable to the fact that he had been able to work continuously since the divorce trial whereas previously he had suffered a temporary disability. It appeared that appellant had recently acquired a new home and was contemplating remarriage.

[1,2] Since the application for a modification was filed before the expiration of the 52-week period covered by the original award, it is not disputed that the trial court had the power to order the continuation of alimony after the expiration of said period, assuming a sufficient showing of a change in circumstances. Simpson v. Simpson, 134 Cal.App.2d 219, 221-222, 285 P.2d 313; Bechtel v. Bechtel, 124 Cal.App. 617, 618, 12 P.2d 970; Smith v. Superior Court, 89 Cal.App. 177, 187-189, 264 P. 573. The trial court was entitled to give full credit to the undisputed testimony that since the rendition of the judgment respondent had suffered a heart attack and that her health had seriously deteriorated. Quite clearly this testimony alone showed a sufficient change in circumstances to justify the modification, the obvious purpose of which was to retain jurisdiction so that the court would have power in the future to make such further order as eventualities might require.

[3,4] As we pointed out in Bird v. Bird, 152 Cal.App.2d 99, 100-101, 312 P.2d 773, 774, "This question of making a nominal award for the purpose of retaining jurisdiction to deal with future possibilities is one which, like others pertaining to allowance of alimony, is committed to the sound judicial discretion of the trial judge." See Farnsworth v. Farnsworth, 81 Cal.App.2d 380, 383, 184 P.2d 7. The determination of the question whether or not there has been a sufficient change of circumstances to justify the modification of an alimony award rests largely in the discretion of the trial court, and such determination will not be disturbed by a reviewing court unless an abuse of that discretion is clearly shown. Wilson v. Wilson, 104 Cal.App.2d 167, 170, 231 P.2d 128; Simpson v. Simpson, supra, 134 Cal.App.2d 219, 224, 285 P.2d 313.

[5] From the evidence before it, the trial court could reasonably conclude that although the immediate circumstances of the parties were such that a substantial alimony award was not necessary, the disabling potentialities of respondent's ailments, with attending possibilities of her having to incur greatly increased expenses for medical care, were of such character as to justify a retention of jurisdiction. In view of a 31-year marriage it does not seem unreasonable for the trial court in these circumstances to reserve the power further to enforce duties arising from the marital relation as the foreseeable and unforeseeable eventualities of the future may justly dictate.

The order is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

Sept. 11, 1958.

Civil action brought for damages for assault against defendants, father and son. The Superior Court, Los Angeles County, J. F. Moroney, J., entered judgment for plaintiff and against both defendants for $8,500 compensatory damages and $1,000 exemplary damages, and father appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Shinn, P. J., held that although there was no evidence that father struck plaintiff, in view of testimony that father urged and encouraged his son to attack plaintiff, evidence was sufficient to support finding that father committed an assault on plaintiff and that father was actuated by malice.

Affirmed.

I. Assault and Battery §18

A party injured by an unjustified assault may recover damages not only from the actual assailant, but from any other person who aids, abets, counsels or encourages the assault.

2 Assault and Battery  $\S$ 35

In action against father and son for assault, evidence including disclosure that father urged and encouraged his son to attack plaintiff sufficiently supported finding that father committed assault on plaintiff, even though there was no evidence that father struck plaintiff.

3. Trial  $\S$ 391, 395(5)

Where a cause is tried to the court, the court must make findings on all material issues of fact raised by the pleadings and the evidence, but where the court has made findings upon the material facts in issue, it need not make further findings upon the probative facts, as a finding of ultimate fact includes a finding of all probative facts necessary to sustain it.

4. Trial  $\S$ 397(2), 404(3)

In action against father and son for assault, finding that defendants assaulted plaintiff was one of ultimate fact and it was not necessary that the trial court further find that father participated in the assault by aiding and abetting his son.

5. Assault and Battery  $\S$ 39, 42

An award of punitive damages is proper where the assault has been wantonly and maliciously committed, and the question of malice is one for the trier of fact.

6. Assault and Battery  $\S$ 35

In action against father and son for assault, where there was testimony respecting father's grievance against plaintiff and his employer, and father's participation in assault committed by his son, evidence furnished ample basis for finding that father was actuated by malice and for award of punitive damages.

SHINN, Presiding Justice.

The present action is against E. W. Robinson and his son, Ray Robinson, for damages for assault. Defendants filed a joint answer, in which Ray Robinson admitted striking plaintiff, but alleged as an affirmative defense to the action that he did so in self-defense. It was also alleged as a defense that any violence committed by defendants was provoked by plaintiff's vile and abusive language, and by his unlawful "interference" with E. W. Robinson. After an extended trial, the court made findings and entered judgment in favor of plaintiff and against both defendants for $8,500 compensatory damages and $1,000 exemplary damages. E. W. Robinson appeals from the judgment; Ray Robinson has not appealed.

Plaintiff was employed as a truck driver by John Ferroni, who transported race horses to and from various tracks in California during racing seasons; appellant was one of Ferroni's competitors. On the morning of October 11, 1954, plaintiff drove a van belonging to Ferroni to a railway station near the Hollywood Park race track in order to pick up some harness horses that were scheduled to arrive by train from the east. At the station was a dock which was used primarily for the loading and unloading of freight. Ayer parked the van beside the dock and went onto the dock to wait for the train. A driver named Armstrong arrived shortly thereafter in another van. Ayer testified that appellant approached him and asked him what he was doing on the dock. Ayer said that he was there to pick up horses that had been consigned to Ferroni and appellant replied that plaintiff had no business picking up horses at the station.

Ayer returned to the station the following day as the horses he was expecting did not arrive on the 11th. Ferroni came to the dock a few minutes later. Ayer and Ferroni testified that appellant approached them and demanded to know what they were doing on the dock; appellant told Ferroni that they had no right to be there because he had "the contract" to haul horses to and from the track. Ferroni replied that he had letters and telegrams authorizing him to pick up some horses and transport them to the track. Ayer and Ferroni remained at the dock, but their horses did not arrive.

On the morning of the next day, October 13th, Ayer and Armstrong went to the station in separate vans; Ferroni arrived shortly thereafter. There were a number of people on the dock waiting for the train. Ayer waited near Armstrong's van. Plaintiff stated that a man whom he did not know, and who proved to be Ray Robinson, appellant's son, came up to him and asked him if he was the driver of Ferroni's van. When plaintiff said "yes", Robinson said "You'll have to move it." Ayer replied that he would not move the van until he picked up his horses, whereupon Robinson said: "If you don't move it, I will." As Robinson started to walk down the dock toward the van, plaintiff told Ferroni what Robinson had said, and Ferroni began to walk rapidly after Robinson. Ferroni called out "Hey Heavy", whereupon Robinson wheeled about and struck him on the head, knocking him to the ground. Robinson then jumped on top of Ferroni and began pounding him about the face and body. Plaintiff testified that while Robinson was hitting Ferroni, appellant was "egging him on" and shouted "Hit him; kill the s. b." and "Here is the other s. b.; get him too." Plaintiff ran up to the scene. Meanwhile, a man named Witt seized Robinson's arms and tried to pin them to his body. Robinson swung at Witt. Witt testified that appellant then shouted "No, it is not him. It is that one over there" and pointed to plaintiff. Robinson then hit plaintiff in the face, knocked him down, beat him about the face and body, picked him up and shoved him against the railing of the dock, and raised his fist to strike Ayer again, whereupon a Mr. French, an employee of the railroad, told him to stop or he would hit him with a crowbar. Armstrong testified that when French intervened, appellant called out: "Let 'em go it." Plaintiff suffered severe personal injuries, including three broken ribs, as a result of the beating.

Appellant's version of the circumstances occurring on October 11th, 12th and 13th differed materially from the versions related by plaintiff and his witnesses. Appellant testified that on October 11th plaintiff parked Ferroni's van beside one of his own vans, making it impossible for him to load horses through the side gate. The van had room for eight horses, but only two could be loaded through the rear gate of the vehicle. Appellant asked plaintiff to move his van, but Ayer refused and became belligerent. The following day, plaintiff again parked his van in such a way as to prevent appellant from loading horses through the side gate. When appellant asked Ayer and Ferroni to move their vehicle they swore at him and threatened to "get" him either at the station or at the race-track. However, within 15 or 20 minutes they did move their truck about 20 feet and Robinson loaded his horses. That night, appellant visited his son, who was a fireman employed by the City of Los Angeles. Appellant told him that two men had been blocking his van, and that they were going to "get" him; he did not identify Ayer and Ferroni by name. Appellant denied calling out to his son during the altercation; several other witnesses to the fight testified that they did not hear appellant say anything to his son.

It appears from appellant's testimony that he had asserted to Ferroni and Ayer that he had the exclusive right to load horses from the dock, which they denied. He stood by looking on while his son was mutilating both Ferroni and Ayer, uttered no remonstrance and made no attempt to interfere. He testified that while the fight was under way he said something to the effect that "these are the two fellows that were trying to get me for three days." He had a grievance against Ferroni and Ayer because of the manner in which they parked their truck and because he claimed they were interfering with his business; they had none against him. The court would have been warranted in believing that he was not only pleased with the manner in which his son was handling the situation but actively encouraged him to assault Ayer.

Ray Robinson testified that he went to the dock on October 13th because he was concerned about his father. He did not know Ayer or Ferroni and had never seen them before. His father pointed them out to him at the dock. He hit Ferroni after the latter seized him by the shoulder from behind and spun him around; he only struck Ferroni once. Plaintiff "jumped" him and hit him in the stomach, so he struck back. He hit Ayer only two or three times. Several other witnesses called by the Robinsons testified that plaintiff was the aggressor.

The court found that "the defendants wrongfully and violently assaulted plaintiff, struck and beat the plaintiff * * *" and that "defendants were, and each of them was, * * * guilty of a wilful, wanton, cruel and malicious attack" on his person. The court also found the affirmative defenses alleged in the answer to be untrue.

[1,2] The first assignment of error to be considered is that the evidence does not support the finding that appellant committed an assault upon Ayer for the reason that there was no evidence that he was guilty of striking plaintiff. The argument is without merit. A party injured by an unjustified assault may recover damages not only from the actual assailant, but from any other person who aids, abets, counsels or encourages the assault. Turner v. Whittel, 2 Cal.App.2d 585, 589, 38 P.2d 835; Boyajian v. Balian, 7 Cal.App.2d 174, 176, 46 P.2d 199. Whether appellant aided and abetted his son in administering a severe beating to plaintiff was a question of fact to be resolved by the court. Although the evidence was in conflict, the court could conclude from the testimony of plaintiff and his witnesses that appellant urged and encouraged his son to attack plaintiff. This testimony, if believed, sufficiently supports the challenged finding.

[3,4] It is next contended that the court erred in failing to make findings upon a material issue of fact. In this connection, appellant argues that the court should have made a finding as to the theory upon which he was to be held liable in damages, and that in failing to do so the court committed reversible error. We cannot agree. Appellant directs our attention to the established rule that where a cause is tried to the court, the court must make findings on all material issues of fact raised by the pleadings and the evidence. However, it is also well settled that where the court has made findings upon the material facts in issue, it need not make further findings upon the probative facts, as a finding of ultimate fact includes a finding of all probative facts necessary to sustain it. Fischer v. Ostby, 127 Cal.App.2d 528, 531-532, 274 P.2d 221, and cases cited; 24 Cal.Jur. 968-969, 974-975. It is contended that the court may have held appellant liable on the theory of respondeat superior or the theory that he advised and encouraged the assaults by his son. It is a specious argument. It is negated by the pleadings, the remarks of the court and the fact that plaintiff developed by the testimony of appellant that his son did not work for him. The finding that the defendants assaulted plaintiff was one of ultimate fact, and a further finding that appellant participated in the assault by aiding and abetting his son would have been superfluous.

[5,6] The final contention to be considered is that the award of $1,000 punitive damages against appellant was unwarranted for the reason that there was no evidence of malice. The argument cannot be maintained. An award of punitive damages is proper where the assault has been wantonly and maliciously committed, and the question of malice is one for the trier of fact. Herman v. Glasscock, 68 Cal.App.2d 98, 104, 155 P.2d 912. We have already related the testimony respecting appellant's grievance against Ferroni and Ayer and his participation in the assault; it is unnecessary to repeat it. There was ample evidentiary basis for the finding that appellant was actuated by malice.

Hearing Denied Nov. 5, 1958.

Mandamus to compel Superior Court to set aside its order denying application for pre-trial inspection of medical report in the possession of attorneys for defendants. The District Court of Appeal, Schottky, J., held that where plaintiff voluntarily submitted to physical examination by physician on request of attorneys for defendant, and report was thereafter transmitted to attorneys for defendant, submission of plaintiff to examination was adversary rather than confidential, medical report was not privileged as a communication between client and attorney or as a report of an expert witness on subject matter of litigation, and plaintiff was entitled to a copy of report.

Writ issued.

SCHOTTKY, Justice.

This is a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent to set aside its order denying an application for the pre-trial inspection of a certain medical report in the possession of the attorneys for Daniel McCaskill, the defendant in a civil action initiated by the petitioner.

On May 13, 1957, petitioner filed a complaint for damages due to personal injuries resulting from the alleged medical malpractice of defendant Daniel McCaskill.

The attorneys for defendant Daniel McCaskill requested that the petitioner be examined by Dr. John Adams. On January 14, 1958, the petitioner voluntarily submitted to a physical examination by Dr. Adams, whose report was thereafter transmitted to the attorneys for defendant.

The petitioner did not receive a copy of this medical report and her request for such copy was refused by the attorneys for defendant. Petitioner then, on March 14, 1958, moved the respondent court for an order to inspect and copy this medical report. This motion was denied on March 18, 1958. A subsequent motion to vacate the respondent court's order of March 18, 1958, was likewise denied on March 28, 1958.

The motions of petitioner before the respondent court were apparently made under the authority of sections 2031 and 2032 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 2031 in effect permits any party, upon good cause shown, to inspect and copy any documents or other papers in the possession of any other party. Section 2032 in effect provides that where the mental or physical condition of a party is in issue the court may, upon good cause shown, order a party to submit to a physical examination. The party examined pursuant to such order is then entitled to a copy of the medical report.

It appears that the motions of the petitioner were denied solely on the ground that the medical report was privileged, the court stating: "It is, therefore, the Court's opinion that the communications, whether they be oral or in writing, between Dr. Adams and counsel for defendant, are privileged and, therefore, not subject to inspection under Sections 2031 and 2032 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

The respondent contends that this report is within the attorney-client privilege. It relies principally on City and County of San Francisco v. Superior Court, 37 Cal. 2d 227, 231 P.2d 26, 25 A.L.R.2d 1418. In that case the plaintiff brought an action against the city. To aid in preparing the suit the plaintiff's attorney caused the plaintiff to be examined by a doctor to ascertain the extent of his injuries. The defendant city sought to compel the doctor to answer certain questions. The court held that while no physician-patient privilege was present the attorney-client privilege was applicable and the doctor could not be compelled to answer. The theory of the case was that the attorney-client privilege exists in order to permit a client to communicate freely with his legal adviser without fear that such communication would later be divulged to his prejudice. In order to communicate with his attorney it may be necessary for the client to employ an agent, such as a messenger or interpreter and any communication through such an agency is likewise within the privilege. When it is necessary for the client to communicate information as to his physical condition to his attorney he may require the services of a physician. The physician is then the agent through which the communication is made and his report would be privileged. As the court there stated (37 Cal.2d at page 237, 231 P.2d at page 31): "Thus, when communication by a client to his attorney regarding his physical or mental condition requires the assistance of a physician to interpret the client's condition to the attorney, the client may submit to an examination by the physician without fear that the latter will be compelled to reveal the information disclosed."

[1,2] Thus we see that the attorney-client privilege is to protect communications between attorney and client. When the plaintiff is examined by a physician for the purpose of informing the plaintiff's attorney as to the plaintiff's physical condition the medical report is privileged. City and County of San Francisco v. The Superior Court, supra; In re Ochse, 38 Cal. 2d 230, 238 P.2d 561; State v. Kociolek, 23 N.J. 400, 129 A.2d 417.

However, when the plaintiff is examined by a physician for the purpose of informing the defendant's attorney as to the plaintiff's physical condition the circumstances are entirely different and the same rule is not applicable. It is communication between the client and his own attorney which is privileged. In the instant case the communication was by plaintiff to a physician engaged by counsel for defendants. In such a case the necessary element of attorney-client relationship is lacking and the essential feature of confidential intent in revealing information is also lacking.

Our Supreme Court has held in Sharff v. Superior Court, 44 Cal.2d 508, 282 P.2d 896, that when a doctor selected by defendants conducts a physical examination of plaintiff, the plaintiff should be permitted to have plaintiff's attorney present during the examination. This indicates strongly that the submission of plaintiff to examination by a doctor employed by defense counsel is adversary rather than confidential.

Respondent also argues that the physician in this case is in the nature of an expert witness who has examined the subject matter of litigation and that his report is then privileged. However, this report was made possible only through the cooperation of the plaintiff. Without such cooperation the defendant would have been compelled to seek a court order requiring such an examination and under such a situation the plaintiff would have been entitled to a copy of the report. Code of Civil Procedure, sec. 2032. Therefore, when the plaintiff voluntarily submits to such an examination there is no reason to deny him a copy of the report.

[3] We conclude that the medical report requested by petitioner was not a privileged communication and that the court erred in denying petitioner's motion for an inspection of it. But even if the report was privileged we believe that the privilege was waived.

A similar question was recently before the First District Court of Appeal in Grover v. Superior Court, 161 Cal.App.2d 644, 327 P.2d 212. In that case counsel for plaintiff had stipulated that a Dr. O'Connor, acting for defendant, could conduct a physical examination of plaintiff. Thereafter, plaintiff's request for a copy of the report was refused. The Superior Court denied plaintiff's motion to inspect and take a copy of the report, and plaintiff sought a writ in the District Court of Appeal. In granting the writ the court said, 161 Cal.App.2d at page 647, 327 P.2d at page 214:

"* * * Since the communication by plaintiff was not to his attorney, and the communication to defendant's attorney probably was not by his client, it would be difficult to hold that the medical report is within the attorney-client privilege defined by our statute. But we do not find it necessary to pass upon this question, as we have concluded that, even if the privilege exists, it was waived.

"Defendant relies heavily upon the provision of the amendatory statute that:

" 'This article shall not be construed to change the law of this State with respect to the existence of any privilege, whether provided for by statute or judicial decision, nor shall it be construed to incorporate by reference any judicial decisions on privilege of any other jurisdiction.' Code Civ. Proc. § 2016, [subd.] (b).

"Section 2032, subdivision (b) (1), provides expressly that upon request of the person examined the opposing party shall deliver to him a copy of the examining physician's report. Assuming that the report is privileged, it is contended that the two sections are in conflict. Of course, to treat section 2032, subdivision (b) (1) as eliminating a privilege heretofore existing would be to create direct conflict between this section and the above quoted language of Section 2016, subdivision (b), thus necessitating holding one or the other of these simultaneously adopted provisions to be inoperative. But a statute should be so construed as to give effect to each and every part thereof. (23 Cal.Jur. 758.) To construe Section 2032, [subdivision] (b) (1) as providing that any privilege against disclosure of the medical report is waived by procuring the physical examination upon which that report is based is in accord with this basic principle. Thus construed, Section 2032, [subdivision] (b) (1), does not 'change the law of this State with respect to the existence of any privilege,' but provides only that, if there be a privilege whose continuing existence is recognized, nonetheless the privilege is waived. We adopt this construction."

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF THE COUNTY OF LOS ANGELES and H. L. Byram, Defendants and Respondents.

Civ. 22881.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

Sept. 8, 1958.

Proceeding by motion picture theater operator for writ of mandate to board of supervisors and county tax collector which had denied renewal of license to operate motion picture theater. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Bayard Rhone, J., entered judgment denying petition and theater operator appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Nourse, J. pro tempore, held that evidence that some 19 arrests had been made in theater for violation of lewd conduct statute but visiting the theater by persons of homosexual propensities could not be stopped despite owner's engagement of private detective, was insufficient to deny renewal of license for operation of theater.

Reversed with directions.

1. Mandamus ☞168(3)

Where proceeding was brought for writ of mandate to the board of supervisors and county tax collectors denying renewal of motion picture theater operator's license, superior court was not entitled to receive any other evidence than that which was before the board.

2. Theaters and Shows ☞4

Business of operating a motion picture theater is a lawful one of beneficial character and not inherently dangerous to public, and while it may be subject to reasonable regulation, it may not be prohibited.

3. Theaters and Shows ☞4

Motion picture theater operator could not have refused admission to persons of homosexual proclivities who had not committed or attempted to commit any lewd act upon the premises, since such persons have a legal right to be admitted to any place of public amusement.

4. Theaters and Shows ☞3

In proceeding on motion picture theater operator's proceeding for writ of mandate to review decision of county board of supervisors and tax collector in denying renewal of motion picture theater license, evidence disclosing that some 19 arrests for lewdness had been made in theater and that despite operator's hiring of a private detective, darkened theater made it impossible to observe lewd acts, was insufficient to justify denying renewal of license. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 647, subd. 5.

5. Theaters and Shows ☞3

County board of supervisors in acting upon theater operator's application for renewal of license acted in a quasi-judicial capacity and was required to exercise its discretion in accordance with law, and it was necessary that its decision be based upon sufficient evidence.

NOURSE, Justice pro tem.

[1] Appellant here, petitioner below, appeals from the judgment denying his petition for a writ of mandate addressed to the respondent board of supervisors and the county tax collector and dismissing said petition. While the judgment appealed from purports to be based upon an order sustaining a demurrer to the petition without leave to amend, inasmuch as the petition set forth the entire record before the board of supervisors and as the return to the alternative writ issued by the superior court incorporated that record and as the superior court was not entitled to receive any other evidence than that which was before the board (Fascination, Inc. v. Hoover, 39 Cal.2d 260, 246 P.2d 656), we treat the judgment as one upon the merits.

The petitioner is the owner of and since October, 1955 has operated a motion picture theater known as the Carmel Museum Theater in the county of Los Angeles. Each year he was issued a license by the county of Los Angeles to conduct the operation of that theater. In March of 1957 petitioner applied for a renewal of his license and, objection thereto having been made by the sheriff of the county a hearing was held before a referee appointed by respondent board of supervisors; and after that hearing, the referee made a written report to the board of supervisors recommending that petitioner's application be denied. The board, without hearing further evidence, adopted the report of the referee and denied the petitioner's application.

The question for decision here is: Did the evidence before the referee, giving that evidence every intendment in favor of the action of the board, justify the board's action denying petitioner a renewal of his license?

The facts as shown by the evidence, viewing that evidence in the light most favorable to the respondent board, are:

The petitioner purchased the theater in question in October, 1955 and from that time until the theater was closed by the police in March of 1957 operated it as a motion picture theater; the theater was operated in the same manner as similar theaters in the county were operated. In the theater he showed only films of high quality and there is no contention that any of them were of a lewd or immoral character or which might induce lewdness on the part of any patrons. From October 25, 1956, until March 17, 1957, 19 men were placed under arrest in the theater during the showing of pictures on charges of violation of section 647, subdivision 5, of the Penal Code (vagrancy, lewd). These arrests were all based upon attempts by the persons arrested to place their hands upon the private parts of members of the sheriff's vice squad (plain clothesmen) who had seated themselves as decoys in the theater. All arrests of the alleged offenders occurred when the theater was dark for the purpose of exhibiting the picture. During the period in which the arrests were made from two to five members of the vice squad attended each performance in the theater. In this period a minimum of 20,000 patrons attended the theater.

When petitioner first learned of the arrests in the theater, on about the 19th of January 1957, he immediately contacted the office of the sheriff and learned the cause of the arrests and he then learned of other arrests that had been made and of the fact that persons of homosexual propensities were among his patrons and that they had attempted lewd acts within the premises. He then attempted to retain deputy sheriffs in uniform to work in the theater during their off hours but after this was first arranged he was advised that it was against the policy of the sheriff's department to permit the sheriff's deputies to take outside employment and that he should get a private detective to do that work. This he did and from that time on a private detective was at all times on duty in the theater. On several occasions this detective requested persons who were believed to be of undesirable character to leave the theater although no lewd acts were observed. Finally, the defendant engaged the services of a uniformed private patrolman to assist the plain clothes private detective whom he had employed but on the following day the theater was closed by the sheriff on the grounds that it was a public nuisance.

The officer in charge of the sheriff's vice squad testified that 10 of the 19 arrests were made after the employment of the private detective by the petitioner; a darkened theater was "a pretty poor place to make observations of criminal acts"; and that the theater therefore constituted a serious police problem and that the sheriff's office could not properly police it so as to prevent the commission of lewd acts, such as we have heretofore described, by the patrons.

No evidence was offered against the character of petitioner or that the petitioner had knowingly allowed into the theater any person known by him to have committed or attempted to commit any lewd act therein or that he had failed to eject from the premises any such person.

The referee found and reported to the board that 19 arrests for violation of Penal Code, section 647, subdivision 5, had been made during the period of October 25, 1956, to March 17, 1957; that the number of arrests at the theater indicated that a number of individuals with homosexual tendencies frequented "the area"; the semidarkened theater provided an ideal place for the promotion of such activities and that "the surreptitious actions of such persons could well go unobserved by patrons" unless they were personally contacted. He concluded that the activities of the homosexually inclined patrons of the theater clearly established that the continued operation of the theater constituted a public nuisance and was extremely detrimental to the public welfare.

Section 83 of the County Licensing Ordinance upon which the respondents found their right to deny a license to petitioner reads in part as follows:

"The Board * * * shall not * * * grant, and the Tax Collector shall not issue a license to carry on any business, occupation or activity, if such business * * * has been * * * any one or more of the following:

"* * * (b) A public nuisance.

"(c) In any way detrimental to the public interest.

"(d) Prohibited by [this is followed by the number and title of the county zoning ordinance]." (Italics ours.)

Section 84 provides that the license may be denied if the applicant is unfit to be trusted with the privileges granted by the license.

It is respondents' contention that the evidence before the referee establishes that petitioner's business was a public nuisance, that it was detrimental to the public welfare and that applicant was shown to be an unfit person to conduct the business. They also assert that due to the presence in the area of persons of homosexual proclivities the board could find that the theater was not a proper place to conduct a motion picture theater despite the fact that the property was zoned for use for that purpose. None of these contentions can be sustained.

[2] The business of operating a motion picture theater is a lawful one of beneficial character and not inherently dangerous to the public and while it may be subject to reasonable regulation it may not be prohibited. Central States Theatre Corporation v. Sar, 245 Iowa 1254, 66 N.W.2d 450, 455-457; 86 C.J.S. Theaters & Shows § 3, p. 668; 16A C.J.S. Constitutional Law § 668, pp. 1061-1063; and see collaterally 11 Cal.Jur.2d 561-562. It is not asserted nor would the evidence sustain such an assertion that petitioner conducted his business in any other manner than motion picture theaters are ordinarily conducted. It is not asserted that he countenanced, consented to or in any wise permitted any lewd or immoral acts upon the premises. It cannot be said, therefore, that the business conducted by him constituted a public nuisance although it may be that the acts of those who gained lawful entrance to the theater might be detrimental to those of the public who observed them or who were molested by these unfortunate deviates. It is their acts which were seemingly beyond the control of either the police or petitioner which were detrimental to the public interests, not the operation of a motion picture theater. The fact that a motion picture theater, being a darkened place, provides opportunity for these persons to assert their unnatural proclivities is true of every theater, motion picture or legitimate, or of any other place to which the public is admitted and which through the nature of the business transacted therein is darkened; and if, because the condition permits of the performance of some lewd act, this makes the place a public nuisance then all such places are public nuisances. To so hold would be absurd.

[3] The assertion that the board could deny a license because, although the property was zoned and the building designed for use as a theater, the board could find that it was a wrong location in which to conduct a theatrical business seems to us unsound. The fact, if it be a fact, that an area is frequented by homosexuals could in nowise justify the depriving another citizen of the right to conduct a lawful and harmless business in the area. As we have said, there is no evidence that petitioner permitted anyone to enter his premises who had conducted himself in a lewd manner thereon nor is there any evidence that he admitted anyone of known homosexual proclivities; nor could he have refused admission to persons of that character who had not committed or attempted any lewd act upon the premises, for such persons have a legal right to be admitted to any place of public amusement. Stoumen v. Reilly, 37 Cal.2d 713, 716, 234 P.2d 969; Orloff v. Los Angeles Turf Club, 36 Cal.2d 734, 227 P.2d 449; Nickola v. Munro, Cal.App., 328 P.2d 271.

[4] Respondents argued that the fact that petitioner was unable to prevent the commission of lewd acts within his premises establishes that he is a person unfit to hold a license to operate such a theater. There is no merit in such a contention. He could not legally refuse admission to any person even though he knew him to be a homosexual unless that person had theretofore committed a lewd act upon the premises; and, it is admitted and shown by the evidence to be an impossibility to police in a darkened theater the surreptitious acts of each patron. The law does not require the impossible. It could be as well contended that the fact that the lewd acts were committed in the theater showed the incompetency of the sheriff's vice squad for if they, by constant surveillance, were unable to prevent these acts, how is it to be contended that the petitioner might do so.

The facts in this case are not comparable to those involved in Kershaw v. Dept. of Alcohol Bev. Control, 155 Cal.App.2d 544, 318 P.2d 494, or Nickola v. Munro, supra. In each of those cases the evidence showed that the person holding a license from the Department of Alcohol Beverage Control had so conducted his or her business as to countenance and in fact promote lewd and lascivious acts among the patrons of the licensed premises. The opposite is true here for it is unquestioned that petitioner did not countenance but used every endeavor to prevent such acts upon his licensed premises.

[5] The board's power to withhold a license to petitioner was not absolute. In acting upon petitioner's application it acted in a quasi-judicial capacity and it was required to exercise its discretion in accordance with the law and it was necessary that its decision be based upon sufficient evidence. Weiss v. State Board of Equalization, 40 Cal.2d 772, 775, 256 P.2d 1;

Cal. Rep. 329-330 P.2d-23

Stoumen v. Reilly, supra; Riley v. Chambers, 181 Cal. 589, 595, 185 P. 855, 8 A.L.R. 418. Here the evidence was insufficient to support the implied findings of the board or its act in denying a license to petitioner and the board's act was an unreasonable and arbitrary denial of petitioner's right to pursue a lawful occupation.

The judgment is reversed with directions to the trial court to issue a peremptory writ of mandate as prayed for in the petition.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., John M. Huntington, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Presiding Justice.

Defendant-appellant Paul E. Le Blanc was charged with defendant Vernon Harris with the crime of receiving stolen property, set forth in two separate counts. Harris was charged with three prior convictions and appellant with two such convictions, which he admitted. In a consolidated case each defendant was charged with the burglary of a dress shop, of which charge they were acquitted. The jury returned a verdict of guilty as to appellant on count one and guilty as to Harris on the other count of receiving stolen property.

Le Blanc, in propria persona, appealed, and through his court-appointed attorney now claims, as we construe it (1) that the evidence was insufficient to convict appellant of the crime of receiving stolen property; (2) no proper venue or jurisdiction was alleged or proved; (3) no corpus delicti was established; (4) error of the court in denying appellant's motion for an advised verdict at the conclusion of the people's case; and (5) an erroneous instruction was given.

The evidence shows that one Dunaway, bookkeeper for B. F. Goodrich Company branch in El Centro, California, came to work early in the morning of September 22, 1957. The store had been broken into. Considerable merchandise, including a safe, was gone. An inventory was taken. A transistor radio with a specified serial number was among the property missing. All the sales tickets and contracts containing serial numbers were checked and no such radio had been sold from the store. This transistor radio ordinarily sold for $33.95. In late September, 1957, appellant came to the home of one Elizabeth Cottingham, who stated that she lived at 2050 J Street (within the city limits of San Diego); that appellant was carrying a lady's blue suit and asked her if she wanted to buy it. He claimed he and his wife had separated and he wanted some money. The price mark of $58 or $60 was attached to the garment. She paid defendant $10 and he left the suit with her. Later, he came to her home with a transistor radio and sold it to her for $10. She positively identified Le Blanc as the one who sold her these articles which she subsequently turned over to the police. The radio was later, in court, identified by her as the one sold by defendant, and Dunaway identified it by serial number as being the one missing from his store. Later, about October 2nd, when appellant was apprehended, he denied selling a suit or radio to her. About October 30th, he was again interviewed by the officers and was asked why he denied selling the radio to Mrs. Cottingham and he remarked he did not want to implicate himself or anyone else; that he received the dress from someone along Imperial Avenue who had stopped him and asked him to sell it on commission and that he found the transistor radio in his car one night; that someone had borrowed his car (Lee Knox's friends) and he did not notice the radio in it until later and did not know from whence it came. Appellant lived at 3030 Franklin Avenue in San Diego. On the witness stand he claimed he knew nothing about the burglary in El Centro and had never been there; that he did not know Mrs. Cottingham and did not sell her anything, and said that the first time he saw the radio was at his preliminary hearing.

One Lee Knox testified he and one Davis burglarized a dress shop in Del Mar and used appellant's car, and they also committed a burglary in El Centro at the Firestone Store and stole some appliances, transistor radios, etc.; that he kept one of the television sets and turned the rest over to Harris to sell and to divide the proceeds.

Harris testified he knew appellant about that time and roomed with Davis but knew nothing about the El Centro burglary and he never received any property from Davis or Knox. He admitted he had previously been convicted of felonies, to wit, burglary, grand theft and "suspicion of attempted burglary".

[1] A mere résumé of the evidence, notwithstanding appellant's claimed innocence, overwhelmingly supports the verdict of receiving stolen property as charged. People v. Boyden, 116 Cal.App.2d 278, 287, 253 P.2d 773; People v. Malouf, 135 Cal. App.2d 697, 706, 287 P.2d 834; People v. O'Shaughnessy, 135 Cal.App. 104, 110, 26 P.2d 847.

[2] There is no merit to the argument that the evidence did not show appellant received said property in San Diego County and that the prosecution did not establish venue there. The property was stolen in Imperial County. Appellant claims he was never in that county but did live in San Diego County, and it appears that all the transactions involving this radio and its sale took place therein. The proper venue for the crime of receiving stolen property is in the county in which the goods are received. Penal Code, Sec. 777; People v. Baca, 34 Cal.App.2d 284, 287, 93 P.2d 174.

[3] The information does charge that the property stolen was the property of B. F. Goodrich Company, a corporation, without alleging where its place of business was located. Appellant claims it may have been in Russia, China, or Europe, and he was entitled to be informed of this fact, citing such authority as People v. Pond, 44 Cal. 2d 665, 676, 284 P.2d 793; and United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542, 23 L.Ed. 588. Apparently appellant attempts to raise this question for the first time on appeal. The material allegation is that said property was stolen from the specified corporation and that in San Diego County appellant feloniously received it and knew, at the time, that it had been stolen. The gist of the offense was sufficiently alleged to comply with sections 496, 951 and 952 of the Penal Code.

The corpus delicti was sufficiently shown and the court did not err in refusing to grant appellant's motion for an advised verdict in his favor at the close of the people's case under section 1118 of the Penal Code. People v. Ives, 17 Cal.2d 459, 463, 110 P.2d 408; People v. Smith, 26 Cal.2d 854, 858, 161 P.2d 941; People v. Grahle, 67 Cal.App. 183, 188, 227 P. 227; People v. O'Shaughnessy, supra; *People v. [4] No error appears in the giving of an instruction by the court reading in part:

"If you should find from the evidence that a burglary was committed on the premises involved in either of these cases and that thereafter the defendants were found in possession, or claimed to be the owners, of certain property stolen from the burglarized premises, such a fact would be a circumstance tending in some degree to show guilt, although not sufficient, standing alone and unsupported by other evidence, to warrant your finding them guilty."

The instruction as given, when read as a whole, was proper.

Judgment affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Aug. 28, 1958.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 22, 1958.

Hearing Denied Oct. 22, 1958.

Action to enforce trust in favor of alien's family upon proceeds from sale of part of parcel of land sold by alien's son and upon remainder of parcel, which alien's daughter had conveyed to son's child, on ground that land had been purchased under arrangement whereby alien, who had been prohibited by Alien Land Law from owning land, paid purchase price, land was conveyed to trustee and named beneficiary of trust assigned beneficial interest to daughter for benefit of alien's family. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, William J. Palmer, J., rendered judgment, and appeal was taken. The District Court of Appeal, White, P. J., held that evidence sustained finding that alien himself was not included in family as used by him in naming beneficiaries of trust and that trust was valid as against community interest of alien's widow.

1. Husband and Wife ⚭273(12)

In action to enforce trust which was created for benefit of family of alien, who had been prohibited by Alien Land Law from owning land, and who had paid purchase price for land which was conveyed to trustee under arrangement whereby named beneficiary of trust assigned beneficial interest to daughter for benefit of family, evidence sustained finding that alien's wife knew of creation of trust and acquiesced therein. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 671 note; Act May 4, 1882, 22 Stat. 58.

2. Husband and Wife ⚭273(1)

Where alien, who was prohibited from owning land under Alien Land Law, paid purchase price for land, which was conveyed to trustee, and named beneficiary of trust assigned beneficial interest to alien's daughter for benefit of alien's family, trust, which was valid as against alien, was also valid as to community interest of alien's widow. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 671 note; Act May 4, 1882, 22 Stat. 58.

3. Trusts ⚭119

Fact that alien father, who was prohibited by Alien Land Law from owning land, paid purchase price for land, which was conveyed to trustee under arrangement whereby named beneficiary of trust assigned beneficial interest to alien's daughter for benefit of alien's family, and fact that father occupied the land, raised no presumption that father included himself among beneficiaries of trust. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 671 note; Act May 4, 1882, 22 Stat. 58.

In action to enforce trust in favor of alien's family upon proceeds from sale of part of parcel of land sold by alien's son and upon remainder of parcel, which alien's daughter had conveyed to son's child, on ground that land had been purchased under arrangement whereby alien, who had been prohibited by Alien Land Law from owning land, paid purchase price, land was conveyed to trustee and named beneficiary assigned beneficial interest to daughter for benefit of alien's family, evidence sustained finding that alien himself was not included in "family" as used by him in naming beneficiaries of trust. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 671 note; Act May 4, 1882, 22 Stat. 58.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Family".

In action to enforce trust in favor of alien's family upon proceeds from sale of part of parcel of land sold by alien's son and upon remainder of parcel, which alien's daughter had conveyed to son's child, on ground that land had been purchased under arrangement whereby alien, who had been prohibited by Alien Land Law from owning land, paid purchase price, land was conveyed to trustee and named beneficiary assigned beneficial interest to daughter for benefit of alien's family, question whether alien intended children of deceased son to benefit from trust was question of fact to be determined from evidence. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 671 note; Act May 4, 1882, 22 Stat. 58.

6. Trusts 21(2), 60

Where alien, who was prohibited by Alien Land Law from owning land, paid purchase price for land, which was conveyed to trustee, named beneficiary of trust assigned beneficial interest to alien's daughter for benefit of alien's family, land was used as family home and for family business for 22 years before alien's death and nine years thereafter, when his son sold portion of it, practical construction given trust was that property was to be used as family home and for family business so long as that should be best for family and trust was not uncertain as to its purpose or duration. West's Ann.Civ. Code, § 671 note; Act May 4, 1882, 22 Stat. 58.

7. Gifts 49(4)

Where father, who was prohibited by Alien Land Law from owning land made absolute gifts to two daughters of one lot, put adjacent lot in trust for benefit of his family, gave youngest daughter an automobile upon her graduation from high school, took care of son's two oldest children, made a home for them from death of their mother until his own death, and helped son to go to China for his second wife, youngest daughter's statements that father intended to make a gift of farm to her were not improbable or unbelievable on ground that there was no reason for gift. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 671 note; Act May 4, 1882, 22 Stat. 58.

8. Ejectment 95(1)

In action against alien's son by alien's daughter to recover property, which had been conveyed to her at direction of son, who had executed purchase agreement for property, and who claimed that property had been purchased with his money, and which had been subsequently conveyed to son by daughter, who alleged that property had been a gift to her from alien and that she had executed deed to son under threats by son, evidence sustained finding that Chinese writing on check stub to effect that amount of check, which was given as down payment on property, was loaned to son by alien, was not that of alien, was not placed on stub at time check was drawn and sent to vendor, that son had not paid amount of check to alien, and that other payments of purchase price were made by alien's company and were not made with son's money.

9. Husband and Wife 267(9)

In action by daughter against son to recover property, which she had conveyed to son, on ground that property had been a gift to her from her father and that her deed to son had been executed under threats by son, evidence sustained finding that mother acquiesced in gift of property to daughter and that business, from which payments for property were made, was owned by father and not by son.

10. Husband and Wife ⇨267(9)

Where mother acquiesced in father's gift of property to daughter and waived any interest she had in father's business from which payments for property were made, waiver would be presumed to include any right she might otherwise have had in property because of payments made by such business after death of father.

11. Trusts ⇨336

Where alien father, who was prohibited from owning land by Alien Land Law, intended to make gift of land to daughter and property was purchased in name of son, son by his nomination of daughter to receive legal title to property and his statements to daughter that father had told him that property was hers and that title was to be put in her name, voluntarily performed his duty as his father's trustee and it was not necessary to enforce trust.

12. Ejectment ⇨95(1)

In action by alien's daughter against alien's son to recover land, which she had deeded to son under threats, on ground that alien, who had been prohibited from owning land by Alien Land Law, had entered into arrangement whereby land was to be conveyed to daughter by vendor when she became 21 years old, evidence sustained finding that daughter was intended by alien to be owner of the land.

13. Gifts ⇨48

Where father gave daughter impression that she had always owned property, which had been purchased in name of son, and father had carefully arranged with son that she was to take legal title when she became 21 years old, and contract of purchase required conveyance to nominee of son, who was allegedly instructed by father to name daughter as grantee, fact that father did not tell daughter when or how she was to become owner of property was immaterial to question of whether gift had been made.

14. Deeds ⇨203

Where down payment on parcel of land was made with father's money but purchase agreement was made in name of son under arrangement whereby son was to nominate daughter as grantee when purchase price was paid, father's widow waived claim she had against son for his appropriation of father's properties after death of father, and there was no reason for exempting from such waiver any claim she might have arising out of son's instruction to vendor to convey land to daughter, vendor's compliance, or daughter's acceptance of deed, and no one other than widow lost anything by son's act, question whether son exceeded his authority in acting as agent for father after father's death by ordering conveyance was immaterial to question whether daughter, who had later conveyed land to son because of son's threats, was entitled to recover land.

15. Deeds ⇨71

Where sister had been in undisputed ownership of land for more than five years, and her deed to brother was procured by brother's threats and sister's fear induced thereby, deed was properly canceled by court and it was not necessary that it be determined who was real owner of property, in absence of son's showing some other and better right in himself than the legal title acquired by his wrongful act. Guy Richards Crump, John N. Hurtt, Los Angeles, for appellants.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., Robert A. Waring, Los Angeles, for respondents.

WHITE, Presiding Justice.

Three actions were filed, consolidated for trial, and disposed of by one set of findings and conclusions and one judgment. Defendants, other than Corinne Jue Kwok who was not served with process and did not appear in the action, have appealed from the judgment.

The judgment incorporates 22 pages of findings of fact and conclusions of law as to the rights, interests, duties and obligations of the parties. In turn the findings and conclusions incorporate by reference the 12-page notice of decision filed December 28, 1956, and the 6-page supplemental notice of decision filed February 15, 1957.

Many issues in addition to those discussed in the briefs on appeal were litigated in the trial which continued from October 22 to December 18, 1956, was reopened after the service of the notice of decision dated December 28th, and resubmitted on February 8, 1957. Some of the issues not raised on appeal were decided in favor of defendants because of implied waivers, estoppel and the statute of limitations. For the sake of brevity, we hereinafter epitomize only the portions of the judgment under attack and the facts pertinent to the consideration of the issues raised on appeal.

The litigants are the widow, children and grandchildren of Jue Joe, and Attorney Rush M. Blodget, as Executor of Jue Joe's will.

Jue Joe was born in China in 1870, came to Southern California about 1886, and remained here until 1902, when he returned to China and married Leong Shee, who was born in China in 1885. In China two sons were born to them: San You Jue, herein and generally called "Sam", born in 1903; and San Tong Jue, herein and generally called "San Tong", born in 1905.

In 1905 Jue Joe returned to Southern California. He spoke little English and wrote only a little Chinese. His American neighbors became his friends and those friendships continued until his death. He worked from daylight until dark, seven days a week, raised asparagus and other vegetables on large farms in several counties, marketed his produce in Los Angeles, and saved his money.

In 1918 Jue Joe sent for Leong Shee, Sam and San Tong, who then came from China and joined him in Southern California. Here two daughters were born: Corinne in 1919 and Dorothy in 1921.

Sam died in Los Angeles in 1933, leaving a widow, Maxine May Kam Jue, called "May", and three daughters, June C. born in 1925, Maxine V. born in 1927, and Leatrice born in 1928.

February 26, 1941, Jue Joe died in San Fernando Valley. He left a widow, Leong Shee, a son and two daughters, San Tong, Corinne and Dorothy, seven grandchildren, June, Maxine and Leatrice, daughters of his deceased son Sam, Jack and Joan, children of San Tong and his first wife Rose who died in 1935, Soo Jan and Guy, children of San Tong and his second wife Ping.

Between the time of Jue Joe's death in 1941 and the trial in 1956, Corinne, Dorothy, Jack and Joan were married, and eight more grandchildren and several great-grandchildren were born.

Each member of the family, as above outlined, was also known by several other names, some Chinese and some American, some given in accordance with ancient Chinese customs, and some probably accidental as "Sam" for San You Jue, but throughout this decision we will refer to each as listed above.

Notwithstanding the California Alien Land Law, Civil Code, § 671 note, and the federal Chinese Exclusion Act, 22 Stat. 58, Jue Joe with the assistance of his friends invested some of his savings in a number of parcels of California real property, paid for them in annual instalments, and had contracts made in the names of, and titles conveyed to, other persons. Only two parcels so purchased are subjects of the instant appeal. They are "Lot 690", about 50 acres in San Fernando Valley (now in the Van Nuys District of the City of Los Angeles), and the "Tulare property", about 90 acres near Porterville in Tulare County. Jue Joe farmed both properties from their purchase until his death. The facts and issues regarding title to these two parcels of real property differ materially and will be hereafter separately stated.

Lot 690

Appellants assign as error the decision that Lot 690 was owned by Leong Shee, San Tong, Corinne, Dorothy and Maxine as Administratrix of the Estate of her deceased father Sam, as tenants in common, each owning an undivided one-fifth. Corinne, Dorothy and Maxine have not appealed.

Although apparently all defendants (except Corinne) are appellants, in their opening brief they state that their contention at the trial based upon oral evidence of declarations of Jue Joe that Corinne held title to Lot 690 in trust for the benefit of Jack, the firstborn grandson, and not for the family was decided against them upon conflicting evidence; and they "admit that there is substantial evidence supporting the holding against Jack and in favor of a trust" for "the family" of Jue Joe.

Appellants urge that, even if Jue Joe succeeded in creating a valid trust as to Lot 690, it could involve only his half of the community property and have no effect upon the half belonging to Leong Shee. Leong Shee is the only defendant-appellant who could have been prejudiced by the failure of the court to award her one-half of Lot 690 as her community interest. By the judgment, the court undertook to enforce the trust "for the family" as to the whole of Lot 690, not against Corinne, the trustee who conscientiously tried to perform her duties and received no benefit from San Tong's usurpation, but against San Tong and Jack who have shown no right whatever for San Tong's taking of the proceeds of the sale of 35 acres and having title to the remaining 15 acres transferred to Jack.

[1,2] Although Leong Shee was herself a party and a witness at the trial, she did not claim for herself any community or other interest in Lot 690. There is evidence in the record that she was present in 1942 when San Tong demanded that Corinne deed the property to Jack to prevent Corinne's husband from getting it away from "the family", when Corinne handed the deed to Dorothy requesting that she make sure Lot 690 was held for "the family", and when Dorothy promised that she would. We cannot say that, as a matter of law, the trial court erred in determining that Leong Shee knew of the creation of the trust by Jue Joe and acquiesced therein. Therefore, if the trust was valid as against Jue Joe, it is likewise valid as to the community interest of Leong Shee. Appellants urge further that the trust is invalid because of the uncertainty of its terms. As to community property, Leong Shee was the only heir at law of Jue Joe, and she was the only beneficiary named in his will. Jue Joe had no debts. If the trust was too uncertain to be validly enforced as to the property of Jue Joe, likewise it was unenforceable as to the interest of Leong Shee, and the whole of Lot 690 belonged to Leong Shee upon Jue Joe's death.

It is therefore necessary to review the evidence tending to support the judgment that the trust "for the family" was valid. There are over 3,000 pages of reporter's transcript, 102 exhibits introduced by plaintiffs, and 199 exhibits introduced by defendants. The evidence is conflicting in many respects.

With the help of his friend, O. F. Brant of the Title Insurance & Trust Company, Jue Joe bought Lot 690 from one Anderson in 1919, the year of Corinne's birth. Deed dated October 29, 1919, conveyed title in trust to Title Insurance & Trust Company subject to Anderson's trust deed to Title Guarantee & Trust Company securing Anderson's indebtedness of $18,000. The Declaration of Trust dated November 1, 1919, recites that no part of the consideration was paid by Title Insurance & Trust Company and certifies that said property is held by it in trust for O. F. Brant, beneficiary. The specified purpose of the trust is to convey "upon written demand" to said "O. F. Brant or order". Assignment of Beneficial Interest to Corinne (referred to therein by her Chinese name "Ah How Jew"), signed by O. F. Brant and Sue E. Brant, is dated November 7, 1919. In the same file of the Title Company was a letter signed by Corinne as Ah How Jew, dated March 18, 1940, directing the Title Insurance & Trust Company to convey Lot 690 to her and, as a part of the same document, under date of March 19, 1940, appears Corinne's receipt for an unrecorded quitclaim deed of the property and her acknowledgment of the termination of the trust.

From the purchase of Lot 690 in 1919 until his death in 1941, Jue Joe and his family lived upon Lot 690 and considered it their family home. Jue Joe, his wife, children and grandchildren (with the exception of Sam's children after Sam's death) lived there. Jue Joe and his sons grew asparagus on the unoccupied portion of it and marketed the asparagus as a part of Jue Joe's business, sometimes referred to as "Jue Joe Company" and sometimes as "the family business". During a part of this time, the adjoining 50 acres of Lot 691, which had been bought by Jue Joe and conveyed to Corinne and Dorothy as absolute owners, was likewise used for farming and marketing as a part of the family business. Although a guardian of the estates of the two minor daughters had been appointed, no accounts were rendered. Apparently, during his entire life, Jue Joe took care of his family and no thought was given to rents, profits or wages which might be due from any member of the family to any other.

Up to the time of his death in 1941, Jue Joe also carried on large farming projects near Newhall and Saugus in Los Angeles County, and in Tulara County, and at various times he farmed other lands in Los Angeles and Riverside counties. He taught his sons to grow and market asparagus and other vegetables, gave San Tong a high school education, cared for San Tong's two oldest children, Jack and Joan, after their mother's death, helped San Tong to return to China to marry his second wife, Ping, sent Corinne to the University of California at Los Angeles, and Dorothy to the University of Southern California.

Corinne had been told many times, from her earliest childhood up to her father's death in 1941, that she was "to hold title to Lot 690 * * * for the benefit of the family", and she had always told her father that she would. She didn't hear "any technicalities" about it, but her father had told her that she owned the property and was to hold it for the family, to give it to them. After Corinne's twenty-first birthday in 1940, she received the deed from the title company. Before that she had thought that the title was in her name. Then, in 1940, her father again told her to keep Lot 690 for the family, and she promised him that she would.

After Jue Joe's death in February, 1941, the family's use and occupancy of Lot 690 continued as before, except that San Tong acted as head of the family, managed the farms, marketed the produce, handled the money, and "advanced" to Dorothy and the others the money they needed. Dorothy continued her studies at the university. Each member of the family "did something to help" in the business.

July 4, 1942, Corinne married Lansing Kwok. She telephoned from San Francisco to tell San Tong of her marriage, and he told her to come down to Los Angeles at once and attend to Lot 690. She came down by plane, and on July 11th signed a deed in favor of Jack. The deed is dated June 11, 1942, but Corinne testified that it was signed on July 11, 1942. After she signed it she wanted to keep it, but San Tong said that Lot 690 was "for the family" and the deed should be in more neutral hands so her husband wouldn't get it if anything should happen to her in a plane crash or an accident. She noticed and mentioned to San Tong that the deed described her as a single woman. He said perhaps it was better that way, otherwise her husband might have to know about it. She handed the deed to Dorothy and said "Be sure it is for our family". Dorothy said "Yes". San Tong and Leong Shee were both present and she did not remember that they said anything at that time.

In January, 1950, while Corinne was in Hong Kong she received a letter from Charles E. Cook, Jr., as attorney for San Tong, requesting that a new deed in favor of Jack be signed by her. Attorney Cook said in that letter "I am sure that you are familiar with the fact of the sale of the land here, belonging to the family, including yourself and Dorothy * * *" The only enclosure was the deed of Lot 690 from Corinne to Jack, and, pursuant to the request in the letter, Corinne signed it. She mailed it to Dorothy, relying upon her to see that Lot 690 and the proceeds of the sale were kept for the family. When she returned to California in September or October, 1950, she asked San Tong where the money from the sale of Lot 690 was. He said he was going to take care of the family with it and she believed and trusted him.

Dorothy testified that she saw Corinne sign the deed to Jack in July of 1942 and it was kept in the safe deposit box of Corinne and Dorothy until January, 1945, when San Tong asked Dorothy to let him hold it while she was back east attending Johns Hopkins University. He followed her to the bank, she got the deed out of the safe deposit box and handed it to him. That was the last she saw of it until the escrow in 1950. When, in 1950, Dorothy handed San Tong the new deed from Corinne to Jack, San Tong promised Dorothy that he would give May and her three girls some of the proceeds of the sale of Lot 690.

Other documents in evidence are a general power of attorney from Jack to San Tong, a grant deed from Jack (by San Tong under said power of attorney) to Southwest Properties, Inc., a letter dated March 10, 1950, from the escrow officer to Jack, handed to San Tong, his attorney in fact, mentioning a check for $107,633.71 enclosed, and cancelled checks from the escrow holder to Jack for $107,633.71, $8,475.11, and $5,000, or a total of $121,108.82, in addition to the $10,000 received by San Tong for Jack outside of escrow.

No rents or profits of Lot 690 were paid to Corinne, either before or after her marriage, and none were ever paid to Jack. Up to the time of the sale in 1950 the improvements on Lot 690 were simple and cheap. Corinne, Dorothy, Jack and Joan, at the times of their marriages, ceased to live there. Using some of the proceeds of the sale, San Tong constructed on the unsold portion of Lot 690, a large home with swimming pool, patio, barbecue, fish pond and flower garden. He, his wife Ping, their four children, and Leong Shee were still living there at the time of the trial.

Appellants contend that a trust "for the family" is invalid because the term "family" is not a sufficient designation of the beneficiaries. While they have quoted many varying and different definitions of the word "family", as said by the trial judge in his Notice of Ruling on the Motion for New Trial: "* * * the question which confronts us is not how dictionaries, judges and lexicographers have defined the word in writings with which Jue Joe was wholly unfamiliar * * *" but rather what was meant by Jue Joe when he taught Corinne from babyhood that Lot 690 was "for the family" and on several occasions procured her solemn promise to him that she would hold it for the family and give it to them.

The trial court found that "the family" was understood by both the trustor and trustee to consist of Jue Joe's widow, his three children living at the time of his death in 1941, and the children of his deceased son; and that the property should be divided in five equal parts, one for Jue Joe's widow, one for each of his three children, and one to be divided between the children of his deceased son.

It is contended by appellants in their opening brief that, as a matter of law, Jue Joe was included in "the family" and his interest would have passed to Leong Shee at his death.

[3] There is in the record no direct evidence that Jue Joe included himself among the beneficiaries of the trust, and it has been held by the California Supreme Court that no such presumption arises from the fact that an alien parent ineligible for citizenship paid the purchase price of land conveyed to his American born child. In re Estate of Yano, 188 Cal. 645, 650, 206 P. 995. Nor did any such presumption arise from the fact that the alien father occupied the land. People v. Fujita, 215 Cal. 166, 170, 171, 8 P.2d 1011.

Appellants quote and rely upon the statement of the Supreme Court in Hills v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 207 Cal. 666, at page 668, 279 P. 805, at page 806, 65 A.L.R. 266, that, "The husband, if living, is, of course, a member of the family". That statement, however, is dicta. The court there decided that the granting of a "family" allowance to a husband was not authorized by Section 1466 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The provision of Section 156 of the Civil Code that "The husband is the head of the family" is next quoted by appellants. That sentence is followed by the statement that "He may choose any reasonable place or mode of living, and the wife must conform thereto".

Other cases cited by the parties are to the effect that the "family" includes the husband (Estate of Lamb, 95 Cal. 397, 407, 30 P. 568); relatives of a predeceased husband (In re Estate of Watts, 179 Cal. 20, 23, 175 P. 415); an acknowledged illegitimate son taken into the family (In re Estate of Lund, 26 Cal.2d 472, 494, 159 P.2d 643, 162 A.L.R. 606); the acknowledged son of a bachelor and his house servant (In re Estate of Gird, 157 Cal. 534, 545, 108 P. 499); nieces and nephews and children of deceased nieces and nephews (In re Estate of McCrum, 97 Cal.App. 576, 275 P. 971); and that the "family" does not include one's brothers and sisters when one is married and has children of her own (In re Estate of Bennett, 134 Cal. 320, 323, 66 P. 370); or a debtor's mother living apart from him (Lawson v. Lawson, 158 Cal. 446, 449-451, 111 P. 354).

Obviously, whether Jue Joe intended to include himself among the beneficiaries designated by him as "the family" is not concluded by any of the above mentioned statutes or decisions. His intention as expressed to Corinne was a question of fact to be determined by the trial court.

The phrases "the family", "my family" and "our family" do not necessarily include the head of the family or the speaker. The words must be construed with reference to the circumstances under which they are used. Considering all the evidence before the court in the instant action, including Jue Joe's pride in the American citizenship of his daughters and grandchildren, the court's knowledge that any interest of a Chinese alien in California land was then subject to escheat proceedings, the inference is not only warranted but practically inescapable that Jue Joe, smart business man that he was, intended to exclude from "the family" who were the beneficiaries of the trust not only himself but also his wife and sons who were born in China.

[4] We are convinced that the evidence is sufficient to support the finding and conclusion of the trial court that Jue Joe himself was not included in "the family" as used by him in naming the beneficiaries of the trust.

Since no claim is made on the instant appeal that either Sam Tong or Leong Shee was entitled to less than the interest given by the judgment, it is not necessary to determine whether the evidence was sufficient to support the finding that they were intended by Jue Joe to be included in "the family" as beneficiaries.

Appellants cite as error the trial court's decision that Sam's children were intended to participate as beneficiaries. They urge that, if those grandchildren of Jue Joe are entitled to participate in the division of the trust property, they should share equally with the other members of the family, and not take "in the right of Sam" who died in 1933.

[5] Whether Jue Joe intended Sam's children to benefit from the trust is a question of fact to be determined from the evidence. There is testimony that Corinne and Dorothy believed he did, and that San Tong promised in 1950 that he would see that they received a share of the proceeds of the sale of Lot 690. The inference was properly drawn that Sam's children were part of the family and entitled to share in the benefits of the trust.

Since no member of Sam's family has appealed, and the appellants were not prejudiced by Sam's family getting only one-fifth of the beneficial interest in the trust property instead of the three-sevenths to which they would have been entitled had they shared equally with Leong Shee, San Tong, Corinne and Dorothy, we will not further discuss that portion of appellants' argument.

From a study of the cases cited and others, as well as the evidence before the court, we find no reason to reverse the judgment because of any uncertainty as to who were the members of "the family" entitled to benefit from the trust.

[6] While appellants mention in their briefs that they consider the trust as to Lot 690 uncertain as to its purpose and duration also, it is difficult to follow their reasoning in that regard. There is evidence before the court that Lot 690 was used as the family home and for the purpose of growing asparagus for the family business from 1919 until 1950, that San Tong then sold 35 of its 50 acres, appropriated the proceeds of the sale, had title to the remaining 15 acres conveyed to Jack, and took exclusive possession of the unsold portion himself. The practical construction given the trust by Jue Joe, Corinne, San Tong, Jack and Dorothy, seems to have been sufficiently certain. Lot 690 was to be used as the family home and for the growing of asparagus so long as that should be best for the family. From Jue Joe's death in 1941, San Tong, himself, used Lot 690 as the family home and for the raising of asparagus. In 1950 when the land was no longer suitable for the growing of asparagus and was in demand for subdivision, San Tong arranged the sale. Apparently then all agreed that the time had come for the sale of the land and the closing of the trust. At the request of San Tong's attorney, Corinne then in China executed a deed to Jack, sent it to Dorothy, who in turn handed it to San Tong. San Tong then stated to Dorothy that the proceeds of the sale would be for the family including Sam's children. San Tong was trusted by the entire family to manage the sale and at the same time trusted with Jack's general power of attorney. All trusted San Tong to see that the beneficiaries received their respective portions of the proceeds of the sale. The trial court found no uncertainty in these respects, and none appears upon the instant appeal.

As authority for reversal, appellants cite and rely upon the following decisions: Wittfield v. Forster, 124 Cal. 418, 57 P. 219; Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 192, 58 P. 543; Lefrooth v. Prentice, 202 Cal. 215, 227-228, 259 P. 947; In re Estate of Ralston, 1 Cal.2d 724, 726, 37 P.2d 76, 96 A.L.R. 953; In re Estate of Zilke, 115 Cal.App. 63, 1 P.2d 475; and McElroy v. McElroy, 32 Cal.2d 828, 831, 198 P.2d 683.

As to facts and relief sought, the instant action differs from the decisions last above cited. The Wittfield v. Forster case, supra, sought to cancel a deed absolute and quiet title in an alleged beneficiary of the land conveyed by a decedent. In Sheehan v. Sullivan, supra, there was no evidence of any declaration or understanding respecting any trust, even oral.

The evidence in Lefrooth v. Prentice, supra, was that the purported donor and trustee of securities made no declaration of trust, even oral, remained in possession and control and made no accounting after their sale; that instead he claimed unsuccessfully that a ranch purchased in his own name was purchased with the proceeds of the securities and was held by him in trust for his children, and therefore was exempt from execution on outstanding judgments against him.

Mr. Chief Justice Waste, speaking for the Supreme Court, in In re Estate of Ralston, supra [1 Cal.2d 724, 37 P.2d 77], where the pertinent provision of decedent's will gave to the named executor "in trust" with "absolute authority to dispose of this my entire estate as he may see fit" and "as I could if I were still alive", upheld the decision of the trial court that "The 'trust' here involved is defective and invalid because of its complete failure to indicate either the object or the persons to benefit thereby".

In re Estate of Zilke, supra [115 Cal. App. 63, 1 P.2d 476], involved a bequest to "Offens home of San Francisco", and no evidence had been offered to remove the ambiguity as to testator's intended beneficiary. On appeal the decree distributing the estate to seven orphans homes in San Francisco was reversed with directions that evidence of testator's intention be received if offered.

McElroy v. McElroy, supra, affirmed a money judgment against the parents of defendant husband in a divorce action for the reason that the wife was also a beneficiary of the community funds left in trust with them by their son, her husband.

We consider none of the cited decisions applicable to the facts of the instant action. We are persuaded by the entire record on the instant appeal that it was not error for the court to enforce the trust in favor of the "family" of Jue Joe.

Tulare Property

In regard to the Tulare property, a 90-acre farm near Porterville, in Tulare County, California, the trial court found and determined:

(1) That about the year 1933, a lease, and thereafter an agreement for the purchase of the Tulare property from one Scott Manlove were entered into in the name of San Tong;

(2) That San Tong for a long time has been in possession of said property;

(3) That Dorothy is the owner thereof;

(4) That between December 8, 1942, the date of the deed from Manlove to Dorothy, and August 24, 1948, the date of Dorothy's deed to San Tong, Dorothy was the owner of the property subject only to the purchase money trust deed executed by Dorothy in favor of Manlove upon which the last payment was made in 1944;

(5) That no adverse claim of ownership was made by San Tong or anyone else prior to August 24, 1948, when San Tong induced Dorothy to execute the deed to him by threats of physical violence which caused her to fear bodily injury and possible death at his hands;

(6) That Dorothy's consent and execution of the deed were not "real or free" but solely because of her fear of unlawful and violent injury; that San Tong intentionally induced such fear for the purpose of forcing Dorothy to execute said deed; and that any reasonable person situated as was Dorothy would have been in like fear of San Tong;

(7) That after she had consulted attorneys and been advised as to the remedy available, Dorothy immediately rescinded her deed to San Tong;

(8) That San Tong, ever since August 24, 1948, has used said land solely for his own profit and benefit and has not accounted to Dorothy for any part thereof;

(9) That since August 24, 1948, San Tong has been a trustee for Dorothy;

(10) That from the date of the filing of the instant action, September 16, 1952, to the date of the trial, March 1, 1957, the value of the use of the property to San Tong was $23,011.06, actually collected by him in cash from persons to whom he rented the property, from which amount there should be deducted $4,082.26, the amount paid by him for taxes and maintenance during that period, leaving a balance of $18,928.80, which should be paid by him to Dorothy for the use of the land from September 16, 1952 to March 1, 1957.

It is urged by appellants that since the finding of a gift from Jue Joe to Dorothy is supported only by the testimony of Dorothy, and Dorothy's testimony is so improbable as to be wholly unbelievable, the court's finding and decision that Dorothy was the owner of the Tulare property is without the support of any substantial evidence and must be reversed on the instant appeal.

In their opening brief they state that "the great current of the evidence is against a gift and the only evidence which it can be contended brings the case within the rule which governs in cases where there is a material conflict of evidence is the uncorroborated testimony of Dorothy that her father gave her the property and that San Tong subsequently acquiesced."

In this regard, appellants quote from and rely upon In re Estate of Tarrant, 38 Cal.2d 42, 51, 237 P.2d 505, 509, wherein the Supreme Court said: "While it is true that 'the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed on appeal if the record discloses substantial evidence to support them,' * * * such rule has no pertinency where the evidence without conflict clearly establishes the impropriety of the inferences drawn by the court from the uncontroverted facts".

Cited by appellants in the same connection are the following decisions:

People v. Haydon, 18 Cal.App. 543, 555-556, 123 P. 1102, 1108, 1114, from which we quote: "* * * A statement, to bear upon its face the brand of improbability, or which may be said to be unbelievable per se, must involve, we think, a claim that something has been done that it would not seem possible could be done under the circumstances described, or involve conduct that no one but a person of a seriously calentured mentality would be likely to do."

People v. Erking, 119 Cal.App.2d 551, 555, 259 P.2d 492, 494, from which we quote: "* * * Where the testimony of a witness * * * accords with facts established by other proof or with well known physical laws or laws governing human conduct, then it is not inherently improbable * * *"

Kircher v. Atchison T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 32 Cal.2d 176, 183, 184, 195 P.2d 427, 432, from which we quote: "* * * Although an appellate court will not uphold a verdict or judgment based upon evidence inherently improbable * * *, unless we can say that plaintiff's version of the accident was wholly unacceptable to reasonable minds, we cannot set aside the jury's implied acceptance of it. * * *"

"It is true, that as related by plaintiff, the manner in which the accident happened appears to have been most extraordinary. But as stated in Neilson v. Houle [200 Cal. 726, 729, 254 P. 891], 'common experience and observation teach us that strange and astonishing things sometimes happen * * *'"

The reasons assigned by appellants for the improbability and unbelievable character of Dorothy's testimony are:

(1) There was no reason for a gift to Dorothy;

(2) The Tulare property had not been paid for in full when Jue Joe is said to have told Dorothy he was giving it to her;

(3) A gift to Dorothy would defraud Leong Shee of her community interest;

(4) If the property had been given to Dorothy by Jue Joe, San Tong would not have done these things: (a) paid for the Tulare property with his own money; (b) worked for years in the cultivating and farming the property without compensation; and (c) made extensive improvements and repairs at his own expense and without consulting Dorothy; and

(5) If the property had been given to Dorothy by Jue Joe, Dorothy would not have done these things: (a) permitted San Tong to retain all rents and profits for many years without insisting on an accounting; and (b) conveyed the property to San Tong's children at San Tong's insistence when she was going to Johns Hopkins to study.

As "applicable" to the first, second and third reasons given, appellants in their opening brief quote from Hansen v. Bear Film Co., 28 Cal.2d 154, 170-172, 168 P.2d 946, 957, an excerpt which includes the following: " * * * Oscar Hansen was not the man to do this thing. With all his devotion to his mother, he was not the person to turn over to her as a cold gift practically everything he had in this world. With what the evidence shows of his temperament, disposition and traits,—particularly his tremendous ambition, and his determination to eliminate competition in his line, all these things, coupled with the fact that he had made it all 'the hard way,' and after a very tough struggle, it simply cannot be concluded, * * * (that he decided) to immediately give away the whole thing, 'lock, stock and barrel', to his mother who was already apparently living comfortably and with a sufficiency considering her modest needs. If there ever was an improvident gift this would be it * * *

"It is thus apparent that the evidence gives rise to the inference that the transfers made by Oscar to Josephine were transfers of legal title only, and that Oscar at all times intended to and did retain the full beneficial ownership."

[7] Appellants' first, second and third reasons are not persuasive. Jue Joe could not own land in California. He loved the land and he loved his daughters who could own it. He made an absolute gift to Corinne and Dorothy of Lot 691 adjacent to Lot 690, which he put in trust with Corinne for "the family", as hereinbefore set forth. He gave Dorothy an automobile upon her graduation from high school. He took care of San Tong's two oldest children and made a home for them from the death of their mother until his own death. He "helped" San Tong to go to China for his second wife, Ping. Such a man needed no special reason to make an additional gift to his youngest child.

In Back v. Farnsworth, 25 Cal.App.2d 212, 218, 219, 77 P.2d 295, not cited by the parties, it is held that testimony that plaintiff had completely paid for real property bought on contract from decedent, that some months before her death she had given plaintiff all her papers referring to the property and told him she would sign a deed whenever he brought one to her, and that he had failed to ask for the deed before her death, is not inherently improbable, especially in view of their lack of acquaintance with legal proceedings or the formal requirements of transferring title to real property, remembering that plaintiff, decedent and her husband were good friends from the same country, that they were not well educated, and that they expressed themselves in English with great difficulty.

In considering the improbability and unbelievable quality of Dorothy's testimony concerning the Tulare property, the court had before it the entire record which included satisfactory proof that Jue Joe had bought property having title put in Woi King, a Chinese friend who was an American citizen, and later had sold that property receiving the consideration himself; that he had bought Lot 691 having title put in the names of his two baby daughters, for whom guardians had then been appointed; that as to Lot 691 the girls were taught from childhood that it belonged to them; that he had bought Lot 690, having title put in trust in the name of Title Insurance & Trust Company for the benefit of his friend, Brant, who in turn and at almost the same time made an informal and unrecorded assignment of beneficial interest to Corinne; that although Corinne was taught from babyhood that she owned Lot 690 and must give it to the family, she received legal title from the title company after she was 21 years of age; that several years before his death, Jue Joe told Dorothy the Tulare property was to be hers; that when Dorothy became 21 years of age in 1942, title to the Tulare property was put in her name; and that, according to her testimony, San Tong then told Dorothy that Jue Joe had told him the property was hers and to have the title put in her name. While no assignment of beneficial interest, or document naming the person to take title to the Tulare property appears in the record, in many respects this deal parallels other deals made by Jue Joe. Most of the purchase price of Lot 690 remained unpaid in 1921 when the informal assignment to Corinne of the beneficial interest was made by Brant, who acted as nominal beneficiary to aid his friend Jue Joe. It must be remembered that Jue Joe spoke very little English and wrote and read none, and that he had depended upon his friends and relatives to handle many things for him. It is not improbable or inherently unbelievable that he so depended upon his son, San Tong, in the purchase of the Tulare property for Dorothy.

With regard to the Tulare property as with Lot 690, Jue Joe retained no power in himself to prevent title going to his daughter upon her 21st birthday. It seems to us probable, considering the Alien Land Law of that time, that Leong Shee fully acquiesced in the gift to Dorothy. Apparently, Jue Joe, Dorothy and San Tong so understood.

From Jue Joe's death in 1941 to 1948, San Tong's right to exercise all the powers and prerogatives of the "head" of a Chinese family was not questioned by anyone. He ran the family home on Lot 690, which Corinne held in trust for the family; he ran the business of growing asparagus and other vegetables for market upon Lot 690, upon Lot 691, which belonged outright to Corinne and Dorothy, and upon many other properties theretofore farmed by Jue Joe, including the Tulare property; he marketed the produce from all the properties through the Jue Joe Company business at Central Market in Los Angeles; he furnished his mother and sisters with money needed by them, had them sign income tax returns showing that they were partners in Jue Joe Company, and told Dorothy there would be an accounting later.

In 1942, Corinne, to protect the family's beneficial interest in Lot 690, at San Tong's request made a deed to Jack and left it with Dorothy. Later Dorothy, also at San Tong's request, made a deed of the Tulare property to Guy and Soo Jan, and left her own and Corinne's deed with San Tong for safekeeping.

San Tong's good faith, honesty and efficiency were not questioned until he threatened Dorothy's safety and her life to procure her deed to himself of the Tulare property in 1948.

It is appellants' contention that San Tong, and not Jue Joe, bought and paid for the Tulare property, and in this connection they say "Respondents cannot dispute the physical evidence in Jue Joe's own handwriting, that the $4,000.00 check of Jue Joe to Manlove was a loan to San Tong. That appears from Jue Joe's Chinese writing on the check stub 'Tong owes money'."

[8] Considering the record as a whole, including San Tong's ability to produce exhibits (even personal letters many years old) to strengthen his own claims, his failure to produce from records which had admittedly been in his possession the items requested by respondents, his own conflicting statements, his taking possession of all the contents of his father's safe deposit box after his death and before the bank learned of it, his assumption with the passive consent of his mother and sisters of complete control of the family property, money, records, and business, his representations that his mother and sisters were partners, his advancing to his mother and sisters the moneys needed by them, his statements to Dorothy that they would all have an accounting later, and the trial court's determination that much of his sworn testimony was untrue, there seems to be no reason why respondents, and the court, should not doubt that the Chinese writing on the check stub was that of Jue Joe, or was placed on the stub at the time his check was drawn and sent to Manlove as the down payment on the Tulare property, or that San Tong ever paid the $4,000 to Jue Joe, or that the other payments upon the purchase price made by the Jue Joe Company were made with San Tong's money.

[9,10] San Tong's contention is that the Tulare property belongs to him because he paid for it with moneys of the Jue Joe Company; "but this contention is based upon the premise that after 1928 he was the sole owner of the business". The court found that Jue Joe was the sole owner of the business up to the time of his death in 1941. Consequently, the payments on the Tulare property prior to his death were made by him. There is evidence that Jue Joe had told both San Tong and Dorothy that he was buying the land for Dorothy and that he was relying upon San Tong, named in the contract as buyer with the right to name the grantee, to have it conveyed to Dorothy when she became 21 years old; and that, in 1942, when Dorothy was 21 years old and the contract required that Manlove convey the property subject to a trust deed, San Tong, pursuant to his father's instructions had the property conveyed to Dorothy, and Dorothy executed the note and trust deed required by the contract. At the time of Jue Joe's death in 1941, Jue Joe's property, money and business became the property of Leong Shee. She had acquiesced in the gift of the Tulare property to Dorothy, and by her pleadings she waived any interest she had in the business. San Tong, according to Dorothy's testimony, and other evidence, took over the active management of all Jue Joe's property and business, represented the other members of the family as partners, told Dorothy that the money paid on the Tulare property after 1941 was from her share in the "family business", on which there would be a later accounting. Leong Shee's waiver of her rights in the Jue Joe Company, not put in issue on the instant appeal, must be presumed to include any right she might otherwise have had in the Tulare property because of the payments thereon made by the Jue Joe Company after the death of Jue Joe. There is no evidence that she retained any greater rights as to the money of Jue Joe Company used to pay for the Tulare property given to Dorothy, than as to the property and money of Jue Joe Company appropriated by San Tong.

Appellant's claim that it cannot be believed that San Tong would have farmed the Tulare property without compensation if it had been given to Dorothy by Jue Joe, completely ignores the evidence and finding that, in the few years between the dates of the filing of the instant action and the trial thereof, San Tong rented the Tulare property to other farmers, paid for upkeep and taxes, and made a net profit from the land of some $18,000.

It is urged by appellants that "equity will not give effect to an imperfect gift by enforcing it as a trust". In re Estate of Alberts, 38 Cal.App.2d 42, 46, 100 P.2d 538, 540.

[11] Equity in the instant action was not required to enforce the trust as, under the court's findings and decision, San Tong, by his nomination of Dorothy to receive the legal title and his conversation with her about it, voluntarily performed his duty as his father's trustee.

Appellants argue at length that any interest Jue Joe had in the Tulare property at the time of his death descended to Leong Shee. No interest has been shown to have been in Jue Joe at the time of his death. In all of his dealings in interests in real property, including leases, even before the birth of Corinne who was the first American born member of his family, he carefully refrained from taking any interest in himself. It is only reasonable to imply that the deal as to the Tulare property was arranged the same way. Jue Joe was meticulous in avoiding any violation of Alien Land Law. Whether San Tong previously intended to violate Jue

Joe's trust in him, and regardless of his reasons for so doing, he lived up to his father's trust in him when he had Manlove deed the Tulare property to Dorothy in 1942, just as Brant and the Title Company had done in conveying Lot 690 to Corinne when she became 21 years of age.

[12] Appellants in their closing brief state that "there is not a scintilla of evidence to the effect that Dorothy was intended owner of the Tulare property until 1939, at the earliest." This overlooks the evidence before the court of the previous dealings of Jue Joe and the trial court's right to presume therefrom that he would not have told Dorothy in 1939 that the Tulare property was to be hers had he not previously arranged to have it so and made the payments required up to that time. It also ignores the evidence of the character of the previous dealings of San Tong and the inferences the court evidently drew from his statement to Dorothy that the property was hers.

Appellants rely somewhat upon the testimony of Manlove that he knew no one save San Tong in the deal. When it is remembered that as to Lot 690, purchased by Jue Joe through his friend Brant and the Title Company, Corinne's name did not appear of record until after she was 21 years of age, and that the seller probably never heard of her, it is not improbable that Jue Joe believed the Tulare property was being purchased for Dorothy under similar arrangement. Appellants contend that Dorothy's interest in the Tulare property rests upon her own uncorroborated testimony alone. This ignores the fact that San Tong did have the title transferred from Manlove to Dorothy and, according to Dorothy, her husband and Corinne, he made no claim of ownership of the property until 1948 when by threats he procured a deed from Dorothy. Also, the conflicts in San Tong's testimony warranted the trial court's failure to take it at face value.

Appellant insists that Leong Shee knew nothing of a gift of the Tulare property to Dorothy. We find nothing in her testimony to that effect, and in view of the Alien Land Law of that time we think the trial court justified in inferring from the evidence before it that Leong Shee had acquiesced and joined with Jue Joe in making the gift to Dorothy.

[13] Much is made by appellants of the fact that Jue Joe did not tell Dorothy when or how she was to become the owner of the Tulare property. This, to us, seems immaterial, since he apparently told San Tong when and how she was to take the title. It will be remembered that as to Lot 690, Jue Joe had given Corinne the impression that she always owned it, but he had carefully arranged with the trustee that she was to take legal title when she became 21 years old. He had arranged with San Tong for Dorothy to take legal title of the Tulare property when she became 21 years of age and the contract of purchase required Manlove to convey it to San Tong's nominee.

Appellants urge that "the instruction of Jue Joe to San Tong to 'turn' the property over to Dorothy was given to San Tong as agent for Jue Joe" (since San Tong could not convey the property and could only instruct Manlove to do so) "and the agency terminated with Jue Joe's death".

[14] Since it has been finally determined that Leong Shee, the heir at law and successor to Jue Joe, has waived the claims she had against San Tong for his appropriation of the Jue Joe Company, Jue Joe's crops and other properties (except her interest in Lot 690), and no reason is given for exempting from such blanket waiver any claim she might have had against San Tong, Manlove or Dorothy arising out of San Tong's unauthorized instruction to Manlove, Manlove's compliance, or Dorothy's acceptance of the deed after Jue Joe's death, and no appellant other than Leong Shee having lost anything by San Tong's act, whether he exceeded his authority in that regard is immaterial to the issues raised on the appeal now engaging our attention.

In answer to appellants' arguments to the effect that Jue Joe's intended gift to Dorothy cannot be completed by the courts, respondent, in her brief, states: "Happily Dorothy has no occasion to sue for specific performance of Jue Joe's oral declaration of his intention to make a gift of the Tulare property to Dorothy, or to sue San Tong Jue for specific performance of his obligation to her as constructive trustee. San Tong Jue's voluntary act in meeting and fulfilling that obligation removed the necessity of suit on that score.

"Dorothy's suit is to recover from San Tong Jue the same property, wrongfully wrested by him from her after she had been in undisputed ownership of it for five years and eight months. The means used by San Tong Jue were extortionate and consisted of menace, causing fear and terror."

The court found on the testimony of Dorothy, her husband, and San Tong that the deed from Dorothy to San Tong on August 24, 1948, was procured by menace and threats of San Tong and Dorothy's fear induced thereby.

Respondents cite Civil Code, Section 2224 as requiring the court to cancel the deed so obtained and award the Tulare property to Dorothy, as it did. They urge that San Tong's threats were such a wrongful act as to make San Tong an involuntary trustee of the Tulare property for the benefit of Dorothy. The only manner in which the transaction can be excepted from said Section 2224 is by proving that San Tong has "some other and better right" to the Tulare property.

[15] Appellants urge in their closing brief, that the "question as to who is the real owner of the Tulare property, regardless of whether record title stands in the name of Dorothy or San Tong" had to be decided in order to determine whether the cancellation of the deed from Dorothy to San Tong was warranted. San Tong, however, failed to prove "some other and better right" in himself, than the legal title acquired by his "wrongful act". Therefore, the deed from Dorothy to him was properly cancelled.

The judgment is affirmed.

Hearing Denied Nov. 5, 1958.

Action for negligent design and manufacture of crane involved in death of plaintiff's husband. The Superior Court, Shasta County, Albert F. Hadsell, Murman & Bishop, San Francisco, for respondent Insley Mfg. Corp.

PEEK, Acting Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of nonsuit in an action by her against Insley Manufacturing Corporation for negligent design and manufacture of a crane involved in the death of her husband, Cecil O. Brooks. Plaintiff also appeals from an order granting judgment on the pleadings in favor of Insley relating to a cause of action alleging breach of warranty of fitness of the crane. All of the original defendants have been dismissed except the Insley Manufacturing Corporation.

The appeal from the order granting judgment on the pleadings on the breach of warranty cause of action does not appear to be supported by existing law, which appellant concedes; hence the judgment as to that cause must be affirmed, and we limit this opinion solely to the question of the propriety of the nonsuit.

Thus the only question presented is if by disregarding conflicting evidence, giving plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled and indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, can it be said that there was no substantial evidence to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff? Leonard v. Watsonville Community Hospital, 47 Cal.2d 509, 514-515, 305 P.2d 36.

The evidence, when viewed in light of the stated rule, shows that Brooks was employed as an iron worker by the Anson-Smith Company which was engaged in building a fish hatchery for the state. On the morning of December 10, 1952 (the first day of his employment), at about 10 a. m., Brooks was "tending the load" of an Insley crane. In this his duty was to keep the load, which was suspended from a cable and held in a sling about two to four feet off the ground, from spinning or swinging. He followed customary procedure by holding on to the load with his hands as he walked along with the moving crane. In fact his foreman testified that had he not held on to the load, he would have been fired. The crane was engaged in moving a 1,500- to 2,000-pound load of steel a distance of 100 to 150 feet. The day was rainy and the ground was soft and depressed in spots. Apparently because of its construction, the crane when in motion would move from side to side; that is, it zigzagged back and forth rather than proceeding in a straight line, which motion caused the load to swing back and forth. There also was testimony that the uneven ground caused the boom to sway up and down, allowing slack in the cable and thereby causing it to whip-lash on the drum and to vary the tension on the spring which held the safety device. The boom of the crane was at about a 45-degree angle from the cab of the crane. Without warning the boom fell, fatally injuring Brooks.

When the crane operator saw the boom start to fall he jumped on the boom brake in an effort to stop it, but the brake failed. There was evidence that the boom on this crane had fallen on two prior occasions but that it had not been inspected at those times to determine if there had been a mechanical defect. Immediately following the accident here in question the boom was raised and it was discovered that the brake could not hold the weight of the boom even without the load.

Plaintiff's contentions are directed at the design and construction of the crane in two particulars—first, the brake handle and drum; and second, a safety device called a "boom dog."

In support of her first contention it is argued that the evidence showed the brake was so negligently designed that it was not adequately protected from the elements in that rain could get on the brake and drum, allowing it to slip; that on the morning of the accident the operator endeavored to protect it by covering it with some pieces of tin, but it still got wet so that when the boom started to fall and he jumped on the brake, it did not hold. Additionally it is argued that the evidence further shows that the brake handle and its mechanism was so negligently constructed that although designed to be normally "on" when in a down position, the handle showed marks indicating that it would become stuck, and that when in such position the brake handle could not be depressed to increase the brake pressure.

Plaintiff's argument concerning her second contention relates to the construction of the boom dog, a device designed to secure the boom against movement. It consisted of a piece of metal hung vertically over ratchet gears attached to the driveshaft of the boom drum. When it was desired to raise the boom, the operator would disengage the dog by a lever allowing the drum to run free. When it was the desire to lock the boom at the point to which it had been raised, the operator would move the lever to the "in" position, thereby engaging the dog in the teeth of the ratchet and hence preventing movement of the drum. When moving a load, as was being done in this case, it was the practice to engage the dog to prevent the drum from moving and allowing the boom to fall. This is of importance in regard to this particular crane since it had a "dead boom"; that is, there was but one source of power. The crane could either raise or lower the boom, or travel by means of caterpillar treads, or swing the boom horizontally, but it could perform only one of these operations under power at any one time. The dog itself couldn't be seen by the operator by reason of its location behind a metal plate guarding the boom line drum. Hence the operator could not visually determine whether or not the dog was engaged.

Immediately following the accident a state inspector for the Division of Architecture, who was an eyewitness to the accident, examined the crane and at the trial testified that with the lever in the engaged position, he was able to move the dog in and out; that by reason of being vertically suspended it could, in effect, "pop out" while the crane was being operated. There was further testimony that although the operator turned the lever for controlling the dog to the engaged position, the dog could have stopped on the point of a ratchet tooth; that if it stopped at that point, as a safety engineer for the Industrial Accident Commission testified, "You could expect trouble." There was further evidence of gouging on the teeth of the ratchet points and that the nature of the gouging was such that it could only have occurred while the boom was coming down. Thus there was evidence that if the brake was not working properly, and the dog was on the point of the tooth, the boom could come down by jarring or by the combination of depressions in the ground over which it was traveling. It was further shown that the zigzagging movement of the crane could also have so released the pressure on the boom dog as to have allowed the boom to fall. There was additional testimony by the safety engineer that when he examined the set screw which was used to prevent the dog from rotating, he found that the set screw was not keyed into the shaft; and that the spring which held the dog against the ratchet was inadequate in that it did not have sufficient tension. The operator of the crane testified that the last time he had raised or lowered the boom he had put the dog in the "in" position. This was corroborated by the inspector who, immediately after the accident, examined the crane and found the dog to be in the "in" position, as did the foreman who also checked the crane shortly after the accident.

[1-3] Since "* * * it is only when reasonable minds cannot differ with respect to whether proved facts and reasonable inferences therefrom make out negligence or non-negligence, that such issues may properly be taken from the jury" Biondini v. Amship Corporation, 81 Cal. App.2d 751, 766, 185 P.2d 94, 103, then it would seem to follow from the evidence so summarized that reasonable minds could well differ in light of all of the circumstances of this case, and that therefore the question of defendants' alleged negligence should have been submitted to the jury.

Defendants' primary contention, which appears to have been the basis of the trial court's order, was that proximate causation is lacking, in that the accident was the proximate result of the negligence of the crane operator. However if it may be said that the jury could reasonably have found negligence in the design of the crane, and we conclude that it could, then defendant's liability could not be cut off by reason of the intervening negligence of the operator, if such negligence can be said to have been foreseeable, and whether or not such intervening negligence was foreseeable was a question for the jury. De Mirjian v. Ideal Heating Corp., 129 Cal. App.2d 758, 278 P.2d 114.

Defendant further argues in support of the judgment that it is not liable by reason of the contributory negligence of Brooks. In this regard reliance is placed upon testimony that Brooks had been repeatedly warned to stay out from under the boom, and that he had not heeded such warning. However there is a statutory presumption that he used due care. Sec. 1963, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc. This presumption, coupled with the testimony that the crane was moving in a zigzagging manner, thereby causing the boom to swing as the crane changed direction, was evidence from which the jury could infer that at the time of the accident the boom had swung over Brooks, rather than that Brooks had stepped under the boom. Since plaintiff's evidence is reconcilable with the presumption, the question of contributory negligence was one for the jury. Johnson v. Nicholson, 159 Cal.App.2d 395, 324 P.2d 307.

[4, 5] It is finally argued by defendant that the accident was due to an obvious danger. It is not clear from its brief whether obvious danger is urged as indicating contributory negligence or assumption of risk. If the theory is contributory negligence, the rule is that Brooks must have appreciated the degree of danger involved as well as the danger itself. Johnson v. Nicholson, supra, 159 Cal.App.2d at page 409, 324 P.2d at page 315. Here it is to be noted that this was the first day that Brooks had worked with this crane, and he had not seen it fall on two prior occasions. Also, as previously noted, the jury could have found that on this particular occasion the boom had swung over him. And also as noted, whether he had appreciated the amount of danger involved was a jury question. Again, if defendant's theory is that Brooks assumed the risk, then it is the rule that there must be voluntary exposure to danger and actual, not constructive knowledge of the risk involved. Johnson v. Nicholson, supra, 159 Cal.App.2d at page 409, 324 P.2d at page 315. Furthermore, there was the testimony of the foreman that Brooks was under orders to tend the load, and that if he had not done so he would have been fired; hence there would be further question as to Brooks' actual knowledge of the risk involved.

The judgment on the pleadings as regards the warranty cause of action is affirmed. The judgment of nonsuit as to the negligence cause of action is reversed.

Civ. 18012.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Sept. 4, 1958.

Hearing Ordered on Court's Motion
Oct. 22, 1958.

Action involving the validity of the so-called "right to work" ordinance. From a judgment of the Superior Court, County of San Benito, Stanley Lawson, J., holding that the ordinance was unconstitutional and entering judgment for defendants, the plaintiff appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Peters, P. J., held that the ordinance was invalid as attempting to legislate in a field already occupied by state legislation.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Labor Relations ⇨259

A "union shop" agreement means the contract under which an employer may hire nonunion employees but such employees must join a union within a specified time after they are employed and by "closed shop" agreement is meant a contract under which only union members may be hired.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Closed Shop" and "Union Shop".

2. Labor Relations ⇨243

The Taft-Hartley Act permits non-federal legislation and regulation in the labor relations field with respect to agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment by state or territorial law when a problem involves interstate commerce. National Labor Relations Act, §§ 8(a) (3), 14(b) as amended 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 158(a) (3), 164(b).

3. Labor Relations ⇨45

Taft-Hartley Act applies only to matters relating to interstate commerce and has no application to commerce purely local in character and would not invalidate a county "right to work" ordinance where it was not claimed that interstate commerce was involved or affected. National Labor Relations Act, §§ 8(a) (3), 14(b) as amended 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 158(a) (3), 164(b).

4. Counties ⇨21½

Under the constitution, police powers conferred on cities and counties are equal in extent to those of a state, and hence if the state has not occupied the field of labor relations with respect to "right to work" ordinance, the counties might legislate on the subject. West's Ann.Const. art. 11, § 11.

5. Counties ⇨21½

Municipal Corporations ⇨592(1)

The problem of the union or closed shop in labor relations is one of state-wide concern, but even as to such a concern, local regulation is permissible until state laws have been enacted to occupy the field, and hence power to act on such a question is concurrent between the state and counties and municipalities with state law prevailing in event that the local ordinance conflicts with general laws.

6. Counties $\Rightarrow$ 21½

Municipal Corporations $\Rightarrow$ 592(1)

The phrase "general laws" with respect to conflict between state law and ordinances of counties and municipalities implies that for a conflict to exist it must be between the local ordinance and a state statute, and a conflict between an ordinance and the general common-law principles is not sufficient to constitute the conflict referred to in the constitutional provision that any county may make within its limits all police and other regulations not in conflict with "general laws". West's Ann.Const. art. 11, § 11.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "General Laws".

7. Counties $\Rightarrow$ 21½

Under the constitutional provision authorizing any county to make all local police and other regulations not in conflict with general laws, such a conflict may exist not only where the ordinance directly forbids what a state statute permits or permits what the state law prohibits but also where the ordinance purports to operate in a field already occupied by state legislation. West's Ann.Const. art. 11, § 11.

8. Counties $\Rightarrow$ 21½

Under the constitutional provision authorizing a county to make within its limits all local police and other regulations not in conflict with the general laws, a conflict may exist and the state will be deemed to have occupied the field not only where the ordinance and statute are in direct conflict but also where realistically the effect of the ordinance would defeat the basic objectives of state legislation. West's Ann. Const. art. 11, § 11.

9. Labor Relations $\Rightarrow$ 44

A state constitutional or a state statutory enactment containing "right to work" provisions does not violate the United States constitution but constitutes a proper exercise of the police power even though it invalidates existing union security contracts and operates to weaken the bargaining power of unions.

10. Counties $\Rightarrow$ 21½

A county "right to work" ordinance was invalid as attempting to legislate in a field already occupied by state legislation. West's Ann.Const. art. 11, § 11; West's Ann.Labor Code, §§ 920-923, 1115-1120.

This case involves the validity of the so-called "Right to Work"<sup>1</sup> ordinance of San Benito County. The trial court, on demurrer, held that such ordinance was unconstitutional, and entered its judgment for the defendants. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The ordinance was enacted in July of 1957. It is entitled: "An ordinance relating to employment, prohibiting denial of employment because of non-membership in a labor organization, prohibiting agreements excluding any person from employment because of non-membership in a labor

1. See In re Petition of Idaho State Federation of Labor (A.F.L.), 75 Idaho 367, 272 P.2d 707, 708, holding that such a title was so deceptive that it could not be used properly as the title of a proposed initiative measure.

organization; * * * Making illegal compelling or attempting to compel a person to join a labor organization or leave his employment against his will; prohibiting conspiracy to cause the discharge of any person because of non-membership in a labor organization; providing right of action for damages for violations; and providing for injunctive relief."

After setting forth several definitions, the ordinance provides that:

"Section 3. * * * No person shall be denied the opportunity to obtain or retain employment because of non-membership in a labor organization, nor shall * * * [any person or corporation] enter into any agreement, written or oral, which excludes any person from employment or continuation of employment because of non-membership in a labor organization.

"Section 4. * * * Any act or provision in any agreement entered into on or after the effective date hereof or any renewal or extension of any existing agreement entered into on or after the effective date hereof which is in violation of this ordinance shall be illegal and void. Any strike or picketing to force or induce any employer to make an agreement in writing or orally in violation of this ordinance shall be for an illegal purpose.

"Section 5. * * * It shall be unlawful for any employee, labor organization, or officer, agent or member thereof to compel or attempt to compel any person to join any labor organization or to strike against his will * * *"

Section 6 prohibits and declares illegal any conspiracy to accomplish any of the prohibited acts. Section 7 provides that "Any person who violates any provision of this ordinance, or who enters into any agreement containing a provision declared illegal by this ordinance, or who shall bring about the discharge or the denial of employment of any person because of non-membership in a labor organization shall be liable to the person injured as the result of such act or provision for such damages as such person injured may have sustained thereby and may be sued therefor."

Section 8 provides that "Any person injured or threatened with injury by any act declared illegal by this ordinance shall notwithstanding any other provision of this ordinance or any other ordinance to the contrary, be entitled to injunctive relief therefrom."

The next section contains a broad severability provision. There is no provision making a violation of the ordinance a criminal offense.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff, Ted Chavez, is a painting contractor doing commercial and residential painting in Santa Clara and San Benito Counties; that a majority of his employees are members of a designated painters' local union affiliated with the A.F.L.-C.I.O.; that Sargent is the secretary of that union, and that such union is the only painters' union in San Benito County; that the defendants demand that plaintiff sign a union contract similar to the one that he has in Santa Clara County with the painters' union there, providing for union membership after 30 days of employment; that the union members in San Benito County are conspiring to compel the non-union painters to join the union, and refuse to work with non-union painters; that these acts are in violation of the ordinance; that plaintiff "wishes to sign a union security contract but is subject to a suit for damages" under the ordinance if he does so. Plaintiff therefore prayed for a temporary and permanent injunction compelling the defendant union "to desist from their demands for any type of union security in San Benito County and compelling them to work with non-union building trades employees."

The trial judge, the Honorable Stanley Lawson, held the ordinance to be unconstitutional. In doing so he wrote an opinion holding that the phase of the labor-management field here involved had been pre-empted by the Federal government by certain provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act (29 U.S.C.A. § 158(a)), and that, even if this were not so, the State of California has legislated on the subject and occupied the field. This being so, the judge declared, a county cannot lawfully pass an ordinance that conflicts with the general laws of the state, "Nor may it forbid what the State law allows or legislate when the State law occupies the field. (Pipoly v. Benson, 20 Cal.2d 366 [125 P.2d 482, 147 A.L.R. 515])." The judge concluded "that since the Federal and State Governments have per-empted the field, the ordinance is void." It is these determinations that are challenged on this appeal. In addition to the briefs of the litigants several amici curiae have filed briefs on both sides of the controversy.

[1] The holding that the federal government has pre-empted the field of legislation here involved was erroneous for at least two reasons. In the first place, even if it be assumed that the Taft-Hartley Act is applicable to this controversy, by reason of section 8(a) (29 U.S.C.A. § 158(a) (3)) which outlaws the closed shop but authorizes union shop<sup>2</sup> agreements under certain conditions, section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act (29 U.S.C.A. § 164(b)) provides:

2. A "union shop" agreement means a contract under which an employer may hire non-union employees, but such employees are required to join the union within a specified time after they are employed. A "closed shop" agreement is a contract under which only union members may be hired.

3. There is a disagreement between commentators on this subject. Berke and Brunn in an article "Local Right to Work Ordinances" in 9 Stanford L.Rev. 674, take the position that the above-quoted section clearly demonstrates that Congress did not occupy the field of regulation of compulsory unionism. On the other hand, Finman in "Local 'Right to Work' Ordinances: A Reply" in 10 Stanford L.Rev. 53, comes to a contrary conclusion. See also United Const. Workers, affiliated with United Mine Workers of America v. Laburnum Const. Corp., 347 U.S. 656, 74 S.Ct. 833, 98 L.Ed. 1025; Garmou v. San Diego Building Trades

"Nothing in this subchapter shall be construed as authorizing the execution or application of agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment in any State or Territory in which such execution or application is prohibited by State or Territorial law."

[2] This section, on its face, apparently permits non-federal legislation and regulation in this field by state or territorial law<sup>3</sup> when the problem involves interstate commerce.

[3] In the second place, even if it be assumed that, in a case involving interstate commerce, the federal government has pre-empted the field on the subject involved, and that the section quoted above does not mean what it apparently says, this would not assist defendants. The Taft-Hartley Act, of course, can apply only to matters relating to interstate commerce. It has no application to commerce purely local in character, that is, to commerce that is entirely intrastate. In the instant case, the record before us is completely devoid of any allegation or claim by any party that interstate commerce is involved or affected. There is nothing in the record to indicate that plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce. Where the record is Council, 49 Cal.2d 595, 320 P.2d 473, certiorari granted by U. S. Supreme Court generally discussing the problem as it relates to organizations involved in interstate commerce.

The parties and amici curiae also discuss the question of whether the permission granted by the quoted section to states and territories includes counties, which are, of course, legal and political subdivisions of the state for purposes of government. 13 Cal.Jur.2d p. 347, § 2. The trial court in the instant case, in support of its holding that the federal government had pre-empted the field, held that political subdivisions are not included within the grant of power to state and territories. Certainly the normal and customary construction of "State Law" encompasses county ordinances. There is nothing in the legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act or in the Act itself to indicate that Congress left the field open for state legislation but pre-empted it as to county legislation.

barren as to interstate commerce the question of federal pre-emption does not arise. Thorman v. International Alliance, etc. Employees, 49 Cal.2d 629, 320 P.2d 494; Seven Up Bottling Co. of Los Angeles v. Grocery Drivers Union, 49 Cal.2d 625, 320 P.2d 492. We must, therefore, hold that, as to the problem here involved, inasmuch as interstate commerce is not involved, the trial court was in error in holding that the federal government has pre-empted the field.

The trial court also ruled that the State of California, by state law, has pre-empted the field, and that the ordinance is unconstitutional because contrary to state law and policy. This presents the pivotal issue presented on this appeal.

[4, 5] The Constitution of this state in Article XI, section 11, states: "Any county * * * may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." Under this section the police powers conferred on cities and counties are "equal in extent to those of the state." McKay Jewelers v. Bowron, 19 Cal.2d 595, 600, 122 P.2d 543, 546, 139 A.L.R. 1188; see also an article by Peppin, "Municipal Home Rule in California," 32 Cal.L.Rev. 341. Therefore, if the state has not occupied the field here involved, the counties may legislate on this subject. This is so no matter how logical and compelling the argument may be that laws permitting or prohibiting the union or closed shop should, for obvious reasons, be of statewide application. The problem is obviously one of statewide concern. But even as to such a concern, local regulation is permissible until state laws have been enacted to occupy the field. In re Porterfield, 28 Cal.2d 91, 168 P.2d 706, 167 A.L.R. 675; In re Iverson, 199 Cal. 582, 250 P. 681; Wilton v. Henkin, 52 Cal.App.2d 368, 126 P.2d 425; Sawyer v. Board of Supervisors, 108 Cal.App. 446, 291 P. 892. Except in a very limited field not here involved, power to act on such a question is concurrent between the state and counties and municipalities, with state law prevailing in the event that the local ordinance conflicts "with general laws."

[6] The phrase "general laws" implies that for a conflict to exist such conflict must be between the local ordinance and a state statute, and that a conflict between the ordinance and general common law principles is not sufficient to constitute the conflict referred to in the constitutional provision. The phrase used in that provision is "general laws", not "general law." The fact that the plural of the term was used implies that the framers were referring to statutes and not to the common law. Although we have been referred to no case directly passing on this subject, it is significant that most of the cases discussing the problem have stated that the local units may act until the "legislature" has entered the field, or have stated that the local ordinance is valid unless it is in conflict with the "statutes" of this state. In re Porterfield, 28 Cal.2d 91, 168 P.2d 706, 167 A.L.R. 675; Pipoly v. Benson, 20 Cal.2d 366, 125 P.2d 482, 147 A.L.R. 515; In re Iverson, 199 Cal. 582, 250 P. 681; Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 P. 442, 21 A.L.R. 1172. The determination of this point in the instant case is of importance because long prior to the passage of the ordinance here involved in 1957, and at least as early as 1908, the legality of the closed and union shop was recognized and approved under general common law principles. Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 P. 1027, 21 L.R.A.,N.S., 550. This case has been consistently followed. But for reasons already stated, the rule of these many decisions cannot be held to create a conflict between the local ordinance and the "general laws."

[7, 8] Thus, the key question presented is whether the ordinance in question is in conflict with the statutory law of the state. Such a conflict may exist not only where the ordinance directly forbids what a state statute permits, or permits what the state law prohibits, but also where the ordinance purports to operate in a field already fully occupied by state legislation. See Pipoly v. Benson, 20 Cal.2d 366, 125 P.2d 482, 147

A.L.R. 515, for a full discussion of this principle. Inasmuch as the state has not, by legislation, directly authorized the union shop, the real question presented is whether the state has generally occupied the field so as to preclude local ordinances on the subject. Certainly it is the law that a conflict may exist and the state will be deemed to have occupied the field, not only where the ordinance and statute are in direct conflict but also where, realistically, the effect of the ordinance would defeat the basic objectives of the state legislation. In re Porterfield, 28 Cal.2d 91, 168 P.2d 706, 167 A.L.R. 675; Agnew v. City of Culver City, 147 Cal.App.2d 144, 304 P.2d 788; Lynch v. City of Los Angeles, 114 Cal. App.2d 115, 249 P.2d 856. As was said in Wilson v. Beville, 47 Cal.2d 852, 859, 306 P.2d 789, 793, quoting from Tolman v. Underhill, 39 Cal.2d 708, 712, 249 P.2d 280: "Although the adoption of local rules supplementary to state law is proper under some circumstances, it is well settled that local regulation is invalid if it attempts to impose additional requirements in a field which is fully occupied by statute * * * [Citing a case.] Determination of the question whether the Legislature has undertaken to occupy exclusively a given field of legislation depends upon an analysis of the statute and a consideration of the facts and circumstances upon which it was intended to operate. [Citations.] Where the Legislature has adopted statutes governing a particular subject matter, its intent with regard to occupying the field to the exclusion of all local regulations is not to be measured alone by the language used but by the whole purpose and scope of the legislative scheme. [Citation.]" Thus, the question presented is whether or not the state by legislation has "occupied the field" of collective bargaining within the meaning of the principles above discussed. On this subject the litigants and the competing amici curiae, and the legal commentators are in disagreement. See Berke and Brunn, "Local Right to Work Ordinances," 9 Stanford L.Rev. 674, contending that the state has not occupied the field, and Fin-man, "Local 'Right to Work' Ordinances: A Reply", 10 Stanford L.Rev. 53, urging that the state has occupied the field.

The State of California has not seen fit to adopt a detailed statutory scheme for the regulation of collective bargaining or for the regulation of the relations between unions and management, but the state has passed some legislation in this field. There are several statutes that have been enacted on these subjects, but, for the purposes of the problems presented, it is necessary to consider only sections 920 through 923 of the Labor Code. Section 920 defines the word "promise." Section 921 declares that promises "between any employee or prospective employee and his employer" are contrary to public policy if either party promises:

"(a) To join or to remain a member of a labor organization or to join or remain a member of an employer organization,

"(b) Not to join or not to remain a member of a labor organization or of an employer organization,

"(c) To withdraw from an employment relation in the event that he joins or remains a member of a labor organization or of an employer organization.

"Such promise shall not afford any basis for the granting of legal or equitable relief by any court against a party to such promise * * *".

Section 922 provides that: "Any person * * * who coerces or compels any person to enter into an agreement, written or verbal, not to join or become a member of any labor organization, as a condition of securing employment or continuing in the employment of any such person is guilty of a misdemeanor."

Then comes section 923 which clearly and unequivocally sets forth the state's public policy as to labor organizations. It declares:

"In the interpretation and application of this chapter, the public policy of this State is declared as follows:

"Negotiation of terms and conditions of labor should result from voluntary agreement between employer and employees. Governmental authority has permitted and encouraged employers to organize in the corporate and other forms of capital control. In dealing with such employers, the individual unorganized worker is helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract and to protect his freedom of labor, and thereby to obtain acceptable terms and conditions of employment. Therefore it is necessary that the individual workman have full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, to negotiate the terms and conditions of his employment, and that he shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection."

This legislation was passed in 1933 (Stats. of 1933, p. 1478, Chap. 566) and placed in the Labor Code in 1937, and was passed at a time when there was a nationwide controversy over so-called "yellow dog"<sup>4</sup> contracts, over company unions, and over the use of injunctions in labor disputes. California did not see fit to adopt some of the legislation adopted in other states and nationally aimed at correcting these evils, and failed to adopt the model anti-injunction bill adopted in many states. But it did adopt the declaration of policy contained in that proposed bill (§ 923 of the Labor Code) and the provisions which declare anti-union and company union contracts to be contrary to public policy. Shafer v. Registered Pharmacists Union, 16 Cal.2d 379, 385, 106 P.2d 403.

[9,10] The question to be decided is whether the county ordinance here involved is contrary to the provisions above quoted, or, stated another way, whether the ordinance attempts to legislate in a field already occupied by the state legislation.<sup>5</sup>

On this subject there is no reasonable basis for any real controversy. A reading of section 923 demonstrates that there is a direct conflict between the public policy of the state as there declared, and the public policy of the county of San Benito as set forth in the ordinance. Section 923 declares that it is the public policy of this state to leave the negotiation of labor contracts to voluntary agreement, and to give to the individual workman freedom in negotiating the terms and conditions of his employment. The ordinance declares, however, that it is the policy of San Benito

4. A "yellow dog" contract, definitely anti-union, is an agreement between an employer and his employee that the employer will maintain his business on a "non-union" basis, and that the employee will not join a labor union during term of his employment.

5. There can be no doubt that a state constitutional or a state statutory enactment containing right to work provisions does not violate the United States Constitution. They constitute a proper exercise of the police power, even though they invalidate existing union security contracts and operate to weaken the bargaining power of unions. Lincoln Federal Labor Union No. 19129, A.F. of L. v. Northwestern Iron & Metal Co. (Whitaker v. State of North Carolina), 335 U.S. 525, 69 S.Ct. 251, 93 L.Ed. 212, upholding a Nebraska constitutional amendment and a North Carolina statute, and American Federation of Labor Arizona State Federation of Labor v. American Sash and Door Co., 335 U.S. 538, 69 S.Ct. 260, 93 L.Ed. 222, upholding an Arizona constitutional amendment.

In their briefs and on oral argument counsel place reliance on the state court decisions involving the Arizona constitutional provision (67 Ariz. 20, 189 P.2d 912), and the Nebraska constitutional provision (149 Neb. 507, 31 N.W.2d 477). Those cases do not involve in any way the problem with which we are here concerned. They involve, solely, the question as to whether the state constitutional provisions violated the provisions of the federal Constitution. It was held that they did not in that they were a proper exercise of the police power. In the present case we assume that the ordinance would be valid unless it operates in a field already occupied by the state. Obviously, this is an entirely different question than the one presented in the cited cases. They are not relevant on the issue here involved.

County to abolish voluntary agreement on the issue of the union shop, and to limit the workmen's freedom of contract by prohibiting negotiation with respect to that part of his contract of employment. Thus, the policy of section 923 is clearly contrary to the policy of the ordinance. This is not only clear from the general policy of section 923 but is also demonstrated by the precise language used. Section 923 states that "Negotiation of terms and conditions of labor should result from voluntary agreement between employer and employees." This amounts to a prohibition of local regulation of the terms of collective bargaining agreements. Otherwise, the approval given by the statute to "voluntary agreement" would be meaningless. If cities and counties can regulate union shop provisions of collective bargaining agreements, then they can regulate and prohibit other provisions relating to the terms and conditions of employment, and thus destroy, completely destroy, the right of labor and management to determine these matters through voluntary agreement.

This meaning of section 923 is not only clear from the language of the section, but it is also the interpretation that the Supreme Court of this state has placed on the language used.

In Levy v. Superior Court, 15 Cal.2d 692, at page 704, 104 P.2d 770, at page 776, 129 A.L.R. 956, Mr. Justice Shenk speaking for a unanimous court, after first quoting section 923, stated: "This declaration evidences the existence of a policy to uphold the freedom of employees to organize and to enter into collective bargaining contracts for their own protection."

In Shafer v. Registered Pharmacists Union, 16 Cal.2d 379, 106 P.2d 403, the Supreme Court held that union shop contracts are valid in this state and not contrary to the provisions of section 921. The precise holding was that picketing by a union to force an employer to execute a closed shop agreement which obligated the employer to require that all employees, present and prospective, must designate the union as their collective bargaining agent and to become and to remain members of the union as a condition of employment, was lawful and did not violate sections 920 through 923 of the Labor Code. After holding that the sections did not prohibit a promise on the part of employees to join an independent labor union, the court stated (16 Cal.2d at page 387, 106 P.2d at page 407.):

"These and other considerations render untenable the contention that union shop contracts in California are void under section 921. * * * Considering all of these circumstances, a legislative intention to declare the closed shop contract unlawful will not be presumed.

"The argument is also made that it is absurd to suppose that these provisions were written with the intention of restraining the employer from influencing his employee, while at the same time conferring upon other individuals the right 'to coerce' the same employee through the employer. But the right of workmen to organize for the purpose of bargaining collectively would be effectually thwarted if each individual had the absolute right to remain 'unorganized', and using the term adopted by the appellants to designate the economic pressure applied against them through the employer, coercion may include compulsion brought about entirely by moral force. Certainly such compulsion is not made contrary to public policy by any statute of this state and is a proper exercise of labor's rights. [Citing cases.]

"The argument that provisions similar to those now being considered guarantee employees freedom 'from all interference' in their selection of a collective bargaining agent has been accepted by several state courts. [Citing cases.] * * * It is not in accordance with the law of this state, as judicially declared for many years, nor is it based upon a fair construction of sections 920 to 923 of the California Labor Code, considering their history and purpose. These sections lay no statutory restraints upon the workers' efforts to secure a closed shop contract from an employer, hence the appellants' picketing was lawful and should not have been enjoined."

The least that can be said of the Shafer case is that it holds that sections 920-923 of the Labor Code do not place any restraint upon the efforts of workers to obtain a union shop contract from the employer, and that these sections recognize the validity and propriety of union shop agreements.

Whatever doubt may have existed as to the meaning of the sections after the decision in the Shafer case, was set at rest by the decision of In re Porterfield, 28 Cal.2d 91, 168 P.2d 706, 167 A.L.R. 675. This case held that section 923 was not simply a statutory declaration of policy to guide the courts in interpreting other provisions of the code, but contained pronouncements that have an independent meaning and effect of their own. There the court was presented with a city ordinance of Redding making it a crime to solicit members for a dues-paying organization without first paying a fee to procure a license. Porterfield was a paid union organizer, one of whose duties was to solicit memberships for his union. He solicited such memberships in Redding without securing a license, and was convicted. On habeas corpus, the Supreme Court held that the ordinance was unconstitutional because it was in conflict with the public policy of California as declared in section 923. In so holding Mr. Justice Schauer, speaking for the majority of the court, held in clear and cogent language that the tax provisions of the ordinance "are not consistent with the public policy of California as declared in section 923 of the California Labor Code." (28 Cal.2d at page 115, 168 P.2d at page 721.) After quoting the major portion of the section, and citing the Shafer case, supra, Mr. Justice Schauer continued (28 Cal.2d at page 116, 168 P.2d at page 772):

"Where a matter is of state-wide concern, local regulation upon the subject may be enforced only if it is not in conflict with the statutes of the state. [Citing authorities.] Respondent concedes that the ordinance in question is both a regulatory and revenue measure. We think that because it is the latter as well as the former it is incompatible with the state legislation.

"The imposing of a license tax upon the exercise of the privilege of membership solicitation places an impediment in the way of realization of the state's declared policy of 'full freedom' for association and self-organization of workers. A part of the right of self-organization of employees is the right of reasonable solicitation of others to join their union. [Citing a case.] The solicitation of members is one of the most important activities of a union. Such solicitation is to a union akin to what breathing is to a human being. It is axiomatic to say that without members a union cannot function. In the development and apposition of a trade union the paid organizer usually has the duty to widely and systematically solicit workers for membership. A tax on solicitation of memberships thus tends to smother the workers' united existence. A revenue tax could be made so onerous as to proximately affect collective bargaining and the successful carrying on of concerted activities for other mutual aid or protection. The legitimate objective of the closed shop and consequent employer recognition can generally be obtained only by increase of membership and expansion of organization."

The ordinance was declared invalid because it operated in a field already occupied by state legislation. The state legislation did not refer to the power of licensing, the subject matter of the ordinance. But the court held that there was a conflict because freedom from licensing was reasonably necessary to secure the freedom of action guaranteed by the state legislation. The Porterfield case stands for the proposition that section 923 declares that it is the state's policy that no impediment may be set up by local ordinance that will stand in the way of the union's ability to bargain on a basis of equality with management, that is, that no local ordinance may interfere with voluntary collective bargaining agreements. The Shafer and Porterfield cases have never been questioned or overruled. This court, as an intermediate court, is bound by them.

Certainly the point need not be labored that the prohibitions contained in the San Benito ordinance directly impede the ability of the unions to bargain with their employers on a basis of reasonable equality, and that such impediment is more direct and substantial than the impediment to the same objective found in the Redding ordinance.

Under section 923, as interpreted by these cases, it is basic state policy "to balance the industrial equation * * * by placing employer and employee on an equal basis." Shafer v. Registered Pharmacists Union, 16 Cal.2d 379, 385, 106 P.2d 403. To accomplish this purpose the right to develop unions was granted because otherwise "the individual unorganized worker is helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract and to protect his freedom of labor, and thereby to obtain acceptable terms and conditions of employment." § 923, Labor Code. The section declares that it is an affirmative objective of state policy to equalize the bargaining power as between labor and management by means of encouraging the maintenance of effective unions. Any local ordinance that tends to obstruct this policy is directly in conflict with the state act. That is the necessary interpretation of the Porterfield case. The appellant argues that the collective bargaining powers of the unions are not affected by the ordinance, and are as fully effective now as they were before the ordinance was adopted. Such argument completely loses sight of the realities of life as they pertain to the labor-management field. Laws in this field do not operate in a vacuum. The field of labor-management relations is a highly dynamic and realistic one. By prohibiting voluntary agreements relating to union security, the ordinance necessarily and inevitably adversely affects the power of the union to bargain effectively. This is obvious. Effective collective bargaining, so far as labor is concerned, depends upon labor's negotiating agents representing all or most of the workers. Under so-called "right to work" ordinances labor's representatives would no longer be able to speak for all the workers in the field of intrastate commerce. Inevitably, a large portion of the labor force would become non-union. This would result not only because many employers would prefer non-union help and would encourage new employees not to join a union, but because many new employees would not join a labor union for the obvious reason that under the ordinance they would be entitled to all the benefits in working conditions gained by the unions without the necessity of paying union dues. Thus, unions would not only lose the revenue from dues necessary to support their activities, but when it came time to discuss a new contract, management would have a single spokesman while the employees would be divided between union and non-union representatives and would necessarily have to speak through multiple spokesmen. Bargaining strength is necessarily dependent on the employee's ability to act collectively. The net result would be a significant lack of equality in bargaining power.<sup>6</sup> This would be in direct conflict with state policy as set forth in section 923.

The conclusion that this ordinance conflicts with the general state law as set

6. This is not a mere surmise or conjecture. The Supreme Court has recognized that union security arrangements are of basic importance to the maintenance of equality in bargaining power. Thus in McKay v. Retail Automobile Salesmen's Local Union, No. 1067, 16 Cal.2d 311, 326, 106 P.2d 373, 381, the Supreme Court states: "The closed union shop is an important means of maintaining the combined bargaining power of the workers." In Shafer v. Registered Pharmacists Union, 16 Cal.2d 379, 388, 106 P.2d 403, 408, the same court stated that "the right of workmen to organize for the purpose of bargaining collectively would be effectually thwarted if each individual had the absolute right to remain 'unorganized.'" Obviously, the court may properly take judicial notice of these economic facts.

forth in section 923 is not affected by the recent Supreme Court decision of Garmon v. San Diego Building Trades Council, 49 Cal.2d 595, 320 P.2d 473. This was a second appeal in this case. On the first appeal the Supreme Court of California had affirmed an injunction and a judgment of damages against the union there involved. Garmon v. San Diego Building Trades Council, 45 Cal.2d 657, 291 P.2d 1. The Supreme Court of the United States "vacated" this determination and ordered the cause remanded for further proceedings. San Diego Bldg. Trades Council v. Garmon, 353 U.S. 26, 77 S.Ct. 607, 1 L.Ed. 2d 618.

In the Garmon case the plaintiff's employees did not belong to a union, and did not desire to join one. The plaintiff employer, for that reason, refused to sign a union shop agreement with defendants. The latter picketed plaintiff's place of business. The majority of the Supreme Court of California found that the picketing was unlawful. The majority reasoned that the picketing was an attempt to force upon plaintiff's employees terms and conditions of employment which they did not want and had specifically rejected. This activity violated the philosophy and policy of the Jurisdictional Strike Act (§§ 1115-1120, Labor Code), a statute not here involved and also violated the policy of section 923 of the Labor Code. There was a strong dissent in the Garmon case joined in by three of the justices, and the United States Supreme Court has granted certiorari in the case.

We do not find it necessary to engage in a lengthy discussion of the Garmon case. Assuming that the law stated in that case by the majority of the court is correct, it is not here even remotely applicable. That case involved a problem in interstate commerce. The instant case deals only with intrastate commerce. That case involved the Jurisdictional Strike Act, the instant one does not. But of even more importance, in the Garmon case all of the employees involved had refused to join the union that was picketing for a closed shop. In the instant case the employees want a union shop agreement and the employer wants a union shop agreement, but both are prevented from entering into such a voluntary agreement by the terms of the ordinance. The Garmon case in no way involved restraints upon labor organizations and employers who voluntarily desired to enter a union shop agreement. It dealt with a form of economic coercion being forced on both the employer and his employees against their wills. The vice of the San Benito ordinance is that it prohibits voluntary agreements in a field where the state has already pre-empted the field by declaring that the public policy of the state favors such voluntary agreements. Thus the Garmon case and the instant one involve not only different facts, but completely different legal principles.

The parties and amici curiæ argue many other points in their briefs. These need not be discussed because for reasons already stated we are convinced that the trial court correctly decided that the ordinance attempts regulation in a field already fully occupied by state law, and is, therefore, unconstitutional.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Julius A. Leetham, Los Angeles, for appellant.

Philip J. West, Fillmore, for respondents Curtis.

ASHBURN, Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from two orders which have the effect of denying a preliminary injunction, dissolving a temporary restraining order and vacating upon the court's own motion the entry of default of defendant, The Way, Inc.

[1] Plaintiff seeks to enjoin performance of an agreement between defendants W. S. Curtis & Associates and The Way, Inc. which is asserted to be violative of its own rights under an existing contract between plaintiff and defendant, The Way, Inc. Plaintiff's contract confers upon The Way, Inc. exclusive distributorship of plaintiff's nutria animals within certain specified counties of southern Florida. The distributor is named in the document as "The Way, Inc. (Victor P. Wierwille, Pres.) dba Cabana Nutria of Southern Florida." Paragraph 7 says: "Distributor will buy and sell Nutria supplied to him by Corporation exclusively, and will not buy or sell Nutria from any other company, corporation or individual, except the Nutria supplied by Corporation." Giving this language universal import plaintiff claims that the contract between the Curtis company and The Way, Inc. (actually made before knowledge of plaintiff's contract) invaded its own rights and should be enjoined as unfair competition or on some similar ground. The Curtis agreement appoints The Way, Inc. as its distributor of nutria within an exclusive territory in the western portion of the state of Ohio. The distributor therein agrees to sell only nutria supplied by Curtis.

[2] Section 1648, Civil Code, governs this case: "However broad may be the terms of a contract, it extends only to those things concerning which it appears that the parties intended to contract." See, also, Eastman Oil Well Survey Corp. v. Lane-Wells Co., 21 Cal.2d 872, 873, 136 P.2d 564; Newby v. Anderson, 36 Cal.2d 463, 470, 224 P.2d 673; Southern California Gas Co. v. Ventura Pipe Line Construction Co., 150 Cal.App.2d 253, 257-258, 309 P.2d 849. The language of paragraph 7 of plaintiff's agreement cannot be fairly construed to prevent The Way, Inc. from doing business outside of Florida or to require it in Ohio or other states to buy its supplies from plaintiff. These things were not within the purview of the contract. A promise to do no business outside the prescribed Florida territory, or to do no business with anyone but plaintiff in other states, cannot be implied unless it comes within one of the categories specified in Stockton Dry Goods Co. v. Girsh, 36 Cal.2d 677, 681, 227 P.2d 1, 3, 22 A.L.R.2d 1460: "A condition cannot be read into a contract as to which the parties might well be deemed to have remained intentionally silent. Foley v. Euless, 214 Cal. 506, 511, 6 P.2d 956. With citation of that and other cases, the court in Cousins Inv. Co. v. Hastings Clothing Co., 45 Cal. App.2d 141, 149, 113 P.2d 878, 882, summarized the rules when covenants may be implied as follows: '(1) the implication must arise from the language used or it must be indispensable to effectuate the intention of the parties; (2) it must appear from the language used that it was so clearly within the contemplation of the parties that they deemed it unnecessary to express it; (3) implied covenants can only be justified on the grounds of legal necessity; (4) a promise can be implied only where it can be rightfully assumed that it would have been made if attention had been called to it; (5) there can be no implied covenant where the subject is completely covered by the contract.' See Civ. Code, Sec. 1648." Such is not the case here. "The purpose of a writing must be ascertained solely from a common sense meaning of it as a whole with a view to effectuate the mutual intention of the parties." Broome v. Broome, 104 Cal.App.2d 148, 157, 231 P.2d 171, 176. The lower court correctly ruled that plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction upon the facts shown by the record herein.

[3] Appellant's argument that there was error in vacating the default of The Way, Inc. cannot be considered for appellant has waived its appeal from that portion of the order.

The agreement between plaintiff and The Way, Inc. says: "It is further agreed that the within contract is to be performed at Arcadia, County of Los Angeles, California. Both parties, Distributor and Corporation, expressly consent to the jurisdiction of the California Court having the venue of this matter in accordance with the foregoing, so long as either party, Distributor or Corporation, receive actual service of process." The record shows personal service within the state of Ohio of summons and complaint, order to show cause and supporting affidavits upon the president of The Way, Inc., a corporation. This probably constituted a valid basis for a personal judgment against that defendant. See, Smith v. Moore Mill & Lumber Co., 101 Cal.App. 492, 494-495, 281 P. 1049; Solot v. Linch, 46 Cal.2d 99, 104, 292 P.2d 887; Code Civ.Proc., § 406; 40 Cal.Jur.2d § 20, p. 49; 72 C.J.S. Process § 38 a, p. 1047. Said defendant did not appear at the hearing of the order to show cause why an injunction should not be granted. After that motion had been denied and the temporary restraining order dissolved, plaintiff moved the court for a rehearing, directing the notice of motion to defendants W. S. Curtis & Associates, William S. Curtis and their attorney, but not to The Way, Inc. No service of this notice was made or attempted to be made upon that corporation. It was in connection with the ruling on this motion that the court vacated the default of The Way, Inc. upon its own motion. The opening brief of appellant filed in this court shows that it was served only upon the attorney for said respondents Curtis. Only those respondents have filed a brief herein.

[4] Of course it is no longer necessary to serve a notice of appeal. Before the statute was thus amended, failure to serve the notice upon any of the successful opponents worked a waiver or abandonment of the appeal as to the party or parties not served. (2 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal (Rev.Ed.), § 210, p. 117 et seq.) Under existing rules failure to serve appellant's opening brief upon any adversary effects the same result and the court in the exercise of its inherent power may dismiss the appeal on its own motion so far as concerns the respondent who has not been served with the brief. Palmer v. Holcomb, 147 Cal.App.2d 94, 99-100, 305 P.2d 107;

Brooks v. Duskin, 159 Cal.App.2d 629, 324 P.2d 351. However, as a dismissal works an affirmance, it will suffice in this case to affirm the order in its entirety.

The orders now on appeal are affirmed.

William W. Coshow and Law Office of C. Ray Robinson, Merced, for respondent.

WARNE, Justice pro tem.

Stating the evidence most favorable to the respondent, in March of 1950 the parties to this action entered into an oral agreement whereby respondent agreed to sell and appellants agreed to buy certain improved farm property in Merced County. The agreed price of the property was $24,000. In order that the appellants might obtain a loan to carry out the deal respondent then sold and conveyed to the Department of Veterans Affairs, who, concurrently with said transfer, advanced the sum of $13,000 to the respondent and then entered into an agreement for the sale of the property to the appellants on long term installment payments. In addition to the $13,000 advanced by the Department appellants transferred a $1,500 equity in other real property to respondent.

In April of 1956 respondent brought this suit against her son and his wife to collect the balance due her for the property, i. e., $9,480, which she alleged the appellants promised to pay her in $1,000 yearly installments commencing March, 1952.

In addition to the causes of action to recover on the real property contract the complaint contained a cause of action to recover rentals which Frank C. Schalow, as respondent's agent, had collected and failed to turn over to respondent, and a further cause of action to recover the sum of $505, the agreed selling price of an Allis Chalmers Farm Tractor and ditcher and jumper attachment for same, which respondent sold to appellants. The trial court found that there was owing and due to respondent the sum of $1,358 for rent collected, and that there was owing and due the sum of $505 for the tractor and equipment. These items were included in the lump sum judgment rendered against the appellants. Appellants have not attacked the judgment in so far as it is based upon the last two items.

Winton & Edlefsen, by F. Leon Edlefsen, Merced, for appellants.

By their answer to the complaint respecting the real property transaction appellants denied that they were indebted to the respondent on account of the sale and conveyance of the real property in the sum of $9,500 or in any sum at all; denied that they agreed to pay the sum of $24,000 for the property, or any other sum in excess of the $14,500 which respondent received. As separate and special defenses they alleged that the purported agreement was not in writing and therefore barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in so far as fraud was concerned it was barred by the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure. They also by way of special defense alleged that the agreement to pay $24,000 for the real property and improvements was at the time illegal, void and unenforceable under the provisions of section 986.5 of the Military and Veterans Code of California; and lastly they pleaded and alleged that the agreement was invalid under the statute of frauds since it was not in writing subscribed by the appellants.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury and resulted in a judgment in favor of the respondent for the sum of $6,383, which was followed by this appeal.

So far as material herein the trial court found that in March of 1950 the defendants, hereinafter referred to as the appellants, purchased from respondent a certain portion of real property referred to in the proceeding as the "almond orchard," and the parties agreed that the total purchase price would be $24,000, of which only $14,500 has been paid; that the parties agreed that the balance of $9,500 would be paid at the rate of $1,000 a year commencing March 1, 1952, and that none of the annual payments have been made. The trial court further found that "there existed between the defendant, Frank C. Schalow, a confidential relationship of mother to son, and in this particular case

* * * that the highest relationship of confidence and trust existed by the mother in her son, and said relationship continued until November, 1955," and concluded that because of such confidential relationship respondent's cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations. The court also held that the statute of frauds was not a bar to recovery. The trial court, however, did not make any findings as to appellants' special defense that their oral agreement to pay $24,000 was void as it violated the provisions of section 986.5 of the Military and Veterans Code.

The evidence is uncontradicted that appellants purchased the property under the provisions of the Military and Veterans Code relating to farm and home aid to veterans (sections 985 to 988.3, inclusive, Stats.1943, ch. 1046, p. 2981, as amended) and that respondent sold her ranch to the department for $13,000 and that the department contracted to sell it to the appellants for the same amount. Section 986.5 for the Military and Veterans Code as of the date of the transaction provided, in part: "The cost of a farm to the department shall not exceed thirteen thousand five hundred dollars ($13,500), and a veteran purchasing the farm may advance the difference between the total price of the farm * * * and the cost of the farm to the department, but in no case shall the total value of the farm and the dwellings and improvements thereon exceed fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000)." Stats.1949, ch. 419, sec. 3, p. 768. Emphasis added.

Appellants first contend that the statutory provision rendered illegal and void any agreement to pay more than $15,000.

In Young v. Hampton, 36 Cal.2d 799, 802, 805, 228 P.2d 1, 3, 19 A.L.R.2d 1380, a veteran obtained a loan under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act (38 U.S.C.A. § 694a), which provides that the government will guarantee a loan to a veteran for home construction if "the price paid or to be paid by the veteran

* * * for the cost of construction
* * * does not exceed the reasonable value thereof as determined by proper appraisal made by an appraiser designated by the Administrator." It was held that the veteran's agreement to pay the contractor an amount in excess of the appraised value was void as it violated the basic policy of the act, to wit, "to assure terms of payment which bear a proper relation to the veteran's present and anticipated income and expenses. The requirement of the same section that the price to be paid by the veteran for the cost of construction shall not exceed the reasonable value as established by a designated appraiser was obviously enacted to protect the borrower from acquiring property at an exorbitant price." The court held that the contract was clearly contrary to public policy and denied recovery.

[1,2] Although the court in the Young case was considering a federal statute and the case involved a transaction between a veteran and a contractor rather than a contract for the sale and purchase of farm land and improvements, we see no reason why the rule with reference to public policy as applied in that case is not likewise applicable to this case. The federal statute under consideration in the Young case and section 986.5 of the Military and Veterans Code of California are quite comparable in their purpose. Here we are dealing with a price limitation of $15,000 as fixed by the code section. Similarly in the Young case, the limitation under the federal statute was that the price to be paid by the veteran for such property or cost of construction should not exceed the appraised value. The requirement under the provisions of section 986.5 of the code that the price shall not exceed $15,000 was obviously for the protection of the veteran. Hence the contract in question violated the policy of the law and is void.

[3,4] However, respondent contends that because at the time of bringing the suit the maximum price under section 986.5 had been increased to $30,000 this amount should govern the transaction, and not the $15,000 limitation set forth in the statute at the time the agreement was entered into. Since we find no language or provision in the statute as amended indicating that the legislature intended the amendment to be retrospective we do not agree with respondent. The general rule, applicable alike to constitutions and statutes, is that they are not to be considered retrospective in their operation unless the intent to make them so clearly appears from their terms. Willcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 455, 460, 123 P. 276.

[5] Since a contract which is against public policy may not be made the foundation of an action, either in law or equity (12 Cal.Jur.2d, sec. 77, p. 280, and cases cited), we conclude that the trial court erred in failing to rule upon the issue and in allowing respondent $5,000 on the cause of action based upon the agreement for the purchase and sale of the real property.

Since appellants in their briefs filed herein make no attack upon the balance of the judgment based upon the other transactions heretofore mentioned, it is ordered that the judgment be modified and reduced to the sum of $1,863. Respondent to recover her costs.

Action on a life policy. The Superior Court, Sacramento County, John Quincy Brown, J., entered judgment adverse to beneficiary and she appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Schottky, J., held that provision in a questionnaire signed by insured as part of his application for policy wherein he authorized and requested anyone concerned to disclose any and all information and records concerning insured's condition when under observation by such person, if requested to do so by insurer, constituted a waiver of patient-physician privilege, and therefore, physicians who had treated insured were competent to testify in such regard.

Judgment affirmed.

Provision in a questionnaire signed by insured as part of his application for a life policy, wherein he authorized anyone concerned to disclose any and all information and records concerning insured's condition when under observation by such person, if requested to do so by insurer, constituted a waiver of patient-physician privilege, and therefore physicians who had treated insured were competent to testify in such regard in action by beneficiary for recovery of proceeds of policy which insurer refused to pay on ground that insured made incomplete and untrue statements in his application for the policy. West's Ann.Code Civ.Proc. § 1881, subd. 4.

3. Insurance ⇨388(3)

Mere fact that examining physician for life insurer found no heart condition when he examined insured did not mean that insurer waived the right to rely on information given by insured in his application for insurance, as to his examination and treatment by other doctors.

6. Insurance ⇨256(1)

It is not necessary that a misrepresentation relied on by a life insurer to defeat liability under a life policy have a causal connection with the death of the insured.

Bradford, Cross, Dahl & Hefner, Sacramento, for appellant.

SCHOTTKY, Justice.

This action was brought to recover on a contract of insurance on the life of William P. Torbensen. The insurer, Family Life Insurance Company, refused to pay the amount of the policy upon the ground that the deceased made incomplete and untrue statements in the application for the policy. The trial court denied recovery except for the premiums paid, and this appeal followed.

The facts, viewed in the light most favorable to the respondent insurer, discloses that on April 26, 1955, the insurer issued its policy of life insurance on the life of the decedent, William P. Torbensen. On August 20, 1955, the insured died of cancer. All premiums accrued to the date of death were paid. Margaret Torbensen, appellant herein, gave the insurer the required proof of death and demanded payment. The insurer refused payment on the ground that false statements were made to the examining physician in the application for insurance. At the time the deceased submitted to the physical examination required by the insurer he was asked, among other questions, whether he was in good health and free from bodily impairment, to which he answered yes; whether he had consulted a physician in the past five years, to which the answer was that he had consulted a Dr. Wiseman for low blood pressure; whether or not he had ever had heart disease, to which the answer was no; and whether or not he had ever had an electrocardiogram taken, to which the decedent answered no. At the bottom of the questionnaire above the deceased's signature appeared the following:

To Whom it May concern:

"I hereby authorize and request you to disclose any and all information and records concerning my condition when under observation by you, if requested to do so by Family Life Insurance Company * * *"

At the time the application was prepared the deceased was under the care of Dr. John Craig for an ailment which Dr. Craig had diagnosed as a heart condition. Dr. Craig testified that he had informed the deceased of his condition and had the deceased submit to an electrocardiogram and had prescribed during his course of treatment drugs which are used to relieve pain in heart disease.

Dr. Wiseman was contacted by the insurer and upon receipt of his reply the policy was issued as of the date of the application. The insurer did not know of any other doctors who had treated the insured but evidence disclosed that if the names of any other doctors had been known the insurer would have contacted them and made a more complete investigation; that the insurer would not have issued a policy if it had known of Dr. Craig's diagnosis, irrespective of its correctness.

The trial court found that the false and incomplete answers of the decedent were made with intent to deceive the insurer; that the insurer relied on the representations made; that if the true facts had been known they would have probably and reasonably influenced the insurer in its determination of whether or not it should issue the policy; and that if the true facts had been known the insurer would not have issued the policy. Judgment was entered in favor of the insurer.

[1,2] Appellant's first contention is that the testimony of Dr. Craig and another physician who treated the deceased should have been excluded. Section 1881, subd. 4 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in part that a licensed physician cannot, without the consent of the patient, be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable him to prescribe for the patient. It is clear that without a waiver the doctors were incompetent to testify in this case as to those matters covered by the statutory privilege. But that part of the application which pertained to the applicant's health and which was completed at the time of the medical examination by the insurer's physician and signed by the deceased included the alleged waiver clause hereinbefore set forth. The trial court held this to be a waiver of the privilege. The privilege may be waived but it must clearly appear there is an intention to waive, and a court will not run to such a conclusion. Kramer v. Policy Holders' Life Ins. Ass'n, 5 Cal.App.2d 380, 391, 42 P.2d 665; Newell v. Newell, 146 Cal.App.2d 166, 178, 303 P.2d 839. It seems clear that the paragraph previously quoted was correctly construed by the trial court as a waiver of the privilege. In context, since it was part of the application pertaining to the applicant's state of health, the paragraph can only be interpreted to mean that the applicant was waiving his privilege of having his physician remain mute as to matters learned during the course of treatment of the applicant. Accordingly, Dr. Craig and the other physicians who had treated the applicant were competent to testify. See George v. Guarantee Mutual Life Company, 144 Neb. 285, 13 N.W.2d 176.

[3, 4] Appellant next contends that even if the provision can be construed as a waiver the insurer waived the right to the information by its failure to make inquiries as to such facts where they were distinctly implied in other facts of which information was communicated. In this regard it is claimed that because Dr. Prisinzano, the examining physician for the insurer, found no heart condition when he examined the deceased the insurer could not be allowed to disavow the findings of their own doctor. The fact that the deceased was examined by the insurer's doctor would not compel a finding of waiver. We have here an applicant for insurance who gives false answers to questions which are asked for the purpose of giving the insurer information from which it can determine whether or not it shall accept the risk. Appellant in effect argues that if an insurance company has an applicant examined, any false answers made by the applicant become immaterial. However, by failing to reveal the fact of his examination and treatment by doctors not named in the application the applicant deprived the insurer of facts that might well have affected the extent of its investigation and its examination of the applicant. An insurance company is entitled to rely on the truthfulness of the answers given in the application. Robinson v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., 131 Cal.App.2d 581, 281 P.2d 39; Cohen v. Penn Mutual Life Ins. Co., 48 Cal.2d 720, 312 P.2d 241. Dr. Prisinzano testified that if the answers had been truthful a more complete examination would have been given, particularly with regard to the heart condition. The insurer introduced evidence that if it had known of the other doctors who had treated the applicant it would have contacted them.

[5, 6] Appellant's final contention is that in any event the false statements and concealments were immaterial. The deceased died of cancer of the lung. The attending physician at the time of death testified that he did not find anything that would indicate that the deceased had heart trouble. Appellant argues that since the deceased did not have heart disease the false answers did not go to the materiality of the risk. It is not necessary that the misrepresentation have any causal connection with the death of the insured. Robinson v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., supra. The question is whether the misrepresentation is such that if the insurer had known the true facts it would have made further inquiries or would have been influenced materially in its decision in accepting the risk. There was testimony that if the insurer had known a heart condition was suspected it would not have issued the policy. Under such circumstances we cannot say that the false answers were immaterial.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 17934.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
 Division 2, California.

Sept. 10, 1958.

Hearing Denied Nov. 5, 1958.

Action by daughter and her husband against mother for decree that mother held real property in trust for them in accordance with terms of oral promise under which plaintiffs had made valuable improvements on property in reliance upon trust and which mother had breached by informing plaintiffs that she intended to sell property. The Superior Court, Contra Costa County, Harold Jacoby, J., entered judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiffs appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Dooling, J., held that question whether mother, who had received property from her husband, had agreed to hold title to property during her lifetime and on her death to cause legal title to pass to daughter was for trier of fact and that action was not barred by statute of frauds.

Reversed.

1. Trial ⇨139(1)

If evidence viewed most favorably for plaintiff would support a judgment for any of relief prayed for, judgment of nonsuit to that extent would be erroneous.

2. Trusts ⇨371(2)

Complaint, filed by daughter and her husband against mother, stated cause of action predicated on theory that mother held real property she had received on death of father in trust for plaintiffs who had made valuable improvements on property in reliance upon trust, even though complaint did not plead that mother held property in trust and nowhere in pleading, except in prayer, was the word trust used.

3. Trusts ⇨373

In action by daughter and her husband against mother for decree that mother held real property in trust for them in accordance with terms of an oral agreement under which plaintiffs allegedly made valuable improvements on property in reliance upon trust, question whether mother agreed to hold property in trust for common use of plaintiffs and herself during her lifetime with title to vest in daughter upon mother's death was for trier of fact.

4. Trusts ⇨17(8)

If daughter and her husband made improvements on mother's property in accordance with terms of oral agreement of mother to hold property in trust for plaintiffs during her lifetime with title to vest in daughter upon mother's death, and improvements amounted to several times the original value of property, oral declaration of trust would be taken out of statute of frauds. West's Ann.Civ.Code, § 1624, subds. 4, 6; West's Ann.Code Civ.Proc. § 1973, subds. 4, 6.

5. Trusts ⇨25(1)

Where owner of property declares that he holds it for benefit of another, this may be sufficient manifestation of intention to create a trust by declaring himself trustee of property, although he does not use the word trust.

6. Trusts ⇨17(8)

Mere payment of money is insufficient to take oral contract for creation of trust with respect to real property out of statute of frauds and performance of services which can be adequately compensated in money is insufficient, but making of substantial improvements upon real property involved in reliance upon the oral promise is sufficient for that purpose. West's Ann. Civ.Code, § 1624, subds. 4, 6; West's Ann. Code Civ.Proc. § 1973, subds. 4, 6.

7. Frauds, Statute of ⇨144

The estoppel, upon which is based the rule that part performance may take an oral promise to create a trust with respect to real property out of statute of frauds, may operate in case of an oral contract not to be performed in lifetime of promisor, and such estoppel does not require either substantial reliance upon the misrepresentation that the statute has been satisfied or reliance on another's promise that he will reduce the oral contract to writing. West's Ann. Civ.Code, § 1624, subds. 4, 6; West's Ann.Code Civ.Proc. § 1973, subds. 4, 6.

8. Limitation of Actions ☞103(1)

Cause of action for breach of and repudiation of mother's oral promise to hold real property in trust for daughter and her husband during her lifetime with title to vest in daughter upon mother's death arose when mother informed daughter and husband that she intended to sell property and action brought within two years of repudiation of promise was not barred by statute of limitations even though trust was created more than two years prior to repudiation. West's Ann.Code Civ.Proc. §§ 312, 339.

9. Limitation of Actions ☞49(1)

Where basis of recovery by daughter and her husband of money expended in improvement of real property was the repudiation of oral promise of owner to hold property for her lifetime with title to vest in daughter on owner's death and the unjust enrichment of owner, action was on implied promise to repay advances when original oral promise in reliance upon which money had been advanced could not be enforced because of statute of frauds, but until repudiation of oral promise, there was no implied promise to repay and no suit for restitution could have been maintained, and statute of limitations was no bar to such action even though more than two years had elapsed between expenditure of sums and commencement of action. West's Ann. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 312, 339.

DOOLING, Justice.

Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment of nonsuit. Plaintiffs are husband and wife and the wife, Doreen, is the daughter of the defendant.

The action went to trial on the third amended complaint. The first count of this complaint seeks a decree that the defendant holds certain real property in trust for the plaintiffs and the defendant in accordance with the terms of an oral agreement therein alleged. The other counts, four in number, seek a money judgment from defendant for moneys expended by plaintiffs in the improvement of the real property and the establishment of a chicken business thereon and for damages for breach of the oral agreement establishing the trust.

[1] It needs no citation of authority for the rule that if the evidence viewed most favorably for the plaintiffs would support a judgment for any of the relief prayed for the judgment of nonsuit to that extent is erroneous.

The real property involved is ranch property. This property was originally acquired by the father of plaintiff, Doreen, and the defendant while they were husband and wife. The father died in 1950 and the ranch property passed to defendant upon his death. The complaint alleges with regard to this property:

"That subsequent to the death of the said Alfred Rainoldi [the father], in the latter part of 1950, and more particularly in January of 1951 * * * defendant * * * told plaintiffs that she was not in a financial position to make the necessary improvements and repairs to the property and requested plaintiffs to do so, and that if they made such necessary improvements and repairs that she, the defendant, would hold legal title to the property in her name during her lifetime, and that during her lifetime she would share the use and enjoyment of said property and the improvements so requested to be made thereupon by plaintiffs, and cause said legal title to the property to pass to them upon her death * * * that she would not sell the property during her lifetime unless she became financially destitute, and then only if plaintiffs were unable to care for her * * *."

This is followed by allegations that plaintiffs accepted this proposal, went into the possession of said property and made extensive and substantial improvements thereon all in reliance upon the promise and agreement of defendant as alleged. The amount expended by plaintiffs in making such improvements as alleged to have been $16,800. There is a further allegation that at a later date, and after such improvements were completed, with the consent of defendant plaintiffs spent $20,000 to establish a chicken business upon said property in additional improvements thereon and the purchase of poultry. It is further alleged that in 1955 defendant informed plaintiffs that she intended to sell the property unless plaintiffs would themselves buy it from her for the sum of $18,500.

Plaintiff Doreen testified that shortly after her father's death plaintiffs and defendant visited the ranch. At that time her mother stated:

"I don't have the money to take care of the ranch and fix it up in order to save it myself, but I don't want to sell it, but if you kids are willing to want to put some money in here to fix it up, well enough to save the house so that we can use it, then I would be happy and I could keep it. If not, I have to sell the place because I can't afford it myself and I can buy Telephone stock with the money. But after all,' she said, 'I want you to think this over because you are my only heir and even if I do marry it would never make any difference, you are still my daughter and you would get whatever I have.' And she said, 'Which would you rather have, would you rather have the Telephone stock or would you rather do something to save the ranch house? Does it mean that much to you, and if it does, you do the things that are necessary to keep the house here so that we can use it, make it suitable to use and save it from going down the hill, and I will keep the ranch.' She really addressed the question to both of us. I have always been sentimental as all of the Rainoldis have been about the ranch, and I said, 'Gee, if it is a question of that and we can do something around here, I much rather have the ranch than the Telephone stock if I have a choice,' but we told her we didn't blame her, we understood her position, she was a widow, she was by herself and we weren't going to press her into doing one thing or the other, but we were both pleased that we had a choice of the ranch or the Telephone stock."

This witness further quoted defendant as saying: "* * * that if we did this, paid for it ourselves, * * * that she would keep the ranch no matter if she married or anything else happened, she would keep the ranch, she wanted to keep it in her name. * * * So she said, 'If you do these things then I will keep the ranch house and when I pass away it will be yours and your children's' * * * she said, 'There's one thing, I will have to say this: If I should become ill or if something should happen that I would be destitute and need the money, then in a case like that of course I would have to sell the ranch.' And we said '* * * but if we could afford at the time to take care of her, would she sell the ranch then or would it be just as well if she had the proper care at that time,' and she said 'If you will take care of me, then I won't have to sell the ranch.'"

The witness further testified that at a later conversation, in discussing the amount that would need to be expended in improving the ranch house, defendant said: "I'll tell you what—those things have to be done that we have discussed and anything else that you kids want to do to make that house livable, I want you to go ahead and do. What I really want you to do is feel that the place is yours as well as mine and I don't want you to wait until I die to fix it up so that you can enjoy it. I want you to fix it up now so that you and the kids and your friends and my friends and all the family can go up there and enjoy the ranch today, not after I am gone."

The plaintiff Robert gave similar testimony and there was testimony from another witness that the defendant had stated that "she had told them especially to go ahead and fix it up any way they wanted to fix it, because it was going to be theirs anyway * * * she was happy they were fixing it * * * because in time it would be theirs * * *." Other witnesses testified to similar admissions.

The nonsuit as to the first count was granted on the ground that the action was barred by the statute of frauds. The agreement being one involving an interest in real property and not to be fully performed during the lifetime of the promisor is one required by the statute to be in writing. Civ.Code, § 1624, subs. 4, 6; Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subs. 4, 6.

Appellants rely upon the rule stated in Restatement Trusts, section 50: "Although a trust of an interest in land is orally declared and no memorandum is signed, the trust is enforceable if, with the consent of the trustee, the beneficiary as such enters into possession of the land or makes valuable improvements thereon * * *."

An oral trust in land was held enforceable under this rule in Mulli v. Mulli, 105 Cal.App.2d 68, 232 P.2d 556, where "respondents with the consent of appellant made valuable improvements on the property in reliance upon the trust." 105 Cal. App.2d at pages 73-74, 232 P.2d at page 559.

Respondent says of the Mulli case: "In that case the complaint specifically set up the holding of a one-half interest in the property in trust by the defendant for the benefit of the plaintiff. The court at page 750 of its opinion [105 Cal.App.2d 75, 232 P.2d 559] specifically avoided the question of whether a cause of action for a specific performance of an oral contract to convey real property had been stated."

[2,3] We are unable to follow the attempted distinction. While the complaint herein does not plead that defendant "holds the property in trust" (which would be a legal conclusion at best) it pleads the facts and asks for a judgment decreeing that defendant holds the property in trust with a declaration of the terms of such trust. If the facts establish the existence of a trust and its terms, those facts bring the case within the authority of Mulli. Plaintiffs, no more than in Mulli, are seeking specific performance of a contract. They are seeking the judicial establishment of the existence of a trust and its terms by court decree.

[4,5] While it is true that nowhere in the pleading (except in the prayer) or in the evidence is the word "trust" used it is well settled, as stated in Mulli (105 Cal. App.2d at page 73, 232 P.2d at page 558): "Where the owner of property declares that he holds it for the benefit of another, this may be a sufficient manifestation of intention to create a trust by declaring himself trustee of the property, although he does not use the word 'trust.'" Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 405, 417, 18 P. 866, 27 P. 1082; Lynch v. Rooney, 112 Cal. 279, 283-285, 44 P. 565; People v. Pierce, 110 Cal. App.2d 598, 605, 243 P.2d 585; Weiner v. Mullaney, 59 Cal.App.2d 620, 631, 140 P.2d 704; Cooper v. Cooper, 3 Cal.App.2d 154, 160-161, 39 P.2d 820; Scott on Trusts, 2d Ed., § 24, pp. 181-182; Restatement Trusts, § 24(2). Measured by this rule the testimony above set out, if believed, is sufficient to support a finding that defendant agreed to hold the property in trust for the common use of plaintiffs and herself during her lifetime with title to vest in her daughter upon her death. The making of the valuable improvements herein testified to running into an amount several times in excess of the original value of the property clearly satisfies the rule taking the oral declaration of trust out of the statute of frauds. See Haskell v. First Nat.

Bank, 33 Cal.App.2d 399, 91 P.2d 934, similarly enforcing an oral trust against the estate of a decedent where the plaintiffs had made substantial improvements on the real property in reliance on the oral declarations of the decedent.)

[6] Respondent relies upon Shive v. Barrow, 88 Cal.App.2d 838, 199 P.2d 693. That case is distinguishable. In Barrow the plaintiff advanced money and performed services for the decedent. It is true money and services went into the improvement of the property, but the court treated the case as one in which the payment of money and performance of services were relied upon to take the oral promise out of the statute. See 88 Cal.App.2d 843-847, 199 P.2d 696-699. The mere payment of money has never been held sufficient to take the oral contract out of the statute (Anderson v. Stansbury, 38 Cal.2d 707, 716, 242 P.2d 305) nor has the performance of services which can be adequately compensated in money (cases cited in Shive v. Barrow, supra, 88 Cal. App.2d at page 844, 199 P.2d at page 697). Conversely it has always been the law, stemming from the early English cases, that the making of substantial improvements upon the real property involved in reliance upon the oral promise is sufficient for that purpose. Pomeroy's Specific Performance of Contracts, 3d Ed., § 126, p. 323 et seq.; 1 Bogert, Trusts and Trustees, § 92, p. 467; Restatement Contracts, § 197(a). In the first year of its existence our Supreme Court in Tohler v. Folsom, 1 Cal. 207, 212, said:

"The question * * * is, whether there has been such a part performance by the plaintiff, as to put him into a situation, which would be a fraud upon him, unless the verbal agreement should be enforced. (Story, Eq.Juris., sec. 761.) One case put by Story (id. ibid.) in which specific performance ought to be decreed, is, where a vendee, upon a parol agreement for a sale of land, should proceed to build a house on the land, in a confidence of the due completion of the contract. In such a case, he says, there would be a manifest fraud upon the party, in permitting the vendor to escape from due and strict fulfilment of such agreement."

This rule has been consistently followed in our courts through 108 years. Monarco v. Lo Greco, 35 Cal.2d 621, 626, 220 P.2d 737; Magee v. Magee, 174 Cal. 276, 280, 162 P. 1023; Calanchini v. Branstetter, 84 Cal. 249, 253, 24 P. 149; Burlingame v. Rowland, 77 Cal. 315, 317, 19 P. 526, 1 L.R.A. 829; Arguello v. Edinger, 10 Cal. 150, 158; Salmons v. Jameson, 144 Cal.App. 2d 698, 705, 301 P.2d 431; Frank v. Tavares, 142 Cal.App.2d 683, 687, 298 P.2d 887. The court in Shive v. Barrow neither cited nor discussed any of the cases announcing this long-settled rule. The decision therefore cannot be considered an authority on the effect of the making of substantial improvements in reliance on the oral promise.

In the second place in Shive v. Barrow the case was not presented or decided on the theory of an express oral trust but solely on the theory of an oral contract to devise. If in spite of these differences there be thought to be any inconsistency between the Barrow and Mulli cases we must follow Mulli; it is not only the later decision but in Mulli the Supreme Court denied a petition for hearing (105 Cal.App.2d at page 75, 232 P.2d 556) while in Barrow no hearing in the Supreme Court was asked for (88 Cal.App.2d at page 850, 199 P.2d at page 700).

Of even less weight is Trout v. Ogilvie, 41 Cal.App. 167, 182 P. 333. The court in Ogilvie thought that because "part performance" was mentioned in the then section 1741 of the Civil Code in connection with agreements for the sale of lands the doctrine could not be extended to other provisions of the statute of frauds. 41 Cal. App. at page 174, 182 P. at page 335. Whatever force this reasoning may have had at that time is no longer valid since the repeal of that section 1741 in 1931 and the substitution in its place of the present section 1741 dealing with an entirely different subject, sales by auction. Stats.1931, p. 2242.

[7] That the estoppel, upon which the rule that "part performance" may take an oral promise out of the statute of frauds is based (Monarco v. Lo Greco, supra, 35 Cal.2d at page 626, 220 P.2d at page 741), may operate in the case of an oral contract not to be performed in the lifetime of the promisor is too well settled now to be subject to dispute. Monarco v. Lo Greco, supra, 35 Cal.2d 621, 220 P.2d 737; Notten v. Mensing, 3 Cal.2d 469, 45 P.2d 198. Nor does such estoppel require, as respondent argues "either (1) substantial reliance upon a misrepresentation that the Statute has been satisfied or (2) reliance on another's promise that he will reduce the oral contract to writing." That ghost was finally laid in definitive fashion in Monarco where the court considered a similar argument (35 Cal.2d at pages 625-626, 220 P.2d at pages 741-742) and concluded: "In reality it is not the representation that the contract will be put in writing or that the statute will not be invoked, but the promise that the contract will be performed that a party relies upon when he changes his position because of it."

[8] The nonsuit of the four counts seeking restitution and damages was granted on the ground that they were barred by the two year statute of limitations, Code Civ.Proc. § 339. Count 5 sought damages for the breach and repudiation of the oral promise to hold the property in trust. It is obviously a count for alternative relief if for any reason the trust cannot be judicially enforced. Under the evidence produced by the plaintiffs if believed by the court the trust can be established by the court's decree as prayed for in count 1 and plaintiffs will not be entitled to the alternative relief sought under count 5. No cause of action on count 5, however, arose until the repudiation of the trust since no breach occurred until that time. The alternative cause of action stated in count 5 therefore was not barred by the statute of limitations.

[9] Counts 2, 3 and 4 were for the recovery of money expended in the improvement of the real property. More than two years elapsed between the expenditure of these sums and the commencement of the action. The basis of such recovery is the repudiation of the oral trust and the unjust enrichment which would accrue to the oral trustor thereby. The action is on the implied promise which the law imposes to repay advances where the original oral promise in reliance upon which the money was advanced cannot be enforced because of the statute of frauds. Zellner v. Wassman, 184 Cal. 80, 88, 193 P. 84; Paul v. Layne & Bowler Corp., 9 Cal.2d 561, 566, 71 P.2d 817; Leoni v. Delany, 83 Cal.App.2d 303, 310, 188 P.2d 765, 189 P. 2d 517. Here again if the trial court believes the plaintiffs' testimony and enters its decree establishing the existence of a trust the basis of the implied promise will not exist. Obviously plaintiffs would not be entitled to the double recovery which would be involved if the court both enforced the trust and allowed a recovery of the money expended in reliance upon it. It is therefore only in the case, which we cannot foresee, that the court should find the existence of the oral trust but also find itself unable to enforce it that plaintiffs would be entitled to a recovery of the money invested in reliance thereon. In that unlikely event plaintiffs would be entitled to such recovery, however, unless their action is barred by the statute of limitations.

The very basis of the cause of action, as we have seen, is the implied promise which the law raises because the oral promise cannot be enforced. It seems logical to hold that until the repudiation of the oral promise, or its breach in some other fashion, the law imposes no such implied promise to repay. Such is the rule in the case of actions to recover money paid the vendor under oral contracts to convey real property. Laffey v. Kaufman, 134 Cal. 391, 66 P. 471, 472. In that case the court said at page 393 of 134 Cal., at page 472 of 66 P.: "The right of the vendee of land, under a verbal contract, to recover the money or other consideration paid, is by all the authorities confined to those cases where the vendor has refused or become unable to carry out the contract * * *." To the same effect: Thompson v. Schurman, 65 Cal.App.2d 432, 437-438, 150 P.2d 509; Restatement Contracts, § 355(4); 49 Am.Jur., Statute of Frauds, § 564, p. 870. The statute of limitations only commences to run "after the cause of action shall have accrued" (Code Civ.Proc. § 312) and the "cause of action accrues when a suit may be maintained thereon, and the statute of limitations therefore begins to run at that time" (Dillon v. Board of Pension Com'rs, 18 Cal.2d 427, 430, 116 P.2d 37, 39, 136 A.L.R. 800).

We are satisfied that until defendant's oral promise was repudiated no suit for restitution could have been maintained and hence the statute of limitations is no bar to these counts. This question was not decided in Long v. Rumsey, 12 Cal.2d 334, 84 P.2d 146, nor in any of the other cases cited by respondent.

Judgment reversed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.
Sept. 10, 1958.

Action for consequential losses and for injuries sustained by six year old boy whose eyeball was pierced by radiator ornament when he ran into front of parked automobile manufactured by defendant. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Leon T. David, J., dismissed the action, and plaintiffs appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Nourse, J. pro tem., held that statute prohibiting sale or operation of motor vehicle equipped with protruding radiator ornament was not designed to protect those who, solely by reason of their own act or omission, might come in contact with vehicle while it was lawfully standing unattended upon highway, and held that violation of that statute did not constitute negligence for which manufacturer could be held liable in this case.

Affirmed.

1. Negligence ⚡2

Defendant in negligence action could only be held liable to plaintiff if it had breached duty which it owed him.

2. Automobiles ⚡16

Risk of injury to those whose own acts or acts of others might cause them to collide with parked vehicle was not one which manufacturer of vehicle was required to anticipate or to protect against.

3. Negligence ⚡136(2)

Whether duty on part of defendant exists is question of law for court in negligence action; but such duty once having been found to exist, it is question of fact as to whether there was breach of such duty.

4. Negligence ⚡6

Unless person injured is within class of persons whom statute was designed to protect and hazard is one which statute was designed to protect against, no liability arises out of its violation.

5. Automobiles ⚡16

Statute prohibiting sale or operation of motor vehicle equipped with protruding radiator ornament was not designed to protect those who, solely by reason of their own act or omission, might come in contact with vehicle while it was lawfully standing unattended upon highway; and violation of that statute would not constitute negligence for which manufacturer could be held liable in action for injuries sustained by child whose left eyeball was pierced by ornament when he ran into front of parked vehicle. West's Ann.Vehicle Code, § 683.

6. Automobiles ☞11

Statute prohibiting sale or operation of motor vehicle equipped with protruding radiator ornament is a penal one and may not be construed so as to make unlawful an act not included within its terms. West's Ann. Vehicle Code, § 683.

NOURSE, Justice pro tem.

Defendant's demurrer to plaintiffs' second amended complaint having been sustained upon grounds that the causes of action plead were uncertain and on the further grounds that none of them stated a case of action and plaintiffs having failed to amend their complaint within the time limited by the court, plaintiffs appeal from the order dismissing the action.

By the first and second causes of action the plaintiff, Charles Terrance Hatch, a minor, seeks damages against the defendant. By the third and fourth causes of action plaintiff, Curtis C. Hatch, the father of Charles, seeks to recover damages sustained by him by reason of the injuries sustained by his son. The question as to whether a cause of action is stated is the same in the third and fourth causes of action as it is in the first and second and we will therefore confine our discussion to the first two causes of action.

In substance the first cause of action alleges the following facts: On June 30, 1955, a certain automobile manufactured and assembled by the defendant and sold as new after January 1939 was parked at the edge of Stansbury Avenue; at the time of the sale of said motor vehicle and at the date above mentioned there was included as a part of said automobile a pointed radiator decoration or radiator ornament, approximately 9¾ inches in length, which was fastened to the front and center portion of said automobile over the radiator thereof and pointed forward so as to protrude beyond the front of that portion of the automobile to which it was attached. (It is not alleged that it protruded beyond the front of the vehicle.) On the aforementioned date the plaintiff, Charles Hatch, who was then 6 years of age proceeded on foot along Stansbury Avenue towards the front of said automobile (there being no sidewalks) and collided with said automobile with the result that said decoration pierced his left eyeball causing the loss of that eye. It is further alleged that said accident was caused solely and proximately by the negligence of the defendant in failing to exercise reasonable care in the manufacture, assembly and sale of said motor vehicle in that the defendant manufactured said vehicle under a plan or design by which defendant utilized the decoration above mentioned and thereby created "an unreasonable risk and danger that the anatomy of a person coming in contact with the front portion of the vehicle would be pierced, thus rendering the vehicle and decoration or ornament dangerous for the uses for which defendants manufactured the same" and in that the defendants failed and refused to exercise reasonable care in the adoption of a "*safe plan and design for * * * said vehicle and decoration or ornament.*" (Italics ours.) It is further alleged that the plaintiff was a person whom the defendant might reasonably expect to be in the vicinity of the vehicle and its probable use.

[1] The question posed as to the first cause of action is: Did the defendant owe to the plaintiff a nonstatutory duty to manufacture an automobile with which it was safe to collide? Unless such duty existed this count of the complaint does not state a cause of action for defendant can only be held liable to the plaintiff if it breached a duty which it owed him. Routh v. Quinn, 20 Cal.2d 488, 491-492, 127 P.2d 1, 149 A.L.R. 215; Richards v. Stanley, 43 Cal.2d 60, 63, 271 P.2d 23; Copfer v. Golden, 135 Cal.App.2d 623, 634, 288 P.2d 90; 35 Cal. Jur.2d 495.

The facts here do not present the question as to whether defendant owed to the public a duty to so design its automobile as to lessen the severity of injuries that might be caused by it if it were negligently operated on the highways of this State but only the question as to whether it owed to the public, including the plaintiff, the duty above stated, i. e., to so design the vehicles sold by it as to prevent the type of injury sustained by the plaintiff when said automobile was at rest, properly parked upon the highway. Counsel for the plaintiff have not cited us to any authorities which uphold their contention that the defendant owed any such duty and our own research has not disclosed any.

There is not involved in this case any question of a defect which created a risk of injury to its driver or passengers therein or to persons upon the highway through its use in the normal manner for which it was manufactured to be used such as were involved in MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co., 217 N.Y. 382, 111 N.E. 1050, L.R.A. 1916F, 696; Olds Motor Works v. Shaffner, 145 Ky. 616, 140 S.W. 1047, 37 L.R.A., N.S., 560; Flies v. Fox Bros. Buick Company, 196 Wis. 196, 218 N.W. 855, 60 A.L.R. 357.

[2] The vehicle in question here, in the condition in which it was by the complaint alleged to be, was safe to park and could cause no harm except to one whose own acts or the acts of some third person caused him to collide with it. Such a risk is not one which the defendant was required to anticipate or to protect against. Richards v. Stanley, supra, 43 Cal.2d 60, 65-67, 271 P.2d 23.

[3] Whether a duty on the part of the defendant exists is a question of law for the court. Richards v. Stanley, supra; Redington v. Pacific Postal Telegraph Cable Co., 107 Cal. 317, 324, 40 P. 432; 36 Cal.Jur.2d 84-85; Prosser on Torts, p. 281 and cases there cited under Note 9. The duty having been found to exist, whether it has been breached is a question of fact for the triers of the facts. McEvoy v. American Pool Corp., 32 Cal.2d 295, 298-299, 195 P.2d 783; Copfer v. Golden, supra, 135 Cal.App.2d 623, 629-630, 288 P.2d 90; 36 Cal.Jur.2d 84-85.

If we were to hold that there was a duty to render a vehicle safe to collide with rather than simply a duty to so manufacture it as to make it safe for the use for which it is intended, i. e., to move upon the highways or to be safely parked, that duty would apply not only to ornaments such as that in question here but to functional parts of the vehicle. If, in the present case, the minor plaintiff had stumbled as he approached the vehicle and struck his face against a headlight lens causing it to fracture and lacerate his eye, the question of duty to make the vehicle safe to collide with would be clearly presented under a claim that if the headlight lens had been made of safety glass the plaintiff would not have lost his eye; or, if the plaintiff had collided with the side of the car and his eye been impaled upon a radio antenna which had been telescoped so that its point protruded but a few inches above the body of the car, again the claim might be made that this created a danger which might have been avoided by enclosing the radio antenna within the body of the car so as not to protrude therefrom. In other words, each case in which a person collided with a standing vehicle and received some injury from a part of the vehicle which injury he might not have sustained had the vehicle been constructed in some other manner would raise a question of fact as to whether the manufacturer was liable to that person. In effect the triers of the facts would be the arbiters of the design of automobiles and the standard of design would be determined not when the automobile was manufactured but after the occurrence of an accident.

Plaintiff seeks to apply such cases as Grimes v. Richfield Oil Co., 106 Cal.App. 416, 289 P. 245 and Judy v. Doyle, 130 Va. 392, 108 S.E. 6. They are not applicable. They do not involve any question of a manufacturer's liability for a design of the vehicle, but only the question of the negligent use of a vehicle by the operator in obstructing the highway by an overhanging or protruding load. In our opinion neither the first nor the third counts of the complaint states a cause of action against the defendant.

By his second cause of action plaintiff alleges that the vehicle in question was manufactured and sold by the defendant as a new automobile in this State after January 1, 1939, and then was and at the time of the accident was equipped with a decoration or radiator ornament on top thereof which extended and protruded to the front of the face of the radiator grill of said motor vehicle in violation of section 683 of the Vehicle Code of this State which provides in part as follows: "On and after January 1, 1939, no person shall sell any new motor vehicle, nor shall any person operate any motor vehicle sold as a new motor vehicle in this State after January 1, 1939, which is equipped with a radiator cap or radiator ornament upon the top thereof which extends or protrudes to the front of the face of the radiator grill of such motor vehicle." (Italics ours.)

[4, 5] It is plaintiff's contention that defendant's violation of the statute constitutes negligence as a matter of law and that but for its violation of the statute plaintiff would not have suffered the loss of his eye. We are of the opinion that the second count does not state a cause of action. A violation of the statute does not create liability on the part of the person violating it except towards persons whom the statute was designed to protect. Unless the person injured is within the class of persons whom the statute was designed to protect and the hazard is one which the statute was designed to protect against, no liability arises out of its violation. Nunneley v. Edgar Hotel, 36 Cal.2d 493, 497, 225 P.2d 497; Boronkay v. Robinson & Carpenter, 247 N.Y. 365, 160 N.E. 400; Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, Vol. 1, § 12; 35 Cal.Jur.2d 504-507 and cases cited thereat.

In the present case it is our opinion that the statute here was designed to decrease the hazard created by the driving of said automobiles upon the highways where its negligent operation might cause it to come in contact with others. It was not designed to protect those who, solely by reason of their own act or omission, might come in contact with it as an inert object lawfully standing unattended upon a highway.

The statute prohibits not only the sale of a car equipped in violation of the statute but its operation upon the highways of this State. Its violation therefore would impose liability only upon a lawful possessor of the car if he were operating it; i. e., if he were in actual physical control of the vehicle upon the highway. Veh.Code, §§ 69, 70; Fairman v. Mors, 55 Cal.App.2d 216, 130 P.2d 448. We do not believe it was the intent of the Legislature to impose liability on the manufacturer under conditions where it would not be imposed upon the possessor of the vehicle.

In our opinion the persons whom the statute was designed to protect are those against whom the vehicle might be brought in contact through its being driven upon a highway and the hazard which the statute was designed to alleviate was the hazard created by the pointed ornament when the car was in movement thus rendering the ornament capable through its own motion of piercing the anatomy of a person with whom the car collided.

[6] The statute is a penal one and may not be construed so as to make unlawful an act not included within its terms. 23 Cal. Jur. 790-791.

[7] The statute prohibits the sale of a motor vehicle equipped with a radiator cap or a radiator ornament on the top thereof, that is, on the top of the car, which extends or protrudes beyond the front or the face of the radiator grill. Plaintiff does not allege that the automobile in question was equipped with a radiator cap which so protruded or with a radiator ornament on top of a radiator cap which so protruded but alleges that the ornament was on top of the vehicle. That this was not unintentional is apparent from the allegations of the first cause of action where it is alleged that the ornament in question was on the front portion of the vehicle over the radiator, not upon the radiator. The facts pleaded did not, therefore, show a violation of the statute.

The order is affirmed.

Civ. 22944.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.
Sept. 12, 1958.

Action for death of decedent whose automobile parked partly on the highway at night was struck by the large truck of defendant. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff in the Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Bernard Lawler, J., the defendants appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Patrosso, J. pro tem, held that the evidence did not justify an instruction on the last clear chance doctrine and that giving such instruction was prejudicial error.

Judgment reversed.

1. Negligence ⚡83.1, 136(32), 141(9)

To justify implication of the last clear chance doctrine, all of the required elements must be present and if any one is lacking, an instruction upon the doctrine is improper and whether there is substantial evidence justifying the application of the doctrine is a question of law.

2. Evidence ⚡8

It is common knowledge that a truck with a minimum length of 50 feet and weight of 32½ tons traveling at a speed of between 40 and 45 miles an hour may not within a matter of a second or two be brought to a stop or swerved to the right or left without grave danger of jackknifing or overturning.

3. Negligence ⚡135(6)

The "last clear chance" doctrine not only presupposes a last chance but a clear chance, and one seeking to invoke the doctrine must adduce evidence direct or circumstantial, that defendant after becoming aware of plaintiff's danger in the exercise of reasonable care had a last clear chance to avoid injuring him.

See publication Words and Phrases, for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Last Clear Chance".

4. Automobiles ⚡244(59)

In action for death of deceased whose automobile at night was stopped partly on the highway when struck by defendant's large truck, testimony that there was sufficient space on the roadway to have permitted defendant to drive around the decedent's vehicle was of no significance in applying the last clear chance doctrine unless defendant had time within which to do so after he first saw the decedent's automobile. West's Ann.Vehicle Code, §§ 582, 621, 705.

5. Automobiles ⚡227(3)

In determining whether defendant truck driver had a last clear chance to avoid collision with the decedent's automobile parked partly on the highway at night, it is not a matter of space alone that is to be considered, but the time within which the defendant had to take effective action in an endeavor to escape the sudden peril created by the presence of the decedent's automobile directly in the path of the truck. West's Ann.Vehicle Code, §§ 582, 621, 705.

6. Automobiles Ⓒ244(59)

In action for death of decedent whose automobile parked partly on the highway at night was struck by defendant's large truck, proof of defendant's negligence did not establish that the doctrine of last clear chance doctrine was applicable since such doctrine presupposes that the defendant is negligent.

7. Negligence Ⓒ83.7

One may not be held liable under the last clear chance doctrine upon the theory that he would have discovered the peril of the decedent in sufficient time to have avoided injuring him but for remissness upon his part.

8. Automobiles Ⓒ246(58)

In action for death of decedent whose automobile was parked partly on the highway at night and was struck by defendant's large trailer truck where there were no living eyewitnesses to the accident except that of the truck driver, evidence did not justify an instruction on the last clear chance doctrine absent evidence that the truck driver saw the decedent's vehicle in time to avoid colliding with it by ordinary care. West's Ann.Vehicle Code, §§ 582, 621, 705.

9. Appeal and Error Ⓒ1066

In action for death of decedent whose automobile parked partly on the highway was struck by the defendant's large truck at night, instruction on the last clear chance doctrine not supported by the evidence was prejudicial where there was evidence warranting finding that decedent was contributorily negligent. PATROSSO, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the minor plaintiff entered upon the verdict of the jury in an action for the wrongful death of plaintiff's father.

On April 3, 1956, at about 3:20 a. m. a collision between two vehicles occurred on U.S. Highway 99 about two miles south of Traver, California. The collision involved an automobile of the decedent and a Peterbilt diesel tractor pulling two trailers (hereinafter referred to as the truck) being operated by the defendant Robert Lee Whisler who will hereinafter be referred to as the defendant. Upon the trial it was stipulated that the truck was owned by the defendant Cooper Transportation Co., Inc.; that the defendant Whisler was driving the truck in the course and scope of his employment by the last named defendant and that the decedent met his death as a result of the collision.

In the vicinity where the collision occurred Highway 99 is a four-lane divided highway with two lanes for northbound traffic and two lanes for southbound traffic. The width of the truck permitted it to travel entirely within one lane and the gross weight of the truck was 65,000 pounds.

There were no eye-witnesses to the accident other than the defendant and the following facts are made to appear by his testimony: Just prior to the collision the defendant was driving north on the right lane of the highway at a speed of between 40 and 45 miles per hour with his headlights on low beam which illuminated the highway in front of him for a distance of 150 feet. The condition of the weather does not appear other than that it was a dark night. Defendant first observed the decedent's automobile when he was within 75 or 100 feet from it. It then appeared to be stopped at an angle partly on and partly off the right lane in which the defendant was traveling, approximately one-half of decedent's automobile being upon the highway and the remaining one-half upon the shoulder. The defendant testified that upon observing decedent's automobile he immediately applied his brakes, and swerved to the left but does not recall when the brakes took effect. At the time there was no other traffic upon the northbound portion of the highway and it was otherwise unobstructed. There was no testimony as to the distance within which the truck could be stopped when traveling at the speed at which it was, after the application of the brakes, and likewise there was no testimony as to the overall length of the truck.

The only ground assigned by the appellants for a reversal of the judgment is that the trial court erred in instructing the jury upon the doctrine of the last clear chance. There is no contention that the instruction was not a correct statement of law but rather that the evidence did not justify the application of the doctrine.

[1] The elements necessary to bring into play the doctrine of the last clear chance are well known. They have recently been restated in Brandelius v. City & County of S. F., 1957, 47 Cal.2d 729, 743, 306 P.2d 432, and need not be repeated here. All of these elements must be present and if any one is lacking an instruction upon the doctrine is improper. Clarida v. Aguirre, 156 Cal.App.2d 112, 115, 319 P.2d 20; Doran v. City & County of San Francisco, 1955, 44 Cal.2d 477, 483, 283 P.2d 1, and whether there is any substantial evidence justifying the application of the doctrine in a given case is a question of law. Nippold v. Romero, 1956, 145 Cal.App.2d 235, 240, 302 P.2d 367; Doran v. City & County of San Francisco, supra, 44 Cal.2d at page 487, 283 P.2d 1.

Conceding that all of the other elements of the doctrine were present in the case at bar, the question is whether the evidence is sufficient to have warranted a finding that the defendant after becoming aware of the presence of decedent's automobile upon the highway "had the last clear chance to avoid the accident by the exercise of ordinary care but failed to exercise such last clear chance, and the accident occurred as a proximate result of such failure." Brandelius v. City & County of S. F., supra [47 Cal.2d 729, 306 P.2d 411].

Viewing the testimony in the light most favorable to the respondent, for the purpose of this discussion we shall assume that the defendant first saw the decedent's automobile when he was within 100 feet of it. At a speed of between 40 and 45 miles per hour, at which defendant was then traveling, his vehicle was moving between 58 and 66 feet per second with the result that he had between approximately one and one-half and one and  $\frac{7}{10}$  seconds to react to the emergency, apply his brakes and swerve to the left in an endeavor to avoid striking the decedent's car.

[2] As previously stated there is no evidence as to the distance within which the defendant could have stopped his truck when traveling at this speed or the time required to change his course of travel from the right lane to the left lane so as to permit every portion of his truck to pass clear of decedent's automobile. While there was no testimony as to the overall length of defendant's truck, it is fairly evident that at a minimum it was 50 feet (see Veh.Code, § 705(b)) and common knowledge tells us that equipment of this size and weight (32½ tons) traveling at a speed of between 40 and 45 miles per hour, may not within a matter of a second or two be brought to a stop or be swerved to the right or left without grave danger of "jackknifing" or overturning.

As was said in Bagwill v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 90 Cal.App. 114, 265 P. 517, quoted with approval in Rodabaugh v. Tekus, 1952, 39 Cal.2d 290, 297, 246 P.2d 663, 667:

"Certainly the doctrine of last clear chance never meant a splitting of seconds when emergencies arise. We are not to tear down the facts of a case and rebuild the same so that, by a trimming down and tight-fitting operation, something can be constructed upon which may be fastened the claim of last clear chance. The words mean exactly as they indicate, namely, last clear chance, not possible chance.’”

[3] Absent evidence that the defendant saw the decedent's vehicle in time to avoid colliding with it by the exercise of ordinary care, there is no basis for the application of the doctrine of the last clear chance. As has frequently been said, the doctrine not only presupposes a last chance but a clear chance. One undertaking to invoke the doctrine must adduce evidence direct or circumstantial that the defendant after becoming aware of plaintiff's position of danger in the exercise of reasonable care had a clear chance to avoid injuring him. In the case at bar there is a total absence of any substantial evidence from which it may be reasonably inferred that defendant saw the decedent's vehicle in time to avoid the accident, much less that he had a clear opportunity of doing so.

The only evidence in the record to which respondent points as supporting her statement that the defendant had a clear chance to avoid the collision is found in the following portion of the cross-examination of the defendant:

“Q. By Mr. Vaughn: Mr. Whisler, given a highway such as Highway 99, in this area approximately two miles south of Traver, where there are, of course, two lanes for northbound traffic, and there is no traffic in the west lane, from the point where you first observed the vehicle with which you collided, that is, 75 to a hundred feet, was there, in your estimation, sufficient space for you to have pulled around that vehicle? A. Yes.

“Q. Now, Mr. Whisler, was there anything on the road itself, that is, Highway 99, in this area that we have been discussing that is approximately two miles south of Traver, was there any object on the road in either of the lanes which prevented you from pulling around the vehicle with which you collided? A. I don't understand the question.

“Q. Was there anything in the roadway that prevented you from pulling your truck out and around the other vehicle? A. No.

“Q. Now, was there anything about the mechanism of the tractor and trailer itself which prevented you from pulling your vehicle out and around the other vehicle? A. No.”

[4] The respondent asserts that the foregoing testimony constitutes an admission by the defendant “that the doctrine of Last Clear Chance was applicable in this case.” We see nothing in the quoted testimony to support this statement. It is merely to the effect that there was sufficient space on the roadway to have permitted the defendant to drive around the decedent's vehicle, and there is no dispute concerning this in view of the uncontradicted testimony that it was a two-lane roadway and there were no other vehicles in the immediate vicinity traveling in the northbound lanes. The fact that defendant had the space within which to pass around the decedent's automobile, however, is of no significance unless the defendant had time within which to do so after he first saw the decedent's automobile. As said in Hall v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 152 Cal.App.2d 80, 85, 312 P.2d 739, 742: “The rule is that there must be ‘substantial evidence to show defendant had a last clear chance to avoid the accident.’ (Citing cases.) To the same effect is also the case of Brandelius v. City & County of San Francisco, 47 Cal.2d 729, 306 P.2d 432, holding that before the last clear chance doctrine may be applied the necessary elements, as there indicated, must be supported by substantial evidence. Time is such an element and an all-important factor. The time for defendant's exercise of any last clear chance commences only at such time as he has both actual knowledge of the injured person's ‘position of danger’ and actual or constructive knowledge that such person 'cannot escape from such situation.' It affirmatively appears to us that in considering the evidence as a whole, there was no substantial evidence that all of these elements had been affirmatively established."

[5] As we have hertofore had occasion to point out, the defendant in the instant case had less than two seconds within which to react, apply his brakes and swerve to the left in an endeavor to avoid colliding with the decedent's automobile. In determining whether he had a clear chance to avoid the collision it is not a matter of space alone that is to be considered but as well the time which defendant had to take effective action in an endeavor to escape the sudden peril created by the presence of the decedent's automobile directly in his path. Cf. Poncino v. Reid-Murdock & Co., 1934, 136 Cal.App. 223, 229, 28 P.2d 932.

In view of defendant's testimony that upon seeing the decedent's vehicle upon the highway he immediately applied his brakes and endeavored to swerve to the left the following language from Jobe v. Harold Livestock Com. Co., 1952, 113 Cal.App.2d 269, 275, 247 P.2d 951, 955, is apposite here:

"In view of the fact that defendant did realize his danger and made a determined effort to stop, it would be wholly illogical and unreasonable for the jury to have found upon the circumstantial evidence that there was a considerable interval of time during which defendant realized the danger and made no effort to avoid the accident. Mere doubt as to the credibility of defendant or the accuracy of his estimate of distance would not amount to affirmative evidence of any material fact. An instruction on the doctrine of last clear chance would have been an invitation to the jury to speculate as to the existence of an essential fact of which there was no direct or circumstantial evidence."

[6-8] In support of the judgment respondent argues that the defendant's own testimony showed that he was guilty of negligence. This may be conceded but proof of defendant's negligence does not serve to establish that the doctrine of the last clear chance is applicable. Rodabaugh v. Tekus, supra, 39 Cal.2d 290, 293, 246 P.2d 663; Doran v. City & County of San Francisco, supra, 44 Cal.2d 477, 487, 283 P.2d 1. The doctrine of the last clear chance presupposes that the defendant was negligent. Nor may one be held liable under the last clear chance rule upon the theory that he would have discovered the peril of the decedent in sufficient time to have avoided injuring him but for remissness upon his part. Dalley v. Williams, 1946, 73 Cal.App.2d 427, 436, 166 P.2d 595.

[9] Finally the respondent contends that the "evidence presented at the trial is equally consistent with a holding that plaintiff's decedent was not contributorily negligent" from which she concludes that the judgment should be affirmed without regard to whether the giving of the instruction upon the doctrine of the last clear chance was proper. However, respondent's having requested this instruction is persuasive of the fact that she must have believed that there was evidence which would have warranted the jury in finding that the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence for the doctrine would not otherwise be applicable. Sparks v. Redinger, 1955, 44 Cal.2d 121, 124, 279 P.2d 971. And that there was such evidence may not be doubted. As previously noted the defendant testified that when he first observed the decedent's automobile it appeared to be stopped partly on and partly off of the highway. If the jury believed this testimony, it might have found that the decedent was guilty of negligence by virtue of Vehicle Code, section 582. There was also evidence from which the jury could have concluded that the decedent was guilty of violating section 621 of the Vehicle Code in that the tail lamps upon his vehicles were not lighted. Moreover, the record discloses that after the jury had retired to deliberate it returned to the court with the request that the instruction upon the doctrine of the last clear chance be reread and less than five minutes later, returned with a verdict for the plaintiff which strongly suggests, if it does not operate to establish, that the jury reached its verdict upon the basis of this doctrine. Under the circumstances the giving of the instruction was clearly prejudicial. As said in Dalley v. Williams, supra, 73 Cal.App.2d 427, 437, 166 P.2d 595, 600: "Plaintiff next argues that the giving of the instruction, if erroneous, was only 'technical in nature,' not prejudicial, and that the sole proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of defendant. With this we cannot agree. The instruction may have governed the jury in arriving at a verdict for the plaintiff, and, in the absence of evidence to support it, may have been prejudicial. The jury, under the evidence, might well have found the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence contributing proximately to his own injury."

The judgment is reversed.

MUSSELL, Justice.

On December 18, 1951, appellant entered a plea of guilty in the Municipal Court in San Diego to the crime of issuing a check without sufficient funds in violation of Penal Code, section 476a. The matter was certified to the Superior Court (Case No. 169855) and appellant was granted probation. Subsequently, this order was vacated and on March 31, 1952, it was ordered that appellant be sentenced to the State's prison for the term prescribed by law, the sentence to run concurrently with relation to the sentence imposed by the said superior court on the same date in action No. 171444.

In San Diego Superior Court No. 171444 appellant was also charged with the crime of issuing a check without sufficient funds, a felony, in violation of section 476a of the Penal Code and on March 6, 1952, he entered a plea of guilty in the Municipal Court to said crime. This matter was also certified to the Superior Court, where, on March 31, 1952, appellant, having admitted a prior conviction as alleged in the amended complaint, was sentenced to the State's prison for the term prescribed by law. It was further ordered that this sentence run concurrently with the sentence imposed in said superior court action No. 169855. No appeal was taken in either of said superior court actions. On January 7, 1958, appellant filed in said actions a "Petition to Modify Judgment" in which he contends that the amendment in 1955 to section 476a of the Penal Code affected his status of imprisonment and rendered the crimes committed by him in 1951 and 1952 mere misdemeanors, since the total of the two checks involved amounted to less than the sum of $50.00. This petition was denied and this appeal is from the order denying it.

[1] Appellant was not entitled to be sentenced as a first offender in superior court action No. 171444 because of his previous conviction. (Pen.Code, sec. 476a, as amended.) Moreover, the amendment to said section has no retroactive application to crimes committed prior thereto and to judgments which have become final. Government Code, section 9608, provides that termination or suspension of any law creating a criminal offense does not constitute a bar to punishment of an act already committed in violation of the law so terminated or suspended unless the intention to bar such punishment is expressly declared by an applicable provision of law. No part of the Penal Code is retroactive unless expressly so declared (Pen.Code, sec. 3), and there is no such declaration indicated in section 476a of said code, as amended.

In Sekt v. Justice's Court, 26 Cal.2d 297, 306, 159 P.2d 17, 22, 167 A.L.R. 833, it is said:

"The second well-settled exception is that repeals by implication are not favored, and where a new statute is passed in a field already occupied by an older statute, the new statute will not be held to have repealed by implication the old statute as to crimes already committed at the time the new statute is passed. As to such crimes the offender will be punished under the old law and the new law will be held to be prospective in operation. This exception is based upon the presumed intent of the Legislature. See many cases collected and commented upon in majority and dissenting opinions in People v. Lowell, 250 Mich. 349, 230 N.W. 202—both opinions approving this rule."

[2-5] The trial court herein was without jurisdiction to vacate or modify the sentences imposed since the sentences had been entered in the minutes of the court and appellant had already begun serving them. People v. Avelino, 81 Cal.App.2d 934, 935, 185 P.2d 361. In People v. McVicker, 37 Cal.App.2d 470, 473, 99 P.2d 1110, it was held that an attack on a judgment by motion to vacate it is in legal effect a proceeding for a writ of error coram nobis, whether it be called by that name or not. Such a writ does not lie to correct error of law and is not intended to authorize any court to review and revise its opinion. People v. Tuthill, 32 Cal.2d 819, 822, 198 P.2d 505. Appellant's contentions herein could have been raised on a timely appeal from the judgment and are not within the scope of a writ of error coram nobis. People v. Cardwell, 153 Cal.App.2d 377, 379, 314 P.2d 484. Moreover, appellant's long delay in filing his petition forecloses him of all right to relief under it. People v. Krout, 90 Cal.App.2d 205, 209, 202 P.2d 635.

Cr. 2857.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Sept. 16, 1958.

Defendant was convicted of willfully secreting, destroying and disposing of truck with intent to defraud insurer and with conspiracy to do so. The Superior Court, Stanislaus County, H. L. Chamberlain, J., granted probation and denied defendant's motion for new trial, and defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Schottky, J., held that testimony of admitted accomplice's wife to effect that defendant in two telephone conversations had asked if accomplice had talked and had stated that accomplice should not involve others, was insufficient corroboration of accomplice's testimony to sustain conviction.

Judgment and order reversed.

1. Criminal Law §1023(12, 13)

Where defendant was found guilty and probation was granted, and defendant's motion for new trial was denied, even though no judgment was entered, order granting probation was an appealable order and appeal was proper both as to order granting probation and an order denying motion for new trial.

2. Criminal Law §511(4)

In prosecution for willfully secreting, destroying and disposing of truck with intent to defraud insurer and conspiracy to do so, testimony of admitted accomplice's wife to effect that defendant in two telephone calls had asked her if accomplice had talked and had stated that accomplice should not involve others was insufficient corroboration of accomplice's testimony to sustain conviction. West's Ann.Pen.Code, §§ 182, 548, 1111.

A. M. Frad, Modesto, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., by G. A. Strader, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SCHOTTKY, Justice.

The above named defendant, Joe Mike Mangipane, was charged with violating section 182 of the Penal Code, in that he conspired with Jerry D'Allesandro and Edgar Kelley to violate section 548 of the Penal Code by wilfully secreting, destroying and disposing of a truck with intent to defraud an insurer. He was also charged with violating section 548 of the Penal Code.

[1] Defendant waived a jury trial, and the cause was tried before the court. The court found the defendant guilty, and probation was granted. Defendant's motion for a new trial was denied. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial. No judgment was entered but since an order granting probation is an appealable order the appeal is proper both as to the order granting probation and the order denying the motion for a new trial.

The only question on this appeal is whether or not the testimony of an admitted accomplice was sufficiently corroborated as required by Penal Code, section 1111, which reads:

"A conviction can not be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof.

"An accomplice is hereby defined as one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial in the cause in which the testimony of the accomplice is given."

The testimony produced at the trial disclosed that Jerry D'Allesandro was the owner of a 1954 Mac rebuilt Sterling Tractor Truck which was insured by Lloyds of London. A Joe Trombetta, an admitted accomplice, who was in the trucking business, testified that he had known appellant who had been doing some sub-hauling for him. In May, 1955, Trombetta and appellant had a conversation at which time appellant told Trombetta where there was a Diesel truck which "could be had." Trombetta indicated that he would be interested, and about a week later appellant and Trombetta had another conversation at which time Trombetta was told that the owner of the truck was D'Allesandro and that it could be arranged to have the truck parked at any place Trombetta desired. On a third occasion the matter was again discussed. At this time it was agreed where the truck would be parked and Trombetta was told that the truck would not cost him anything. Trombetta about this time also had a conversation with Edgar Kelley, a codefendant, who was an employee of his. Trombetta told Kelley that Mangipane had approached him about a truck being available and Kelley said, "let's get it." Later Kelley was told where the truck would be located, and on June 24, 1956, after Trombetta was informed by appellant where the truck could be found in Los Angeles, Kelley and Trombetta drove to Los Angeles where they found D'Allesandro's truck at the agreed location. The name A. L. Clausen Trucking Company was on the decals on the door. The two purchased some paint, returned to the location where Kelley got into the truck and drove it away. Several miles away the truck was stopped and mudflaps attached to the rear. Kelley then drove the vehicle to Oklahoma. Later the truck was dismantled in Oklahoma by Kelley and Trombetta and most of the parts were taken back to California. The identification numbers on the engine block were changed.

D'Allesandro filed a claim for loss with the insurer and subsequently was paid.

The only corroborative evidence to link appellant with the crime, and the evidence relied on by respondent, was testimony given by Mrs. Helen Trombetta, wife of Joe Trombetta. She testified that after her husband was incarcerated in March, 1956, appellant phoned her. The testimony regarding this conversation was as follows:

"Q. What did he tell you at that time? Will you relate the conversation? A. The best I can remember the conversation was about Joe.

"Q. What did he say to you? A. He said—he asked me what was happening, where Joe was and when he was coming home.

"Q. And what did you tell him? A. I don't remember what I told him.

"Q. Did you tell him where your husband was? A. Yes, I told him he was still in jail.

"Q. And then what happened? A. He asked me if Joe had talked and I told him that I didn't know.

"Q. Then what happened? A. Well, he told me that there was no need for anyone else to be involved, that one was enough to take the responsibility of what had happened."

Mrs. Trombetta also testified as follows:

"A. Well, he did add that he would help the family, me and my family financially if Joe were gone and we needed more assistance."

Mrs. Trombetta had a later telephone conversation with the appellant and also talked with him in person. These conversations were related by the witness as follows:

"Witness: Well, the best I can remember, the last conversation I had on the telephone with him was that if I would meet him somewhere, he wanted to talk with me.

"Mr. Lacoste: Q. Did he tell you why he wanted to meet you somewhere? A. He didn't want to come to the house.

"Q. Did he tell you why? A. No, he didn't.

"Q. So then what happened? A. So I met him at the Modesto High School and I talked to him there.

"Q. Will you relate what was said at that time? A. He said he wanted to know what was taking place and what was said and what I knew.

"Q. What did you tell him? A. Whatever I knew that had taken place.

"Q. Do you recall what you told him? A. That Joe was still not at home and as far as I knew that nothing had happened, that they were not going to let him come home on bail and I didn't know what was going to happen and again he told me that there was no need for a lot of people to get involved, that one could take the responsibility and it would save dragging others into it.

* * * * *

"A. He had told me that there was no need to drag anyone else into it and that if one was to take the blame, that there was no need to drag anyone else into it."

Appellant contends most earnestly that there is insufficient corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice Joe Trombetta and that therefore the judgment must be reversed. Respondent contends that the testimony of Mrs. Trombetta, hereinbefore set forth, is sufficient to corroborate the testimony of the accomplice.

There have been numerous decisions dealing with the question of the sufficiency of evidence to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice. However, recent decisions of our Supreme Court have stated the principles which we must follow.

In People v. MacEwing, 45 Cal.2d 218, at page 225, 288 P.2d 257, at page 261, the court said:

"The decisions applying section 1111, relating to accomplices, hold that the corroborative evidence required by that provision must be considered without the aid of the testimony which is to be corroborated and that it is not sufficient if it requires the interpretation and direction of such testimony in order to give it value. [Citing cases.] There are two opinions which, although not clear, indicate that a similar rule applies with respect to section 1108. See People v. Crain, 102 Cal.App.2d 566, 579, 228 P.2d 307; People v. Murphy, 60 Cal.App.2d 762, 772, 141 P.2d 755. In our opinion both statutes must be construed to mean that corroboration is not adequate if it requires aid from the testimony of the person to be corroborated in order to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense charged. The instruction was therefore erroneous."

In People v. Brown, 49 Cal.2d 577, at page 584, 320 P.2d 5, at page 9, it is stated:

"The People rely also upon the testimony of Dr. Randall, who treated Clara on January 30, 1956, as corroboration. The doctor's testimony does not meet the test of connecting defendant with the abortion which Clara underwent. People v. Ramsey (1948), 83 Cal.App.2d 707, 713, 717 [4], 189 P.2d 802, is inconsistent with People v. MacEwing (1955), supra, 45 Cal.2d 218, 225 [7], 288 P.2d 257, insofar as it suggests that testimony which does not itself connect the defendant with the criminal abortion is sufficient corroboration; in this respect the Ramsey case does not represent the law and, to avoid possible confusion, is to that extent disapproved."

In People v. Lyons, 50 Cal.2d 245, 324 P.2d 556, 562, the court said:

"The evidence need not corroborate the accomplice as to every fact to which he testifies but is sufficient if it does not require interpretation and direction from the testimony of the accomplice yet tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense in such a way as reasonably may satisfy a jury that the accomplice is telling the truth; it must tend to implicate the defendant and therefore must relate to some act or fact which is an element of the crime but it is not necessary that the corroborative evidence be sufficient in itself to establish every element of the offense charged. [Citing cases.]"

In People v. Santo, 43 Cal.2d 319, at page 327, 273 P.2d 249, at page 253, the court said:

"The accomplice need not be corroborated as to every fact to which he testifies. The evidence which corroborates the accomplice need not be direct; it may be circumstantial. Although the corroborating evidence must do more than raise a conjecture or suspicion of guilt, it is sufficient if it tends in some degree to implicate the defendant. (People v. Henderson (1949), 34 Cal.2d 340, 342-343, 209 P.2d 785; People v. Barclay (1953), supra, 40 Cal.2d 146, 156, 252 P.2d 321; People v. Wayne (1953), 41 Cal.2d 814, 822, 264 P.2d 547.) To be sufficient the implicating evidence 'must relate to some act or fact which is an element of the offense.' (People v. Gallardo (1953), 41 Cal.2d 57, 63, 257 P.2d 29.)"

Applying the foregoing principles to the instant case we are of the opinion that the testimony of Mrs. Trombetta, relied on by respondent, is insufficient corroboration of the accomplice, Joe Trombetta. Section 1111 of the Penal Code states that "a conviction can not be had unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense," and our Supreme Court has stated in People v. MacEwing, supra, that "corroboration is not adequate if it requires aid from the testimony of the person to be corroborated in order to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense charged."

There is nothing in Mrs. Trombetta's testimony which, when considered without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, can be held to connect appellant with the offenses with which he was charged.

Mrs. Trombetta states twice in her testimony that the conversations with the appellant were about Joe, her husband. One may speculate as to why appellant asked Mrs. Trombetta if her husband had talked and that he should not involve others, but such statements do not show even the slightest connection with the taking of a truck some 300 miles distant some nine months before. Mr. Trombetta testified to a many-year acquaintance with appellant which at times involved daily meetings of each other. There is nothing in the record to indicate but that appellant and Trombetta were friends. Thus, the advice and help which appellant offered to Mrs. Trombetta were entirely consistent with their long-time family acquaintance and the obvious distressing situation in which Mrs. Trombetta and family were placed by the jailing of her husband.

Respondent does not point out how the testimony of Mrs. Trombetta meets the test set forth in People v. MacEwing, supra, and the other cases hereinbefore cited, but respondent seems to rely strongly on People v. Andrew, 43 Cal.App.2d 126, 110 P.2d 459. Respondent states that in that case the evidence was sufficient to corroborate the testimony of the accomplice where such corroborating evidence consisted of testimony to the effect that the defendant attempted to visit the accomplice after the latter had been arrested and was in jail, but upon being refused permission to see the accomplice wrote to him three different times as follows:

"(1) 'Roy Jones * * * Can't see you. They won't let me. Please don't testify against me.' (2) 'Ask if you can receive any books or magazines. Anything you wish will be sent. * * * Regardless of what the law does or tries to do it cannot break down those sincere friendships of which there are so few. One who does not stick by his friend in time of trouble is not worthy of the name. Just remember that. * * * When and if you are released and you wish to make a trip and are allowed to, a ticket will be provided by the company, to any point in the U. S. you wish to go. So don't worry about your condition when you get out. * * * A new and different venture will be invested in soon and part or all of the profits will be yours, so that you will be self maintaining when you are free.' (3) 'It won't be so very long now and probably you will be out. It would be nice to take a vacation somewhere when you do, mountains or something, and you can if you want to.'"

Respondent also quotes the following from page 129 of 43 Cal.App.2d, from page 461 of 110 P.2d of People v. Andrew:

"* * * The rule as to what extent corroboration is necessary to connect or tend to connect a defendant with the commission of a crime appears in the case of People v. Negra, 208 Cal. 64, 69, 280 P. 354, 356, where the court states: 'The evidence tending to connect a defendant with the commission of the crime may be slight and, when standing by itself, entitled to but little consideration. * * * The law does not require that the evidence necessary to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice shall tend to establish the precise facts testified to by the accomplice; and strong corroborative testimony is not necessary to support a judgment of conviction founded on the testimony of an accomplice. Even though circumstantial and slight, the evidence is, nevertheless, sufficient if it tends to connect the accused with the commission of the offense.'"

We are unable to agree with respondent's statement that "on the authority of the Andrew case it should be held that the testimony of the accomplice Joe Trombetta is sufficiently corroborated." For in the Andrew case the corroborating evidence was far stronger than the testimony of Mrs. Trombetta in the instant case. Appellant Andrew was charged with having committed an act of sexual degeneracy with Roy Jones. Andrew wrote Jones, who was in jail, stating among other things, "Please don't testify against me," and made a number of promises as to benefits he would confer upon Jones. The words "Please don't testify against me" point at no one but the writer of the letter. There is no doubt as to who is meant by "me." The words "testify against" clearly imply that there was something which the accomplice could testify to, which would be against the writer and connect the writer to both the accomplice and the testimony he might give against the writer.

As hereinbefore pointed out, the statements of appellant in his conversation with Mrs. Trombetta were far different. Furthermore, in the Andrew case there was additional corroborating evidence as the opinion states that "Appellant while testifying in his own behalf made inconsistent statements and many replies to questions propounded to him that are not consistent with his innocence."

We believe that the decision in People v. Andrew, supra, is distinguishable from the instant case and neither justifies nor requires us to hold that the testimony of the accomplice Trombetta was sufficiently corroborated. We believe further that if People v. Andrew is susceptible of the construction placed upon it by respondent it is out of harmony with the later cases of our Supreme Court hereinbefore cited. It is to be noted that no hearing in the Supreme Court was sought in People v. Andrew and that the decision has not been referred to or cited in the later cases.

[2] For the reasons hereinbefore set forth we conclude that the testimony of Mrs. Trombetta was insufficient to corroborate the testimony of the accomplice, Joe Trombetta, and that inasmuch as it is conceded that there was no other corroborating testimony, the judgment must be reversed.

The judgment and the order are reversed.

The PEOPLE of the State of California,
Plaintiff and Respondent,

v.

Donna Mae PHILLIPS, Defendant and Appellant.
Cr. 1368.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Sept. 15, 1958.

Defendant was convicted in the Superior Court of San Diego County, Gerald C. Thomas, J., for violating Penal Code subdivisions, and she appealed. The District Court of Appeal, McCabe, J. pro tem., held that, not having pursued her remedy under Penal Code sections, defendant was precluded from controverting facts stated in affidavit upon which search warrant had been based.

Affirmed.

1. Searches and Seizures ⚡3(10)

If, prior to trial, defendant had desired to challenge the validity of search warrant and resulting effect of it she could have (1) made motion to quash it, (2) petitioned for writ of mandamus for return of property, (3) made motion to suppress or exclude evidence, or (4) sought writ of prohibition.

2. Searches and Seizures ⚡3(10)

Not having pursued her remedy under Penal Code sections, defendant was precluded from controverting facts stated in affidavit upon which search warrant had been based. West's Ann.Pen.Code, §§ 1539, 1540.

3. Criminal Law ⚡1141(2)

Burden is upon appellant to present record reflecting error affirmatively.

4. Searches and Seizures ⚡3(10)

Burden of establishing invalidity of search warrant was upon defendant.

5. Searches and Seizures ⚡3(10)

Search warrant is presumed valid.

6. Arrest ⚡63(3)

Gaming ⚡60

Officers searching premises for which they had valid search warrant and finding defendant occupying room with betting paraphernalia and engaged in bookmaking had right to arrest defendant and to seize paraphernalia. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 337a, subs. 1, 2.

7. Witnesses ⚡216

Where defendant had been arrested, by officers searching premises for which they had search warrant, when they found defendant committing a crime, it was not error, in ensuing prosecution, to refuse to require officers to reveal name of their informant.

8. Criminal Law ⚡395

It was proper to refuse to exclude evidence seized under search warrant, notwithstanding fact that inventory had not been taken in defendant's presence and that no copy of it had been given to her. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 1535.

9. Criminal Law ⚡395

Information that telephone was subscribed to by "Jack L. Thompson at 717 El Cajon Boulevard" and that certain utilities were listed under his name at that address was information on which, in part, affidavit for search of the "premises of Jack L.

Thompson at 717 El Cajon Boulevard" could be made, and mere fact that defendant, rather than Thompson, was found occupying premises would not require exclusion of evidence seized pursuant to warrant. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 337a, subs. 1, 2.

Thomas Whelan, San Diego, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., Norman B. Peek, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

McCABE, Justice pro tem.

From judgments of conviction entered after verdicts of a jury for violation of section 337a, subs. 1 and 2, Penal Code, and from the order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

A police officer had received information concerning bookmaking operations at 717 El Cajon Boulevard, City of El Cajon. An affidavit of a police officer was sworn to before a magistrate of the municipal court and a search warrant was issued on August 3, 1957, which read in part:

"You are commanded, in the daytime or nighttime to make immediate search on the premises of Jack L. Thompson, 717 El Cajon Boulevard, El Cajon, California, for the following property, to wit: books, papers or paraphernalia," and a police officer testified that the warrant also provided "for the purpose of recording and registering bets on horse races." On August 4, at about 2:00 p. m. police officers, with the search warrant, went to the house at the El Cajon address. Just prior to going to this address, the officers had a part-time matron place a telephone call to the house, a woman's voice answered "Roger", the matron said "Hi Mabel", the woman's voice replied "This isn't Mabel; there is no Mabel here". Later the matron identified defendant's voice as being the same the matron had heard over the telephone.

Upon arriving at 717 El Cajon Boulevard two officers went to the front door and two officers proceeded to the rear of the house. Although the officers at the locked front door demanded admission, no one admitted them. The officers in the rear of the house entered by a window and the other officers were admitted by their brother officers through the front door. Officers entered a room described as a "bed room" but which in fact was not furnished as such. No other room in the house was furnished for living quarters and no clothing was found. In this "bed room" defendant was seated at a table on which rested two telephone instruments. On this table and about the room the officers observed pads of paper, racing forms, radio and other paraphernalia which was testified to, and the defendant does not deny, is commonly used in bookmaking. Defendant was placed under arrest. While in the "bed room" two police matrons received numerous telephone calls. In answering telephone calls the matrons used the introductory word "Roger". These calls concerned themselves with the placing of bets, the "scratching" of bets, the request for information regarding races, or horses or race tracks. In at least one or two incidences inquiry was made for "Donna", defendant's given first name.

From the time of her arrest, defendant refused to give any statement, however at different times and in different locations the following occurred: The arresting officer said "Then you are making the book?", to which defendant replied "That's about it". Upon being asked how she had gotten into this she replied she was well paid; she was asked "if there were any prearranged agreements in case she was arrested and she said no"; when questioned if she knew what she was getting into when she started she replied she did but didn't realize it was that big; she was told that "her country boy" had called and defendant laughed ("country boy" referred to above was the name given by the calling party in a telephone conversation received by one of the police matrons); defendant questioned the part-time police matron as to whether it was she who called prior to the arrest and the police matron replied in the affirmative.

One of the telephones was subscribed to by one Rogers and the other by one Thompson. The utilities for the house were under the name Thompson. This was known to the police officer prior to swearing to the affidavit. Who rented the house from the owner is not clear from the record. No police officer who testified at the trial knew or had ever seen Thompson or Rogers, and had not known defendant prior to the entry. In the mail box the officers found an envelope addressed to Rogers.

It appears from the testimony that an inventory of the premises was taken while the officers were at the house but not in the presence of defendant. Defendant never received a copy of the inventory. The warrant and inventory were filed on August 9, 1957, in the municipal court.

On the day of trial in the trial judge's chambers defendant revealed to the judge and prosecution the objections she had to the admission into evidence of the property taken. During the trial, the affidavit, search warrant and property taken were admitted to evidence, and the objections to the admissibility of the evidence as revealed in the judge's chambers were noted in the record. Essentially these objections are now translated into the contentions on this appeal.

On this appeal defendant contends (1) the search was illegal because the search warrant was issued improperly and not made upon any factual information in the hands of the officers; (2) the search and seizure was not made under the authority of the search warrant and was therefore illegal; (3) the trial court erred in refusing to require the officer to reveal the name of his informant; (4) evidence taken under the search warrant is inadmissible because the statutory requirements regarding the return of the inventory was improperly made; (5) under the search warrant the evidence was improperly admitted because the warrant authorized search of the "premises of Jack L. Thompson at 717 El Cajon Boulevard" and did not authorize the search of any premises at 717 El Cajon Boulevard; (6) the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and the verdict is against the evidence.

[1,2] California cases indicate that, if prior to trial, defendant had desired to challenge the validity of the search warrant and the resulting effect of it she could have (a) made a motion to quash it (People v. Berger, 44 Cal.2d 459, 461, 282 P.2d 509); (b) petitioned for a writ of mandamus for the return of the property (People v. Berger, supra); (c) made a motion to suppress or exclude the evidence (People v. Alaniz [dissenting opinion], 149 Cal.App.2d 560, 571, 309 P.2d 71, citing United States v. Kind, 2 Cir., 87 F.2d 315, 316); (d) sought a writ of prohibition (Willson v. Superior Court, 46 Cal.2d 291, 294 P.2d 36). Also, defendant had certain rights under sections 1539 and 1540, Penal Code, which apparently she did not exercise. Not having pursued her remedy under these code sections she should be precluded from controverting the facts stated on the affidavit. Arata v. Superior Court, 153 Cal.App.2d 767, 315 P.2d 473; see also State v. Best, 150 A. 44, 8 N.J.Misc. 271; United States v. McKay, D.C., 2 F.2d 257, 259, 260. She did not make use of any of these processes prior to trial.

The above quoted portion of the search warrant was read into evidence but the exact verbiage of the affidavit and search warrant is unknown to us since the exhibits are not before us.

[3,4] On an appeal it is the general rule that matters not shown by the record will not be considered on appeal. 3 Cal.Jur.2d, Appeal and Error, Section 261 and cases therein cited. When there are affidavits which are made the basis of a complaint on appeal they must be part of the record. 3 Cal.Jur.2d, Appeal and Error, Section 262 and cases cited. Therefore, this court will not presume there was error on the part of the magistrate who issued the warrant. The burden is upon the appellant to present a record reflecting the error affirmatively. Romine v. Cralle, 80 Cal. 626, 628, 22 P. 296; Boyer v. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co., 1 Cal.App. 54, 55, 81 P. 671. The burden of establishing the invalidity of the search warrant is upon defendant. People v. Acosta, 142 Cal.App.2d 59, 62, 298 P.2d 29; United States v. Goodwin, D.C., 1 F.2d 36.

If defendant is now making a request to have us attempt to piece together bits of disconnected testimony to establish the contents of the affidavit, she has landed on an unfertile plateau. We will not subscribe to the request, particularly since defendant had methods open to her to make the documents part of the record on appeal.

In part, defendant's argument is that the warrant must be issued only upon "factual information". This point has been determined in People v. Acosta, 142 Cal. App.2d 59, 298 P.2d 29, and Arata v. Superior Court, supra.

In sole support of her contention (2) defendant cites without argument People v. Cahan, 44 Cal.2d 434, 282 P.2d 905, 50 A.L.R.2d 513; A perusal of the Cahan case does not reveal that a search warrant was issued. We cannot discern any possible argument whereby the Cahan opinion is applicable to defendant's contention (2).

[5,6] Defendant's point (3) is based upon a misconception. As heretofore stated, a warrant is presumed to be valid unless the defendant successfully attacks it, which she has not done. Therefore, the police officers in entering the house at 717 El Cajon Boulevard did so armed with a valid search warrant. They were properly in the house to search the premises described in the warrant for the property described in the warrant. In searching the premises they entered a room where bookmaking was taking place and which had in it property similar to that described in the warrant. They had a right to seize this property and to take it with them. The evidence in the record is substantial and justifies a finding that defendant was occupying a room with betting paraphernalia therein and was engaged in bookmaking. The defendant was seated at a table on and around which much of the property used in bookmaking was situated. The officers had a right to believe that crimes under section 337a, subds. 1 and 2, were being committed in their presence. This being true, the officers had a right to arrest defendant, which they did.

During the trial and upon cross-examination of the police officer, defendant asked the following question: "Now, you said you got that information from some reliable source. Would you tell us who the reliable source was?" Prosecution's objection to this question was sustained by the trial court. Defendant can gain no comfort from the fact that in many cases, both in California and in other jurisdictions, an arrest being made upon information supplied by a tipster without other showing, it is decided that the officers did not have reasonable grounds for the arrest. In those cases the crime not being committed in the presence of the officers the question is as to whether the officers had reasonable and probable cause to make the arrest under a felony charge. Defendant has confused the "reasonable cause" to justify an arrest based upon information obtained from others and the "probable cause" for the issuance of a search warrant. In Willson v. Superior Court, 46 Cal.2d 291, 294, 294 P.2d 36, 38, cited by defendant to support her contention, it is said:

"Although information provided by an anonymous informer is relevant on the issue of reasonable cause, in the absence of some pressing emergency, see People v. Kilvington, 104 Cal. 86, 92-93, 37 P. 799 [43 Am.St.Rep. 73], an arrest may not be based solely on such information. United States v. Kind, 2 Cir., 87 F.2d 315, 316; United States v. Blich, D.C., 45 F.2d 627, 629; United States v. Keown, D.C., 19 F. Supp. 639, 646; State v. Arregui, 44 Idaho 43, 254 P. 788, 793-794, 52 A.L.R. 463; Hill v. State, 151 Miss. 518, 118 So. 539, 539-540; Smith v. State, 169 Tenn. 633, 90 S.W.2d 523, 524, and evidence must be presented to the court that would justify the conclusion that reliance on the information was reasonable. See, People v. Boyles, supra, 45 Cal.2d 652, [656] 290 P.2d 535. In some cases the identity of, or past experience with, the informer may provide such evidence, see, Aitken v. White, 93 Cal.App.2d 134, 145, 208 P.2d 788, and in others it may be supplied by similar information from other sources or by the personal observations of the police."

[7] The Willson case, supra, did not concern itself with the "probable cause" for the issuance of a search warrant. In the instant case, the court's ruling not requiring the officer to reveal the name of the informant was correct because a crime was being committed in the presence of the officers who were legally on the premises. In making this arrest they were not relying upon any information supplied by an informant.

[8] By contention (4) defendant seeks to exclude certain evidence obtained by use of the search warrant. We have decided the search warrant was a valid instrument capable of being used by the officers for the purposes described in it. Defendant contends because the inventory was not taken in her presence and no copy of it was given to her, the warrant is vitiated. No California cases are cited by the defendant to support the position, and we have found none. However, cases from without this jurisdiction have held under a statute very similar to section 1535, Penal Code, that the required act by the officer was a ministerial one and created a defect, but did not void the effectiveness of the warrant or contaminate the evidentiary value of the property seized under the warrant. See 79 C.J.S. Searches and Seizures § 84, p. 906; Giles v. United States, 1 Cir., 284 F. 208, 211, 215; United States v. Kaplan, D.C., 286 F. 963; United States v. Callahan, D.C., 17 F.2d 937. We think this is the correct view.

[9] We can see no validity to defendant's contention (5). The officers had information regarding the activity of one Jack L. Thompson at 717 El Cajon Boulevard, they knew a telephone was subscribed to by Jack L. Thompson, 717 El Cajon Boulevard, and certain utilities were listed under his name at that address. This was information on which, in part, an affidavit could be made. A warrant could be issued properly in the form set forth, in part, above.

Defendant's contention (6) is intertwined with other contentions. This contention has been fully answered above.

Defendant's last point is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and judgment. We have outlined the evidence against defendant. The jury, from the evidence, admissions against interest and the inferences reasonably to be drawn from the evidence, could and did find her guilty of the crimes charge. There is substantial legal evidence to support the verdicts and the judgments. They will not be disturbed on this appeal.

Judgments and order affirmed.

Action by Department of Mental Hygiene to enforce payment of its claim for support and maintenance of mentally ill patient in state hospital against estate of patient's mother. From adverse judgment of the Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Burnett Wolfson, J., the executor of mother's estate appealed. The Supreme Court, Shenk, J., held that statute providing that husband, wife, father, mother, or children of a mentally ill person and the administrators of such relative's estates shall be liable for the care, support and maintenance of such mentally ill person in a state institution does not create an improper classification as to relatives and persons receiving assistance in a mental institution.

SHENK, Justice.

A rehearing was ordered to consider the contention of the defendant, first elaborated upon in the petition for rehearing, that the provisions of the Welfare and Institutions Code, sections 6650 et seq., held by the court in the former opinion to impose an absolute liability on a mother to pay for the care, support and maintenance of her mentally ill daughter in a state institution, is a deprivation of property without equal protection of law and without just compensation in violation of the state and federal Constitutions.

In 1935 Joan McGilvery, daughter of the decedent, was adjudged mentally ill and from that time has been confined in state hospitals and maintained and provided for by state agencies whose interests the Department of Mental Hygiene now represents. When first confined Joan was the wife of Neil McGilvery. Their son Laurence, was three years of age. In 1936 the husband disappeared and his whereabouts remain unknown. Joan's mother took Laurence into her home and provided for his support and education. In 1955 she died. Her will was admitted to probate and Laurence, then an adult, was named as executor. Other than a $1,000 trust fund for the benefit of Joan, the estate was left to Laurence.

It appears that at the time of Joan's commitment, Mrs. Girard was a single woman, 63 years of age. She owned a home in Oakland from which she had an annual income of approximately $200. She supplemented that income with her earnings as a nurse, found to be about $20 a month. The only evidence of her earnings between the time of Joan's commitment and Mrs. Girard's death relates to the last four years of her life. During those years she had an income of approximately $100 a month, $50 a month from an investment fund derived, apparently, from the sale of her home, and $50 a month from federal old age benefits. At her death her estate was appraised at $14,504.69. It increased to $18,984.69 during administration.

The plaintiff Department of Mental Hygiene presented to the executor its claim against the estate for $4,737 for Joan's support and maintenance for the four year period immediately preceding Mrs. Girard's death. The executor rejected the claim and this action was commenced by the department to enforce payment. Judgment in the amount sought was for the plaintiff and the executor appealed. There is no dispute as to the amount of the claim. The only question is the liability of the estate for its payment.

The department's claim is based upon legislation found in the Welfare and Institutions Code which provides for the care and maintenance of mentally ill persons. Section 6650 provides in its pertinent parts: "The husband, wife, father, mother, or children of a mentally ill person * * * shall cause him to be properly and suitably cared for and maintained * * *. The husband, wife, father, mother, or children of a mentally ill person * * * and the administrators of their estates * * * shall be liable for his care, support, and maintenance in a state institution of which he is an inmate. * * *". Section 6651 provides in part: "The monthly rate for the care, support, and maintenance of all mentally ill * * * persons * * * at the state hospitals for the mentally ill where there is liability to pay for such care, support, and maintenance, shall be reviewed once each fiscal year and fixed at the state-wide average per capita cost of maintaining patients in all state hospitals for the preceding fiscal year, as determined by the Director of Mental Hygiene, and shall be payable in advance. * * *. The Director of Mental Hygiene may reduce, cancel or remit the amount to be paid by the estate or the relatives, as the case may be, liable for the care; support, and maintenance of any mentally ill * * * person * * * who is a patient of a state hospital for the mentally ill, on satisfactory proof that the estate or relatives, as the case may be, are unable to pay the cost of such care, support, and maintenance. * * *". In section 6652 the Department of Mental Hygiene is given the authority to take such action as may be necessary to effect the collection of the charges mentioned in section 6650.

In section 6653 it is provided that "The department shall, following the admission of a patient into a State hospital for the insane * * * make an investigation to determine whether the patient has any relative or relatives responsible under the provisions of Section 6650 for the payment of the costs of * * * maintenance, and shall ascertain the financial condition of such relative or relatives to determine whether in each case such relative or relatives are in fact financially able to pay such charges. * *"

Following Joan's commitment an investigation was conducted regarding Mrs. Girard's financial circumstances. No charge or other exaction was attempted to be collected from her under section 6650 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, either at that time or during her lifetime.

[1] It is claimed by the defendant that section 6650 does not impose on the persons named therein an absolute and unconditional liability for the support and maintenance of a mentally ill relative, but that liability is imposed only if the investigation mentioned in section 6653 reveals that those persons "are in fact financially able to pay such charges." It is obvious that the language of section 6650 cannot be considered alone, but that it must be considered with other sections in pari materia. County of Los Angeles v. Frisbie, 19 Cal.2d 634, 639, 122 P.2d 526. Section 6650 was enacted in 1937. It was based on the former Political Code, section 2176. That section contained the provisions, now set forth in all material respects in sections 6652 and 6653, as well as 6650, including the provision that the department shall make an investigation to determine the financial ability of named relatives to pay the charges for the support and maintenance of the mentally ill. Under the circumstances sections 6650 and 6653 "shall be construed as restatements and continuations * * * and not as new enactments" (Welf. & Inst.Code, § 2), and are to be considered together. Accordingly we must look to the construction given section 2176 of the Political Code prior to 1937.

Section 2176 when first enacted in 1903 (Stats.1903, p. 505) clearly made ability to pay a condition of liability. It provided that " * * * the husband, wife, father, mother, or children of an insane person, if of sufficient ability * * * shall be liable for the care, support and maintenance of any insane person in a state hospital * *." In 1909 that section was modified and the words "if of sufficient ability" were deleted. Stats.1909, p. 71. In 1921 the section was again modified by the addition of a second paragraph requiring an investigation into the financial circumstances of the responsible parties to determine whether they were "in fact financially able to pay such charges" provided for in the first paragraph. Stats. 1921, p. 1335. In 1931 a further amendment did not alter the provisions of the same section in any respect material to the present inquiry. Stats.1931, p. 322. It was in 1937 that the section was divided. The first paragraph, providing for charges as against responsible relatives, became section 6650 of the Welfare and Institutions Code. The second paragraph, providing for an investigation into the financial circumstances of responsible relatives, became section 6653 of the same code.

It is significant that the Legislature had first expressly specified the relatives who were responsible as those "of sufficient ability" to pay and thereafter deleted that requirement. The defendant contends that regardless of the deletion, the Lunacy Commission, then performing the functions of the Department of Mental Hygiene, continued to use ability to pay as a criterion in making charges after 1909. It appears in several of the Commission's biennial reports to the Legislature that ability to pay was considered as a factor in determining whether the Commission enforced its monthly charges. (See Reports of the State Commission in Lunacy, Attorneys' Reports: Vol. 4, Appendix to Journals of Senate and Assembly of California, 41st Session (1915), p. 24; Vol. 6, Appendix to Journals of Senate and Assembly of California, 42nd Session (1917), p. 32; Vol. 1, Appendix to Journals of Senate and Assembly of California, 44th Session (1921), p. 19.) But there is nothing to indicate in either the statutes or in the administrative practices that ability to pay was a factor in determining liability for the charges after 1909. Likewise in 1921, when the provision for the investigation of the financial circumstances of responsible relatives was added there was no indication that the purpose of the added provision was to determine liability of relatives already made unequivocally liable. The language of the first paragraph of section 2176 and the change of the law in 1909 too clearly provided for the imposition of an initial liability to permit any other construction. The investigation provided for in the 1921 legislation must be deemed to serve some purpose and that purpose is apparent from companion sections first enacted in 1903. Section 2180 of the Political Code then enacted provided for the amount of monthly support to be paid by relatives of the mentally ill, and further provided that "the medical superintendent of a state hospital for the insane shall, on the order of the commission, reduce or remit the amount to be paid by the estate or the relatives, as the case may be, liable for the care, support, maintenance and clothing of any insane person committed thereto and confined therein, on satisfactory proof that said estate or said relatives, as the case may be, are unable to pay the said sum * * *." Stats.1903, p. 506. The foregoing has been carried through and appears today in its material aspects in section 6651 of the Welfare and Institutions Code above set out. The legislation of 1921, in providing for an investigation of financial circumstances of responsible relatives, was intended to furnish state agencies with knowledge sufficient to enable them to reduce or remit the amounts for which the relatives were liable if the circumstances justified it.

[2, 3] It therefore appears that while an unconditional liability is imposed, the amounts due thereunder may be reduced, remitted, or cancelled by administrative action. Mere inability to pay cannot of itself constitute a reduction, remission or cancellation of the obligation. As stated, proper consideration of the statutory provisions clearly indicates that the Legislature intended liability to attach regardless of ability to pay. It is true that the Director of Mental Hygiene (or his predecessor, the Director of Institutions) might have cancelled or remitted the amounts due, following an investigation and determination of inability to pay on the part of the deceased, in accordance with section 6651 of the Welfare and Institutions Code. But there is no evidence that such action was taken following the initial investigation. On the other hand it does appear that during the four years for which recovery is sought the Department of Mental Hygiene, through its director, made determinations as to the monthly rate for the care, treatment, support and maintenance of mentally ill patients and that the claim of the department filed in the present case was in accord with those rates. Mere failure to enforce the obligation cannot be deemed to constitute such administrative action as would result in modifying, remitting or cancelling the obligation, constructively or otherwise. The only effect of such failure, insofar as the obligation to pay is concerned, is to make unenforceable those portions of the obligation which, in accordance with the applicable statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 345), were outstanding for more than four years.

The plaintiff relies on a decision of the Appellate Department of the Superior Court. Department of Mental Hygiene v. Shane, 142 Cal.App.2d Supp. 881, 299 P.2d 747. In that case a father did not have the ability to pay for the support of his son, an inmate in a state hospital. Nevertheless his estate was held liable in an action against the executor, although no attempt had been made to collect the amounts due from the father during his lifetime. The present case cannot be distinguished from that case. Decisional law in other states is based on legislative enactments not the same as those here involved and for that reason are not controlling.

[4] It is contended by the defendant that our statutory provisions provide "only for prospective collection, in advance, by order duly made and modifiable." The argument assumes that an order must be made before the obligation is collectible. But the obligation to pay was unconditionally created by statute upon Joan's commitment, and no administrative order was required to perfect it. It continued in the absence of effective administrative action to modify, remit or cancel it. Thus it cannot be said that after Mrs. Girard's death the state purported for the first time to create an obligation to pay for Joan's maintenance. Nor can it properly be contended that the amounts due from an estate for past obligations within the period of limitations are uncollectible from the later acquired assets of the estate. In Re Estate of Phipps, 112 Cal.App.2d 732, 247 P.2d 409, 412, 33 A.L.R.2d 1251, the Department of Mental Hygiene brought an action under section 6655 of the Welfare and Institutions Code against the estate of an incompetent for care and maintenance furnished prior to his acquisition of the estate. It was contended that there was a legislative intent to limit liability to those obligations which arose after the acquisition of assets by the estate. The court held that "Section 6658, which provides that the department may bring an action to enforce payment for a patient's care against any person, guardian or relative, does not limit such action to a situation in which the judgment is collectible." While the provisions of the law applicable to the present case are not quite the same as those there involved they are found in the same article of the Welfare and Institutions Code and require a consistent construction.

[5] Likewise there is no merit in the contention that the department has waived its right by failing to make a prior demand for payment, or that it is now estopped from demanding payment. In Re Estate of Fassetta, 14 Cal.App.2d 239, 57 P.2d 1336, 1337, it was claimed that "the director [of the Department of Institutions] is estopped to present said demand on account of leading the guardian to understand that no demand of the kind would be made, but that the same was waived." There, as here, the defendant relied upon the state's silence over the years; but there was no proof that the state gained any advantage by its conduct, or that the defendant changed his position or suffered any disadvantage in reliance upon the claimed waiver, and the court affirmed a judgment for the Department of Institutions. Nor, is the action barred by laches. "[T]here can be no laches in delaying the bringing of an action if it is brought within the period of limitation * * * unless there are some facts or circumstances attending the delay which have operated to the injury of the defendant." Meigs v. Pinkham, 159 Cal. 104, 112 P. 883, 886; see, also, Burns v. Ross, 190 Cal. 269, 278, 212 P. 17; Handyspot Co. of Northern California v. Buegeleisen, 128 Cal.App.2d 191, 195-196, 274 P.2d 938; 18 Cal.Jur.2d 208. In the present case there is no substantial evidence of injury to the defendant occasioned by the delay in bringing the action.

From time immemorial it has been the natural primary obligation of the parent to bear the financial burden of caring for an afflicted child. In this humanitarian age the state has assumed that obligation in the absence of the parent's ability to do so. This fact has not, however, entirely abolished the parental obligation. It has done so only to the extent provided by statute. There is no apparent reason why the state should not provide that the parent's financial responsibility created during her lifetime should not continue as an obligation of her estate. The fact that, because of circumstances, the obligation created during her lifetime was not then collected did not extinguish it as a valid claim against her estate in an amount within the statute of limitations.

The construction of sections 6650 et seq. of the Welfare and Institutions Code as above outlined and as dealt with in the prior hearing, was not attacked in the petition for rehearing. But the defendant now argues that if it was the intention of the Legislature to impose an absolute liability on the named relatives of mentally ill persons the statutory provisions are unconstitutional.

The contention is based on alleged arbitrary and discriminatory classification in that the responsible relatives of other groups of persons receiving public assistance are claimed to have only a conditional obligation to furnish support and maintenance based upon their ability to pay.

[6] Article I, section 11 of the California Constitution requires that all laws of a general nature have a uniform operation. This has been held generally to require a reasonable classification of persons upon whom the law is to operate. The classification must be one that is founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction. Serve Yourself Gasoline Stations Ass'n v. Brock, 39 Cal.2d 813, 820, 249 P.2d 545; City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 251-252, 27 P. 604. Likewise, those within the class, that is those persons similarly situated with respect to that law, must be subjected to equal burdens. Watson v. Division of Motor Vehicles, 212 Cal. 279, 284, 298 P. 481. The clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution which prohibits a state from denying to "any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws" has been similarly construed.

[7,8] Equal protection of the law is not afforded when a statute imposes a particular disability upon a class arbitrarily selected from a larger number of persons, all of whom stand in the same relation to the burden imposed, and between which class and the others no reasonable distinction or substantial difference can be found to warrant the inclusion of the one and the exclusion of the other. Franchise Motor Freight Ass'n v. Seavey, 196 Cal. 77, 81, 235 P. 1000; City of Pasadena v. Stimson, supra, 91 Cal. 238, 27 P. 604; 11 Cal.Jur.2d 719, and cases cited there. The classification in the present case would be justified if there is a reasonable distinction or substantial difference which warrants the exclusion of the class of which the decedent was a member from those who owed only a conditional obligation to support and maintain a relative in a public institution. It further appears that the distinction upon which classification is based or upon which different treatment is accorded must have some reasonable and substantial relation to the purpose for which the legislation was designed. Serve Yourself Gasoline Stations Ass'n v. Brock, supra, 39 Cal.2d 813, 249 P.2d 545; Sei Fujii v. State of California, 38 Cal.2d 718, 242 P.2d 617; 11 Cal.Jur.2d 719, and cases there cited. The obvious purpose of the particular provisions of the statute here involved is to minimize the cost to the state and its agencies in providing assistance to the needy and distressed, by exacting contributions from persons standing in close relationship to those assisted. Accordingly, the classification which is claimed to have placed the deceased in a class apart must be shown to have a reasonable and substantial relation to the accomplishment of that purpose if the code provisions which are attacked are to withstand the claims of invalidity.

[9] The defendant's claim of improper classification is based, first, upon the whole of the Welfare and Institutions Code. The purpose of the code "is to provide for protection, care, and assistance to the people of the State in need thereof, and to promote the welfare and happiness of all of the people of the State by providing public assistance to all of its needy and distressed. * * *" Welf. & Inst.Code, § 19. It appears that the code deals with six categories of persons who may receive the assistance of the state: children in division 2, youths in division 2.5, aged persons in division 3, indigent persons in division 4, physically handicapped persons in division 5, and mentally irresponsible persons in division 6. The defendant claims that in each of the first five categories where a relative or relatives of persons receiving assistance are made liable for their support and maintenance the obligation, in the express language of the code, is made conditional on ability to pay.

It is to be noted that the support of minor children by their parents is provided for in the Civil Code. Section 196 of that Code provides that "The parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances. * * *" Section 205 provides for means of recovery by a county from the estate of a parent for the support of a child. Section 207 provides for a means of recovery against a parent for support furnished by a third person to a child under the parent's charge. The obligation to support a child is an absolute one and accordingly provisions in the Welfare and Institutions Code relating to reimbursement to public agencies for support and maintenance furnished are intended to provide only a means of collecting an obligation which the law already has imposed. Thus, references to ability to pay in such provisions are a condition only to collectibility, the obligation itself being an absolute one. Provisions in section 6650 et seq. of the Welfare and Institutions Code are herein construed to a similar effect.

In accordance with the foregoing the plaintiff contends, arguendo, that section 864 in division 2 of the Welfare and Institutions Code makes ability to pay a condition prior to the making of an order by the juvenile court for the support of a ward. That section provides: "If the court finds that there are earnings, property, or estate of such ward or other minor person, sufficient therefor, or that the parents or guardian of such ward or other minor person, or other person liable for the support of such ward, or other minor person is able to pay, either in whole or in part, for the expense of his support and maintenance, the court shall further order, and direct that the county be reimbursed, in whole or in part, for its expense of support and maintenance of him * * *."

A similar contention is made as to the purpose of section 1506.5 in division 2 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, relating to assistance furnished to needy children. That section provides that suit may be brought against a parent to recover the amount of assistance granted a needy child "if * * * the parent of a recipient has been gainfully employed or has had sufficient assets to enable him to reasonably assist the recipient during the period in which the child was receiving aid * * *."

While the obligation to support a minor child is an absolute one and for that reason not distinguishable from that imposed on the decedent in the present case, nevertheless there are grounds which justify a different classification of minor children and certain other groups receiving assistance for purposes of seeking recovery for assistance from responsible relatives. Statutory provisions relating to needy children in division 2 (§§ 1501.5, 1504, 1511), to aged persons in division 3 (§§ 2024 and 2025) and to physically handicapped persons in division 5 (§§ 3004 and 3007), all operate within the provisions of the Federal Social Security Act, 42 U.S.C.A. § 301 et seq., and funds utilized in those programs are derived from federal sources as well as from local governments. Accordingly, there is not as urgent a necessity that the local government recover the funds expended in such programs in order that its costs be minimized and that the purpose of the recovery provisions be realized. [This is urged as a reasonable ground upon which to justify the imposition of a conditional liability of responsible relatives of persons receiving assistance in those programs as against the responsible relatives of persons receiving assistance under a program not subsidized by federal funds, as in the present case.

In division 3, dealing with assistance given to aged persons, section 2181 provides a "Relatives' Contribution Scale" for the relatives of aged persons making application for assistance. No contribution is required where a relative's financial obligations are such that he may be deemed not to have the ability to contribute. In section 2224 it is provided that action may be undertaken against a "spouse or adult child found by the board of supervisors * * * pecuniarily able to support said person * * *." This plan is one which is supported by the federal Social Security program, as stated, and for that reason is properly classified apart from those persons who are mentally ill. Furthermore, a recipient of aid under this program need not be a person wholly without assets. He may be a person who has limited means of support and may have real property, the assessed value of which does not exceed $5,000 and personal property not in excess of $1,200. (§§ 2163, 2164.) Such an estate may exceed that of a responsible relative who is required to contribute to the aged person's support. Such a situation further justifies the imposition of a conditional liability on responsible relatives.

In division 5, dealing with aid to the needy blind, section 3088 provides that if a recipient of aid thereunder has a spouse, parent, or adult child, "pecuniarily able to support him" and who fails to furnish support, the board of supervisors may request that proceedings be commenced against that person. Again, as this program is supported by federal funds, there is a valid basis for discrimination in seeking reimbursement from responsible relatives.

As to other assistance programs not supported in part by the federal government, there is at the present time no obligation, absolute or conditional, for the reimbursement of the cost of support and maintenance of youths committed to the Youth Authority under the provisions of division 2.5 (See Welf. & Inst. Code, § 1742). However, there appear to be natural and intrinsic reasons for classifying persons committed under the provisions of division 2.5 differently from those who are mentally ill. Section 1700 of the Welfare and Institutions Code states that the "purpose of this chapter is to protect society more effectively by substituting for retributive punishment methods of training and treatment directed toward the correction and rehabilitation of young persons found guilty of public offenses. * * *" The Authority performs functions which in many instances would have to be performed by our penal institutions. As such it does not impose an additional drain on the financial resources of government for which reimbursement may properly be sought. Furthermore, persons committed thereto are gainfully employed (Welf. & Inst. Code, §§ 1760.5 and 1760.6), and for that reason constitute a lesser financial burden. Accordingly, there is good reason why government should not look to responsible relatives for the support and maintenance of youths committed to the Authority.

In division 4, relating to aid rendered to indigent persons, section 2576 provides in part that the board of supervisors shall determine if the spouse, parent or adult child of a recipient of aid has "the financial ability to support or contribute to the support of the recipient and were pecuniarily able to support or contribute to the support of the recipient during the time aid was rendered," and if in the opinion of the board "pecuniary ability existed when the aid was given and exists when the matter comes before the board of supervisors" the board shall institute proceedings against the responsible relative or relatives. The foregoing is claimed to constitute a conditional obligation to pay on the part of responsible relatives. However, it does not constitute the whole of section 2576. That section commences: "All aid rendered by the county under this chapter shall be a charge against the spouse, parent and adult child of the recipient thereof and the county rendering aid shall be entitled to reimbursement therefor." This would appear to impose an absolute liability on the named relatives. See County of Los Angeles v. Frisbie, supra, 19 Cal.2d 634, 122 P.2d 526. The further provisions of the section would seem to relate only to the collectibility of the obligation and to condition proceedings in that regard on ability to pay. Again, the foregoing construction is consistent with that attached to sections 6650 et seq.

In addition to an asserted improper classification as to the relatives of persons receiving assistance under the provisions of the various divisions of the Welfare and Institutions Code, the defendant further claims that within division 6, itself, dealing only with mentally irresponsible persons, those persons in the class of the decedent have been discriminated against. However, in section 5077 of the Welfare and Institutions Code dealing with a person determined "to be mentally disordered and bordering on mental illness but not dangerously mentally ill" (Welf. & Inst.Code, § 5076), responsible relatives are unconditionally liable for the expenses incurred by a county in maintaining such mentally ill person. Section 5077 states that the cost of maintenance of such a person "shall be defrayed out of the estate of the patient so committed or shall be a charge upon his relatives liable for his maintenance." Ability to pay is not even made a condition to collectibility in that case, it being further provided in that section that all "funds expended by the county for the maintenance of such patient * * * shall be a charge against such patient or against his husband, wife, father, mother, or children, in the order named and the county shall be entitled to reimbursement therefor."

Furthermore, in section 5402.5 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, relating to the commitment of dipsomaniacs and inebriates, it is provided that the "cost of maintenance of a person committed or confined under the provisions of Section 5402 to a branch of the county jail, in a sum to be fixed by the court at the time of the commitment or confinement, shall be a charge against the person committed or confined, or if such person be indigent against his relatives liable for his maintenance." The foregoing seems to impose an absolute liability to pay although later provisions in the section make collectibility conditional upon ability to pay. Again such an interpretation is consistent with sections 6650 et seq.

[10] From the foregoing sections of division 6 of the Welfare and Institutions Code it does not appear that there is a discriminatory classification as against the relatives of mentally ill persons committed under the provisions of section 6650 et seq. There is a sound basis for the plaintiff's contention that responsible relatives in all cases, including the decedent in the present case, are treated in substantially the same manner insofar as their obligation to support is concerned. In all cases, it is contended, the obligation to support is an absolute one, and it is only the collectibility of that obligation which is made conditional upon the ability of particular relatives and others to pay. The present case, insofar as research has disclosed, is the first in which this court has dealt with this specific question in relation to any of the various assistance programs in the Welfare and Institutions Code. It is obvious that the various statutory provisions have not dealt with the many and complex problems of humanitarian relief in the same way. Such a requirement is not laid upon legislative action and discrimination does not result if the classification is reasonable. As stated in People v. Western Fruit Growers, 22 Cal.2d 494, at pages 506-507, 140 P.2d 13, at page 20: "[T]he mere production of inequality which necessarily results to some degree in every selection of persons for regulation does not place the classification within the constitutional prohibition. The discrimination or inequality produced, in order to conflict with the constitutional provisions, must be 'actually and palpably unreasonable and arbitrary', or the legislative determination as to what is a sufficient distinction to warrant classification will not be overthrown. [Citations.] When a legislative classification is questioned, if any state of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it, there is a presumption of existence of that state of facts, and the burden of showing arbitrary action rests upon the one who assails the classification. [Citations.]" In view of the injunction laid upon us to uphold the constitutionality of a statute if it can be done on any reasonable theory, it is concluded that the present claim of unlawful classification may not properly be sustained.

[11] The defendant further contends that sections 6650 et seq. of the Welfare and Institutions Code are unconstitutional in that they violate the due process clauses of both the state and federal Constitutions. This contention is based on the claim that the decedent could not, of her own initiative, have obtained an administrative determination of her ability to pay by the Director of Mental Hygiene, or to have obtained a judicial review of the proceedings, had she obtained the administrative action.

No attempt was made by the decedent during her lifetime to obtain the administrative determination the lack of which the defendant now complains. In Re Estate of Stobie, 30 Cal.App.2d 525, 86 P.2d 883, 886, where sections 6650 et seq. of the Welfare and Institutions Code were involved, the court stated: "There is a presumption that an administrative officer, charged by the legislature with an administrative duty, will perform that duty in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the state of California. Such a presumption will prevail until it is attacked and some evidence presented that the officer has been guilty of dereliction and that the action taken by him has been arbitrary or discriminatory. People v. Globe Grain & Milling Co., 211 Cal. 121, 294 P. 3." It must be presumed in the present case that if an application had been made for a determination of the decedent's inability to pay, and satisfactory proof presented, the director might have reduced, cancelled or remitted the amount to be paid in accordance with section 6651.

As to the claim that a judicial review of administrative action is not provided, and hence constitutes a denial of due process, it is further stated in In re Estate of Stobie, supra, 30 Cal.App.2d at page 530, 86 P.2d at page 885: "The fact that this case is before this court is sufficient answer to appellant's argument of lack of due process of law. The statute requires the state to go into the superior court to collect the money due it. There the guardian is brought into court, after notice, and is given a tribunal in which to present his evidence and, in any lawful manner, resist the claim against the estate. A right of appeal from the judgment is given. Due process of law can require no more." See, also, County of Los Angeles v. Frisbie, supra, 19 Cal.2d 634, 645, 122 P.2d 526.

[12] The defendant finally contends that sections 6650 et seq. of the Welfare and Institutions Code are unconstitutional in that they constitute a taking of private property without just compensation. This contention was refuted in State Commission in Lunacy v. Eldridge, 7 Cal.App. 298, at page 304, 94 P. 597, at page 599, 94 P. 600, where the court stated: "* * * certainly the payment of the expense or a part thereof for the care and maintenance of one's relative, incapable of taking care of himself could not be the taking of private property for a public use without compensation, since for the expenditure required a substantial equivalent is given by the agents of the state having management of the institution. * * *"

The defendant has failed to establish any good reason why the estate of the decedent should not defray the charges incurred during the four years immediately preceding her death.

The judgment is affirmed.

GIBSON, C. J., and TRAYNOR, SPENCE and McCOMB, JJ., concur.

SCHAUER, Justice (dissenting).

The majority's holding that the liability mentioned in section 6650 of the Welfare and Institutions Code is unconditionally imposed, regardless of ability to pay, is, in my view, neither required by the statute nor, if we read the section in context, is the holding reasonable. The majority's construction is not reasonable in that (1) other provisions of the subject legislative plan indicate that the liability of relatives to reimburse the state is conditioned on ability to pay and (2) substantial portions of the scheme, vital to the integrity of its objectives, are rendered constitutionally void by the majority holding.

As hereinafter developed, the majority construction offends not only the salutary statutory plan but converts it into an implement whereby private property may be taken without compensation, an arbitrary classification is made, equal protection of the laws is denied, and a gift of "public money or thing of value" is authorized.

The Welfare and Institutions Code, with its comprehensive provisions for the liability of responsible relatives to reimburse the appropriate public agency for the support of the needy, is the measure of the subject liability; its sections, read together, constitute a complete system which occupies the field of such liability. (See County of San Bernardino v. Simmons (1956), 46 Cal.2d 394, 399, 296 P.2d 329; County of Contra Costa v. Lasky (1954), 43 Cal.2d 506, 509, 275 P.2d 452) When the pertinent portions of the code are read together it appears that the liability of the responsible relatives, declared in general terms but not fully defined or delimited in section 6650, is subject to the condition, stated in section 6653, that investigation disclose, and official determination be made, that "such relative or relatives are in fact financially able to pay such charges."

It is, of course, to be presumed that "official duty has been regularly performed" (Code of Civ.Proc. § 1963, subd. 15), and, accordingly, that the Director of Mental Hygiene and the Departments of Mental Hygiene and of Institutions performed the duties imposed upon them by section 6651 of the Welfare and Institutions Code. That section provides that "The monthly rate for the care, support, and maintenance of all mentally ill or insane persons and inebriates at the state hospitals for the mentally ill *where there is liability to pay for such care, support, and maintenance, shall be [reviewed once each fiscal year and fixed at the state-wide average per capita cost of maintaining patients in all state hospitals for the preceding fiscal year, as<sup>1</sup>] determined by the Director of Mental Hygiene, and shall be payable in advance. * * ** The Director of Mental Hygiene may reduce, cancel or remit the amount to be paid by the estate or the relatives, as the case may be * * * on satisfactory proof that the estate or relatives * * * are unable to pay the cost of such care, support, and maintenance. * * *" (Italics added.)

In section 6652 of the same code it is further provided that "The Department of Mental Hygiene *shall collect all the costs and charges mentioned in Section 6650 * * **" (Italics added.) Further defining the powers and indicating the duties of the Department, section 6658 provides, "The Department of Mental Hygiene may in its own name * * * bring an action to recover for the use and benefit of any state hospital or for the State the amount due for the care, support, maintenance, and expenses of any patient or inmate therein, against any county, or officer thereof, or against any person, guardian, or relative, liable for such care, support, maintenance, or expenses."

Inasmuch as we must presume that the Director and the Department faithfully performed the duties imposed upon them, and inasmuch as the record shows that the Department did carry out the mandatory duty imposed upon it by section 6653 to "make an investigation * * * and * * * determine whether * * * such relative or relatives are in fact financially able to pay such charges," but made no attempt to collect any charges from the relative here involved during her lifetime, we are further bound to accept the record as establishing that the Department actually determined that such relative was in fact not financially able to pay such charges.

Further, as already noted hereinabove, section 6651 of the code provides that "The Director of Mental Hygiene may reduce, cancel or remit the amount to be paid by the estate or the relatives, as the case may be, liable for the care * * * of any mentally ill or insane person * * * who is a patient of a state hospital for the mentally ill, on satisfactory proof that the estate or relatives, as the case may be, are unable to pay the cost of such care * * *" The power to "reduce, cancel or remit" must, if it is to survive constitutional tests, be correlative to the power to impose, and where such liability is not ascertained and imposed during the lifetime of the responsible relative it does not appear consonant with legislative intent to impose it after the relative's death. Certainly where, as here, a determination of no liability has been made during the relative's lifetime, the post mortem attempt to surcharge that relative's estate should fail. Upon a proper construction of the statutory plan, and on the facts appearing in this record, there was never an occasion for the director or the department to "cancel or remit the amount to be paid" because no "amount to be paid" was ever fixed and, hence, never accrued or became a liability of the deceased.

1. The language in brackets was added by 1954 amendment. Other amendments, not here material, were also made in 1953 and 1954.

I would not analogize Re Estate of Phipps (1952), 112 Cal.App.2d 732, 247 P.2d 409, 33 A.L.R.2d 1251 (majority opinion, 329 P.2d 694). The question there was the liability of the estate of an incompetent for care furnished the incompetent at a State hospital prior to the acquisition of any estate by the incompetent. It may fairly be said that the liability of the estate of the incompetent under section 6655 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, once the incompetent has died, is "unconditional" as opposed to the conditionally imposed liability of the estate of a responsible relative under sections 6650, 6651, and 6653. It is obvious that the estate of the incompetent, in the absence of statute, would be primarily liable for the incompetent's own support. It is equally clear that the estate of a relative (other than a spouse) would not ordinarily be liable for the support of an adult. In the Phipps case it is said (at page 735 of 112 Cal.App.2d, at page 411 of 247 P.2d) that "The liability of both [the estate of the incompetent and the responsible relatives] is there, although there may be no collectibility due to absence of estate or funds." This statement, insofar as it indicates that the estate of a responsible relative would be liable even though during the lifetime of the relative there was no determination of ability to pay, is mere obiter and was pronounced in a case not analogically close to the case at bar. Manifestly, the liability of a decedent's estate for necessities of life furnished the decedent himself during his lifetime is quite a different thing from seeking to impose liability for such necessities upon another person or the latter's estate.

From what has been said it is apparent that I disagree with Department of Mental Hygiene v. Shane (1956), 142 Cal.App.2d Supp. 881, 299 P.2d 747 (majority opinion, 329 P.2d 693). There, there was no evidence that the department ever made demand upon the decedent, during his lifetime, for the support of his insane son. After his death the department filed a claim in his estate. The court said (at page 883 [1] of 142 Cal.App.2d Supp., at page 748 of 299 P.2d), "We don't see any connection between the fact that the decedent did not have the ability to pay for his son, the inmate, while he was living and the fact that his estate would be liable." However, it appears that there is a connection between the fact that the department was not shown to have made claim to payments and established the ability of the decedent to make such payments during the period for which support was sought rather than waiting to make claim therefor after (if its theory be accepted) the asserted liability had accrued and the responsible relative had died.

As stated in the majority opinion (329 P.2d 692), section 2176 of the Political Code when enacted (Stats.1903, p. 505) "clearly made ability to pay a condition of liability." It provided, in material part, that "The husband, wife, father, mother, or children of an insane person, if of sufficient ability, * * * shall be liable for the care, support and maintenance of any insane person in a state hospital for the insane * * *" (Italics added.) When the Legislature deleted the phrase "if of sufficient ability" in 1909 (Stats.1909, p. 71) it added to the Political Code a form of commitment which expressly provided for a statement of financial ability (Pol.Code, § 2171, Stats.1909, p. 70). And in 1921, as the majority opinion points out, the Legislature added to section 2176 of the Political Code the provision that "The commission shall * * * make an investigation to determine whether the patient has any relative or relatives as mentioned in this section, and who are herein made responsible for payment for the care * * * of such patient, * * * and shall ascertain the financial condition of such relative or relatives, to determine whether in each case such relative or relatives are in fact financially able to pay such charges." (Stats.1921, p. 1335.) It thus appears that the Legislature has always had in mind financial ability as a condition of the liability of responsible relatives.

Moreover, with respect to the question posed by plaintiff's contention that sections 6650 et seq. of the Welfare and Institutions Code are unconstitutional in that they constitute a taking of private property without just compensation, it may first be noted that State Commission in Lunacy v. Eldridge (1908), 7 Cal.App. 298, 304, 94 P. 597, 600, relied upon by the majority (329 P.2d 699), was decided at a time when, as already mentioned herein, section 2176 of the Political Code "clearly made ability to pay a condition of liability," and hence constitutes no authority whatsoever for holding that the imposition of unconditional liability is permissible under our constitutional guaranties. Further, I am in accord with the view expressed by Chief Justice Beatty of this (Supreme) court in dissenting from the order denying a hearing in the Eldridge case, "for the reason that there is, in my opinion, a serious question as to the constitutionality of an act of the legislature which seeks to impose the obligation of support upon the father or mother of an adult son who, at the instance of the state, has been committed to an insane asylum because he is a dangerous lunatic." (at page 307 of 7 Cal.App., at page 601 of 94 P.)

Particularly do I believe that there is a serious question of the constitutional right of the Legislature to impose liability for the maintenance of an adult person upon any other person who has not voluntarily (as in the case of marriage, for example) assumed an obligation to answer for such support and who in the nature of things, if the legislation be sustained, can do nothing to secure relief therefrom short of himself joining the class of needy and impoverished persons whom the welfare legislation ostensibly seeks to assist. That the Legislature did not intend this result is made obvious by the provision of section 6655 that even the estate of the patient himself shall not be drained beyond reasonable ability to pay if there is likelihood of his recovery. ("Payment for the care, support, maintenance, and expenses of a person at a State hospital shall not be exacted * * * if there is likelihood of the patient's recovery or release from the hospital and payment will reduce his estate to such an extent that he is likely to become a burden on the community in the event of his discharge from the hospital.") Do the majority of this court intend to tell the people of California that this State is more concerned in protecting the estate and solvency of the incompetent than it is in conserving the independence of his relatives? Do they mean to hold that the incompetent's estate may be left intact to ensure his financial independence, at the same time that absolute liability is imposed on the relatives, regardless of ability to pay? That any nonconsenting adult person should have imposed upon him, by act of the Legislature, absolute responsibility for support and maintenance of another adult over whom and whose estate the law grants him no correlative right of control or conservation, suggests to me not only the taking of property without due process and denial of equal protection of the laws, but an open invitation from the State to irresponsibility both by those upon whom liability is sought to be imposed and by those in whose favor it is sought to be created. I am impelled to the view that these basic constitutional questions deserve more thorough exploration than has been accorded them in the majority opinion.

Another grave question appears on the face of the majority opinion. It is there declared (329 P.2d 693) that "while an unconditional liability is imposed, the amounts due thereunder may be reduced, remitted, or cancelled by administrative action * * * following an investigation and determination of inability to pay." Would not remission or cancellation of an unconditional debt owing to the State of California constitute a gift of "public money or thing of value" in violation of section 31 of article IV of the Constitution of California? It is our duty to construe statutes, which reasonably admit of such construction, so as to avoid running afoul of constitutional proscription. We would accomplish that result here by construing the statute as making financial ability a condition of liability. Certainly we should apply that very obvious and apparently contemplated construction here. (Bodinson Mfg. Co. v. California Employment Comm. (1941), 17 Cal.2d 321, 326-327 [6], 109 P.2d 935; 11 Cal.Jur.2d 384, and authorities there cited.)

In addition, if remission is to be permitted by administrative action upon a determination of inability to pay, then, as likewise mentioned by Chief Justice Beatty in the Eldridge case (State Commission in Lunacy v. Eldridge (1908), supra, 7 Cal.App. 298, 307-308, 94 P. 597, 600), by what standard is ability to pay to be determined? Does the support obligation "continue until the father or mother, or wife or child, has been stripped of all his or her possessions except property exempt from execution, or has the court or commission discretion to say how far the exaction shall be pressed? Upon the former supposition the operation of the law would in many instances result in grievous hardship, upon the latter its operation would be lax or oppressive according to the idiosyncracies of the officers, executive and judicial, charged with its enforcement." And we may add, does this absolute liability concept intend that the available relatives shall themselves be reduced to the point of needing support from the State when no further solvent relatives can be found? Lastly, for the purposes of this dissent, but by no means all that might be said on the subject, it is noted that the majority opinion strains to the end it reaches against the express provision of section 6651 that "The monthly rate for the care, support, and maintenance of all mentally ill or insane persons and inebriates at the state hospitals for the mentally ill where there is liability to pay for such care, support, and maintenance, shall be * * * determined by the Director of Mental Hygiene, and shall be payable in advance. * * *" (Italics added.)

For the reasons above stated, I cannot concur in the philosophy, the reasoning, or the law of the majority opinion. The judgment should be reversed.

Anderson & Pancera, Susanville, for appellants.

Pardee & Cady, Susanville, for respondent.

WARNE, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of respondent against appellant George H. Waugh in the sum of $4,000 and directing defendant Lassen County Guaranty Company to pay and deliver to respondent the $4,000 held by it as commission due the appellant George H. Waugh, as realtor, for the sale of respondent's ranch.

The action is founded on fraud practiced upon respondent by Waugh in selling property in excess of his authority, and fraudulent statements in connection therewith made by Waugh to respondent which induced appellant to sign a contract for the sale of said property. Since Waugh is the only party appellant affected by this appeal, hereafter when we use the word "appellant" we are referring to Waugh, unless otherwise stated.

The facts and the evidence most favorable to respondent are: In 1956 respondent listed his 4,854-acre ranch, together with the farm machinery and equipment, for sale with the appellant, a realtor. Under the terms of the "Authorization to Sell" appellant was employed to find a purchaser, and was granted the authority to sell the ranch for $90,000 and the farm machinery and equipment for $10,000, also approximately 400 head of cattle at market price. For his services he was to receive 5 per cent commission on the sale.

Appellant was unable to find a purchaser willing to pay the listed price, but did receive from a Mr. Buckner an offer of $80,000 for the land, including the machinery and farm equipment. This offer was not acceptable to respondent. However, after receiving the offer, he orally authorized appellant to sell the ranch for $80,000, and the machinery for $10,000, and at the same time it was agreed that appellant should receive a 5 per cent commission on the selling price of the land only for making the sale of the ranch together with the farm machinery and equipment.

Appellant apparently informed Mr. Buckner of respondent's unwillingness to accept the offer. Mr. Buckner then countered with an offer to purchase the land "and everything" but the cattle for $90,000, provided the purchase price of the land was put at $85,000 and the personal property at $5,000. Without consulting respondent, appellant then wrote up a contract, in the form of a deposit receipt, by the terms of which Mr. Buckner offered to purchase the land at $85,000 and the personal property, consisting of approximately 200 tons of hay, 9 horses, all farm machinery and trucks and miscellaneous equipment, at $5,000. Mr. Buckner signed the receipt and delivered to appellant his $5,000 check as a down payment.

Appellant then took the signed deposit receipt to the State Creek property in Lassen County, where respondent was busy rounding up his cattle at the time, and informed respondent that he had made the deal for him and had a purchaser who would pay $80,000 for the land and $10,000 for the machinery. Appellant then presented to respondent the reverse side of the signed deposit receipt which, so far as material, reads:

"Acceptance ..

"The undersigned accepts the offer on the reverse side hereof and agrees to sell the property described thereon on the terms and conditions therein set forth.

"The undersigned agrees to pay Broker therein named and employed by the undersigned to sell said property as commission the sum of Four Thousand Dollars ($4000.00) * * *.

"The undersigned acknowledges receipt of a copy hereof." (This was followed by date and place for signature.) Appellant requested respondent to sign it.

In his complaint respondent pleaded, and at the trial testified, that when he signed the deposit receipt he did not read it and did not know that the hay and horses were included in Mr. Buckner's offer. However, after learning of the terms of the offer as set forth in the deposit receipt, respondent, presumably upon the advice of counsel, executed a deed and bill of sale conveying the real property and the personal property, including 200 tons of hay and the 9 horses to Mr. Buckner in accordance with the terms of the contract.

The trial court found that appellant was the agent of respondent for the purpose of finding a purchaser for said lands and machinery and farm equipment and that it was agreed that appellant was to receive a $4,000 commission for his services; that at no time was appellant authorized by respondent to sell, find a purchaser for, or otherwise dispose of the 200 tons of hay and the 9 horses, and that in procuring respondent's signature to the contract (Deposit Receipt) which provided for the sale of the hay and the horses appellant exceeded the authority granted him as respondent's agent. The trial court also found that appellant stated to respondent that he (appellant) had found a purchaser who would pay $80,000 for the real property and $10,000 for the machinery and that he did then and there present to respondent for his signature a certain document (the Deposit Receipt) in writing and then and there represented to respondent that said document, on the face thereof, was a contract for the sale of said property to George E. Buckner, Sr., at a price of $80,000 for the real estate and $10,000 for the machinery, and requested respondent to sign said document on the reverse side thereof and did not show or exhibit the face or obverse side thereof to respondent; that said document showed on the face thereof that said real property was sold for $85,000 and the farm machinery and equipment, plus 200 tons of hay and 9 horses were sold for $5,000; that in signing said document on the reverse side thereof appellant understood and believed that he was agreeing to sell the real property for $80,000 and the machinery and equipment for $10,000 and did not know or believe that he was also thereby agreeing to sell Mr. Buckner 200 tons of hay and the 9 horses.

[1] Appellant contends, first, that he did not exceed his authority to sell the ranch by including the hay and the horses. In support of this contention he cites Palmtag v. Danielson, 30 Cal.2d 517, 521, 183 P.2d 265, and Twogood v. Monnette, 191 Cal. 103, 108, 215 P. 542, which hold that a written listing for the sale of property by an agent may be changed by a parol understanding or agreement and that if the seller accepts modified terms communicated to him by the purchaser, through the agent, the seller cannot then refuse to pay the agent his commission. Neither of the cited cases holds that an agent may practice a fraud upon his principal to induce him to accept other terms than those set out in the written listing and then escape liability in damages for his fraud. This is not an action resisting payment of an agreed commission, but to recover damages for fraud. Respondent admits that appellant earned the $4,000 agreed commission. Coincidentally, the damages awarded respondent were the same as the commission. The judgment for fraud must stand.

[2] Nor is there any merit in appellant's second contention that the evidence does not support a finding of fraud. Since appellant had no authority to sell the hay and the horses, we feel that it was a fraud for him to include them in the contract (Deposit Receipt) and then procure respondent's signature to the "acceptance" in the manner found by the trial court. The evidence shows that he not only did not inform or show respondent that these items were included in the contract, but misrepresented the facts by stating to respondent, "I made the deal for you for ninety thousand, I am getting eighty thousand for the land, and ten thousand for the machinery." Without further explanation he asked for and received, in reliance upon his statement, respondent's signature upon the reverse side of the deposit receipt without showing him the obverse side.

[3, 4] While it is true the findings are, in the main, based on respondent's testimony, which is in conflict with the testimony produced on behalf of appellant, they, nevertheless, are binding upon this court. Crawford v. Southern Pacific Co., 3 Cal.2d 427, 45 P.2d 183. On appeal all conflicts must be resolved in favor of the prevailing party and the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to him. O'Banion v. Borda, 32 Cal.2d 145, 147, 195 P.2d 10.

[5-7] As respondent's agent, appellant was under a duty to disclose to his principal the contents of the deposit receipt. Civil Code, Sec. 2020; Calmon v. Sarraille, 142 Cal. 638, 76 P. 486; Ratray v. Scudder, 28 Cal.2d 214, 169 P.2d 371, 164 A.L.R. 1356; Civil Code, Sec. 2230; Lawrence v. Tye, 46 Cal.App.2d 514, 116 P.2d 180. Respondent was entitled to rely upon the representations of appellant that the contract called only for the sale of the land and the machinery. Hoffman v. Patterson, 179 Cal. 253, 176 P. 162. As the agent of respondent, appellant stood in a fiduciary relationship and was bound to the same standards of conduct—of undivided service and loyalty—of integrity and good faith—as is a trustee (2 Cal.Jur.2d 771, Sec. 104; Civil Code, Sec. 2322(3)), and a violation of duty on his part is to be treated in the same manner as a violation of duty by a trustee, viz., as a fraud upon his principal. Darrow v. Robert A. Klein & Co., Inc., 111 Cal.App. 310, 295 P. 566. Measured by the foregoing rules, appellant was liable to the respondent in damages for the fraud practiced upon him.

[8] Appellant next contends that the respondent's act in completing the transaction with Mr. Buckner and accepting the benefits of the contract amounted to a ratification of appellant's act in exceeding his authority and perpetrating the fraud upon his principal and that he is, therefore, precluded from recovering damages. We do not agree with appellant. Here the appellant, so far as Mr. Buckner is concerned, was clothed with the ostensible or apparent authority to sell the hay and the horses. Therefore, Buckner, as an innocent purchaser, could have enforced the contract of sale against respondent. Nor could respondent have rescinded the contract without Buckner's consent. Under such circumstances, appellant, by completing the transaction as called for by the contract, was not precluded from recovering from appellant those damages which he sustained by reason of the fraud. As stated in Conklin v. Benson, 159 Cal. 785, 793, 116 P. 34, 38, 36 L.R.A.,N.S., 537:

"Under such circumstances * * *, the rule established by the overwhelming weight of authority is that the equities of innocent purchasers are protected, even if injury be done to the party who has been imposed upon or defrauded by her agent. * * * 'In this case, plaintiffs and defendant were both innocent. Neither knew that the fraud was being practiced; but if that fraud was productive of injury, the injury must result to the plaintiffs [appellant in the instant case], for they placed it in the power of the wrongdoer to perpetrate the fraud. The vendee will not be compelled by a court of equity to lose the benefit of a bargain obtained in all fairness and honesty, because of a fraud practiced upon the vendors by their own agent.'" (See also Shirey v. All Night & Day Bank, 166 Cal. 50, 134 P. 1001, and 2 Cal.Jur.2d 706.)

Applying these rules to the instant case, it follows that respondent was legally obligated to complete the transaction with Buckner, he being an innocent party.

In his closing brief appellant for the first time contends that the court's finding that appellant exceeded the authority granted him as respondent's agent is outside the issues of the case, because the complaint recites only facts of an alleged fraud and that any award in damages that is based solely upon that finding does not authorize the judgment. This might be true if the court had limited its findings to excess of authority. However, such is not the fact. The trial court, as heretofore mentioned, specifically found that appellant had practiced fraud on respondent in other respects.

The judgment is affirmed.

Defendant pleaded guilty to charge of murder. The Superior Court, San Diego County, John A. Hewicker, J., rendered judgment and denied motion for withdrawal of plea of guilty, and defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Mussell, J., held that where defendant admitted she was fully advised by counsel when she changed her plea of not guilty to guilty, defendant was present when stipulation as to punishment for offense was entered into and defendant understood nature and consequences of her plea, denial of motion to withdraw plea of guilty was not an abuse of discretion in absence of clear and convincing evidence establishing factors overreaching her free and clear judgment at time she entered her plea of guilty.

In proceeding on motion to set aside judgment and plea of guilty previously entered, on ground that defendant did not personally plead guilty to murder of first degree, evidence established that defendant personally and through her counsel entered plea of guilty to crime of murder and that degree of offense was properly determined by trial court.

2. Criminal Law §274

Where defendant admitted she was fully advised by counsel when she changed her plea of not guilty to guilty, defendant was present when stipulation as to punishment for offense was entered into and defendant understood nature and consequences of her plea, denial of motion to withdraw plea of guilty was not an abuse of discretion in absence of clear and convincing evidence establishing factors overreaching her free and clear judgment at time she entered her plea of guilty.

Howard A. Muhleman, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., and Edward M. Belasco, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

MUSSELL, Justice.

Appellant was charged with the murder of LaVerne Elvis Dufford. She was arraigned and entered pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity. Two doctors were appointed by the court to examine her and report at the time of trial. On April 21, 1958, the cause came on for trial. A jury was empaneled and after an opening statement by the prosecution, several exhibits were introduced in evidence and two doctors were examined. The trial was then recessed until the following day at 10 o'clock a.m., at which time a continuance was granted at the request of appellant until 1:30 p.m. of that day, when the following took place in the trial court's chambers:

"The Court: May it be stipulated that the defendant and her counsel, Mr. Muhleman, are here, and the Deputy District Attorney, Mr. Brown, and the matron and the clerk and the reporter and myself are in chambers?

"Mr. Muhleman: So stipulated.

"Mr. Brown: So stipulated.

"The Clerk: Your true name is Thelma Fern Dufford?

"The Defendant: (Nods head affirmatively.)

"The Clerk: You are represented by Mr. Howard A. Muhleman?

"The Defendant: (No response.)

"The Clerk: Mrs. Dufford, you have heretofore on March 4, 1958, in this Department, entered a plea of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity to one count of murder. At this time you wish to move the Court to withdraw those pleas and enter another plea?

"Mr. Muhleman: It is so moved by counsel.

"The Court: Do you wish to withdraw your plea of not guilty?

"Mr. Muhleman: Answer yes or no, Thelma.

"The Defendant: I can't think clearly.

"Mr. Muhleman: Do you want to stand up? Maybe you will feel a little better. Do you wish to withdraw your plea of not guilty at this time and enter a plea of guilty?

"The Court: Did you say yes or did you say no?

"The Defendant: Yes.

"The Court: Okay.

"The Clerk: And what is your plea at this time, Mrs. Dufford? Do you plead guilty?

"The Defendant: Guilty.

"Mr. Brown: May we have a stipulation, counsel, that this is murder of the first degree, the maximum penalty that may be assessed being life imprisonment, to which the People will consent?

"Mr. Muhleman: So stipulated.

"The Court: Does she understand that?

"Mr. Muhleman: Yes, your Honor.

"The Court: She is agreeable to it?

"Mr. Muhleman: Are you agreeable to that? Will you read that stipulation back? (The record read by the reporter.)

"Mr. Muhleman: Do you understand that?

"The Defendant: I believe I do.

"The Court: Very well."

Appellant's counsel then waived time for pronouncement of judgment and appellant was sentenced to confinement in a state prison for the term prescribed by law, and was committed to the California Institution for Women at Corona. A stay of execution was granted to April 24, 1958, at which time appellant moved to set aside the judgment and the plea of guilty previously entered. This motion was in the handwriting of the appellant and is as follows:

"I Thelma Dufford move the court to change my Plea of Guilty to not Guilty because of following reasons—

"My judgement and reasons were for the benefit and considerations of others and not myself. I was fully advised by consul but did not understand the situation clearly. I was advised it was for the best of my intrest but feel I was infullunced by others and that it was against my own decision. I within my own heart do not feel guilty and do not feel Justice will be done until I have been tried.

"Thelma Dufford

"I do not feel it was of my own free will and volition.

"Thelma Dufford."

During the arguments on the motion, as reflected by the reporter's transcript, the deputy district attorney, on April 22, took appellant's counsel to his office and there played a tape recording which indicated the degree of the crime charged in the information and the evidence which the prosecution could produce. It also appears that appellant's counsel had discussed the matter of entering a plea with appellant and, after hearing the tape recording and talking with the deputy district attorney, counsel went back and talked to appellant and advised her to enter a plea of guilty and that the punishment would only be life imprisonment.

A deputy sheriff testified at the hearing on the motion that on February 2, at 1:30 a.m., he had a conversation with appellant at the county jail in the presence of appellant's sister; that there were no promises of immunity or reward made to appellant and she made a free and voluntary statement concerning the details of the crime. This statement was recorded on a tape recorder and the record thereof was admitted in evidence and considered by the trial court in ruling on the motion.

Appellant, in her attack on the judgment and order denying her motion, first argues that she did not personally enter a plea of guilty to murder of the first degree. This argument is without merit. The record shows that appellant was represented by counsel and advised by him at all stages of the proceedings involved in her change of plea; that before she withdrew her plea of not guilty she was advised by the clerk that she had entered a plea of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity to one count of murder, and was asked if she wished to withdraw her plea of not guilty. Her counsel then moved to withdraw the plea and the trial judge then asked appellant: "Do you wish to withdraw your plea of not guilty?", and appellant answered, "Yes". Immediately thereafter the clerk asked appellant "And what is your plea at this time, Mrs. Dufford? Do you plead guilty?", to which appellant replied "Guilty". It was then stipulated by counsel for the People and appellant that the maximum penalty to be assessed would be life imprisonment and the court determined the degree of the offense as required by section 1192 of the Penal Code.

[1] It clearly appears that appellant personally and through her counsel entered a plea of guilty to the crime of murder and that the degree of the offense was properly determined by the trial court.

Appellant's second and final contention is that there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the court in refusing to allow appellant to withdraw her plea of guilty. This contention is likewise without merit. In People v. Singh, 156 Cal.App.2d 363, 365, 319 P.2d 697, 698, the court said:

"The applicable statute, Penal Code, section 1018, provides that in the case of a defendant represented by counsel the court may, for good cause shown, permit the plea of guilty to be withdrawn. The statute further provides that it is to be liberally construed to promote justice. The granting or denial of a motion to withdraw a plea of guilty rests in the sound discretion of the trial judge and his decision will not be disturbed on review unless an abuse of that discretion is clearly shown. People v. Moffett, 137 Cal. App.2d 626, 290 P.2d 667. The basis of the application for relief must be established by clear and convincing evidence. People v. Cooper, 123 Cal. App.2d 353, 266 P.2d 566."

In People v. Cooper, 123 Cal.App.2d 353, 266 P.2d 566, 567, it is said that:

"While a plea of guilty may be withdrawn pursuant to Penal Code section 1018 by reason of the mistake, ignorance, inadvertence or any factor that overcame the defendant's exercise of a free judgment, the basis of the motion for relief 'must be established by clear and convincing evidence.' Moreover, the reviewing court is justified in concluding that the motion was properly denied when it is shown that the accused 'acted with knowledge of the facts and on advice of his counsel.' In any event, the granting of such a motion rests in the sound discretion of the court."

In People v. Griffin, 100 Cal.App.2d 546, 548, 224 P.2d 47, 49, it was held:

"While a plea of guilty may be withdrawn for mistake, ignorance, inadvertence or for any other factor overreaching a defendant's free and clear judgment, the fact of such mistake, fraud, duress or overreaching must be established by clear and convincing evidence, and an appellate court may conclude that the motion was properly denied where the defendant acted with knowledge of the facts and on advice of his counsel." (Citing cases.)

[2] In the instant case appellant admitted that she was fully advised by counsel. The record shows that she was present when the stipulation as to the punishment for the offense was entered into and understood the nature and consequences of her plea. It is apparent that there was a lack of clear and convincing evidence establishing factors overreaching her free and clear judgment at the time she entered her plea of guilty. There was no abuse of discretion in denying her motion to withdraw this plea.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Civ. 18061-18063.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Sept. 12, 1958.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 22, 1958.

Actions brought to determine rights under police and fire department retirement ordinances of the City of Berkeley. The Superior Court, Alameda County, Ralph E. Hoyt and Richard H. Chamberlain, JJ., directed payment of additional amounts and declared plaintiffs' right to like larger payments in the future, and defendants appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Draper, J., held, inter alia, that it was salary paid to those of same rank at retirement date, rather than average salary paid to those of that rank during three years preceding retirement, which fixed amount of pension to be paid to Berkeley policeman or fireman (retiring before June 16, 1944) for period running from date of retirement to date of first pay increase of rank.

Judgments modified and affirmed.

1. Municipal Corporations  $\S$  187(7), 200(7)

1944 amendments did not affect those who were members of service before their effective date, and Berkeley policemen and firemen retiring prior to effective date of 1944 ordinance amendments were entitled to retirement pensions based upon current salaries of ranks at which they retired.

2. Municipal Corporations  $\S$  187(7), 200(7)

It was salary paid to those of same rank at retirement date, rather than average salary paid to those of that rank during three years preceding retirement, which fixed amount of pension to be paid to Berkeley policeman or fireman (retiring before June 16, 1944) for period running from date of retirement to date of first pay increase of rank.

3. Pensions ☞1

Pension provisions must be liberally construed in favor of applicant.

4. Municipal Corporations ☞187(7), 200(7)

1944 ordinance amendments were inapplicable to limit pensions of widows of Berkeley policemen and firemen whose husbands had rendered service before amendments, whether they retired before or after effective date of amendments.

5. Municipal Corporations ☞187(7), 200(7)

Pension of widow of Berkeley fireman or policeman rendering service before 1944 ordinance amendments was subject to change upon increase in pay upon which his retirement pension was based at date of his death.

6. Municipal Corporations ☞1002

In actions brought to determine rights under police and fire department retirement ordinances of the City of Berkeley, it was error for trial court, directing payment of additional amounts and declaring plaintiffs' right to like larger payments in the future, to allow interest before judgment.

Fred C. Hutchinson, City Atty., Robert T. Anderson, Asst. City Atty., Berkeley, for appellants.

Cornish & Cornish, Berkeley, Robert H. Fouke, San Francisco, for respondents.

DRAPER, Justice.

These actions (consolidated on appeal) seek determination of rights under the police and fire department retirement ordinances of the City of Berkeley. Plaintiffs are retired department members and widows of firemen and policemen, all of whom were receiving retirement pensions. They asserted a right to retirement allowances in excess of the amounts being paid to them. Judgment directed payment of additional amounts, and declared plaintiffs' right to like larger payments in the future.

Defendants (the city and its pension boards) appeal.

[1] The ordinances provide for payment to retired policemen and firemen of a proportion (one-half or two-thirds, depending upon length of service) "of the average salary attached to the rank or ranks held during the three years immediately preceding the date of retirement." This provision has been construed as basing the pension upon the fluctuating salary of the rank at which the employee retired. Thus, when the salary of the rank held at retirement is increased, the retirement pension increases proportionately. Terry v. City of Berkeley, 41 Cal.2d 698, 263 P.2d 833; see also Eichelberger v. City of Berkeley, 46 Cal.2d 182, 293 P.2d 1. In 1944, the ordinances were amended to provide for a fixed pension based on average salary of the last three years before retirement. However, the 1944 amendments do not affect those who were members of the service before their effective date, June 16, 1944. Glaeser v. City of Berkeley, 148 Cal.App.2d 614, 307 P.2d 61. All plaintiffs who are retired members of either department were employed before that date. Thus appellants concede that, as soon as there is an increase in the pay of the rank from which each such respondent retired, the retirement pension is to be based upon current salary of such rank.

[2,3] The issue here concerns only the amount of the pension to which a retired employee is entitled from date of retirement to the date of the first pay increase of the rank from which he retired. Appellants contend that for this period the employee is to receive the average salary paid, during the three years before retirement, to the rank at which he retired. Respondents contend that each is entitled, until the first salary increase after his retirement, to a pension based upon the salary paid at the time of his retirement to the average rank which he had held for the preceding three years. Each of the retired respondents had at least one pay increase in the three years before his retirement, and thus, under respondents' construction, would receive a larger pension, over the period from retirement to first subsequent increase in pay, than under the construction urged by appellants.

In Terry v. City of Berkeley, supra, 41 Cal.2d 698, 700, 263 P.2d 833, 834, the Supreme Court quoted plaintiff's contention that "the three year period defines only the rank held and not the salary earned" and (41 Cal.2d at page 701, 263 P.2d at page 835,) the contention that the language of the three-year provision "merely changes the method of determining the 'rank' on which the pension payments are to be based." That decision did not pass upon the precise point here involved, but the court clearly held that the three-year period is looked to only to determine rank, rather than average salary.

The application of this interpretation is shown in the case of respondent Davis, who was assistant chief of the fire department for 19½ months of the three years preceding his retirement, and deputy chief (a higher paid rank) for 16½ months of that period. The trial court held that his pension, at the outset of his retirement, was the average reached by taking into account 19½/36ths of the salary of an assistant chief as at date of retirement, and 16½/36ths of the salary of the deputy chief at the same time. Upon any increase of salary of either or both ranks, the base of his pension is recomputed upon the same proportions. This approach gives effect to an "average" not only at date of retirement, but also after the first subsequent increase in pay. Appellants' contention would give effect to a three-year average only for the period from retirement to first salary increase.

It is difficult to reconcile appellants' contention with the Terry decision. If the base for retirement pay is the average salary received by the employee in his last three years of active service, that base should continue in effect regardless of changes in salary of the rank at which he retired. But it is precisely that contention which was rejected by the Supreme Court, which held that the three-year period applies to rank, and not to salary. It is the current salary of the rank which determines the amount of pension. We find no language in the ordinance or in the Terry decision which would indicate that another rule applies between date of retirement and date of first increase in salary thereafter. Reason suggests strongly that the rule fixing current salary as the base should apply at date of retirement, as well as at date of first subsequent salary increase. The same language which admittedly precludes reference to the three-year salary average after the first increase can hardly be relied upon to require such reference before that date.

Further, in resolving any ambiguity in the language of the ordinance, we are bound by the "general and well recognized rule that pension provisions shall be liberally construed in favor of the applicant." (Gibson v. City of San Diego, 25 Cal.2d 930, 935, 156 P.2d 737, 740.) We conclude that the trial court properly found the pension base to be the average salary paid, at time of retirement, to the rank or ranks held for the preceding three years.

Four respondents are widows. Three survive department members who retired after the effective date of the 1944 amendments (those changing the pension base to a fixed, rather than a fluctuating, salary). One survives a department member who, although not retired, was eligible for retirement at the date of his death in 1948. The ordinance provides for a pension to the widow of such an employee.

[4] As to these widows, appellants argue that each is entitled to a pension in accordance with the ordinance in effect at the date of her husband's retirement, and that her pension right does not become vested until her husband's death. Thus, it is asserted, the right of each widow is limited to that prescribed by the 1944 amendments—a fixed pension unaffected by increases in salary of the rank at which her husband retired—even though all four deceased husbands had been in department employ well before 1944. Since the judgments herein, the Supreme Court has held that a like amendment to the Los Angeles charter could not apply to limit the pensions of widows whose husbands had rendered service before the amendment, whether they retired before or after the effective date of the amendment. Abbott v. City of Los Angeles, 50 Cal.2d 438, 326 P.2d 484. Thus appellants' contention cannot be sustained.

[5] Appellants further contend, however, that even before the 1944 amendments the pension of a widow was based upon the fixed amount of her husband's pension at the time of his death, and was not subject to change upon an increase in the pay upon which his retirement pension was based at the date of his death. This contention is based upon the ordinance provision that a widow's pension shall be a proportion of "the average salary upon which (the pension of the husband) was based."

We cannot agree. The Supreme Court, in Eichelberger v. City of Berkeley, supra, 46 Cal.2d 182, 293 P.2d 1, determined the measure of pensions before the 1944 amendments. One of the plaintiffs in that case received her pension as the widow of a fireman who died in line of duty. The court held that all plaintiffs were, for the 1939-44 period, entitled to have their pensions based upon current salary, rather than that of date of retirement. We find in the ordinance no intention to use a different pension base for the widow of a fireman who died in line of duty (as in Eichelberger) than for the widow of an employee who retired before his death (as in the case at bar).

In any event, appellants' reliance upon the past tense in this section of the ordinance appears unsound. The section applies only after the death of the pensioned husband. To refer to his pension in the past tense does not imply an intention that the widow's pension base be limited to the salary upon which decedent's last retirement allowance was based. Rather, it merely recognizes the fact that the retirement allowance to the husband ceased upon his death. The salary upon which his pension "was based" during his lifetime is the fluctuating salary of the rank involved. Terry v. City of Berkeley, supra, 41 Cal.2d 698, 263 P.2d 833. To say that the widow's pension is based upon the salary upon which her husband's pension was based is to say she receives a proportion of the fluctuating salary which was there determined to be the basis of his allowance.

[6] The allowance of interest before judgment was improper. Abbott v. City of Los Angeles, 50 Cal.2d 438, 326 P.2d 484.

The judgments are modified by striking therefrom the portions allowing interest before judgment and as so modified they are affirmed, without costs to any party.

Falk & Falk, Eureka, for petitioner.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., by Doris H. Maier, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Harold L. Hammond, Dist. Atty., Humboldt County, Eureka, for respondent.

SCHOTTKY, Justice.

Petitioner filed in this court a petition for a writ of prohibition to restrain the Superior Court of Humboldt County from proceeding with the trial of petitioner on a charge of violating section 278 of the Penal Code. Said section reads as follows:

Cal.Rep. 329-330 P.2d-29

"Every person who maliciously, forcibly, or fraudulently takes or entices away any minor child with intent to detain and conceal such child from its parent, guardian, or other person having the lawful charge of such child, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding twenty years."

We issued an alternative writ and the matter was heard by this court.

Petitioner contends that she was held to answer at the preliminary examination without reasonable or probable cause. At the preliminary examination the evidence showed that the parents of the child, Mr. and Mrs. James, were separated. Mrs. James had moved into her father's home with the child, a four-months-old baby girl. On the night of March 31, 1958, petitioner knocked on the door of the grandfather's house and told him that she had a flat tire and needed help. Mrs. James was not at the house. The grandfather opened the door and petitioner walked in. Becoming suspicious of petitioner because of her answers to some of his questions the grandfather started to shove her out of the door and as he did so Mr. James jumped on him, cursed him and held him down. While Mr. James was holding the grandfather down, petitioner went into another room, wrapped the baby in a blanket and went out of the front door with the baby. Mr. James followed, and petitioner, Mr. James and the baby left together in an automobile.

Sometime subsequent to the taking of the child, Mrs. James saw petitioner carrying the child into a house. Mr. James was not seen at this time but his car was seen. At the present time no one seems to know of the whereabouts of either Mr. James or the baby.

On April 1, 1958 (after the taking of the baby) Mrs. James was granted custody of the child pending annulment proceedings.

Petitioner argues that since the father, Mr. James, had an equal right to the custody of the child on March 31st, he could not have been guilty of the crime charged. Petitioner then argues that petitioner, who accompanied and aided the father, could not be guilty of the crime.

[1] The general rule is well expressed in an annotation in 77 A.L.R. at page 317, as follows:

"In the absence of an order or decree affecting the custody of a child, it is generally held that a parent, or one assisting such parent, does not commit the crime of kidnapping by taking exclusive possession of the child."

And as stated in Biggs v. State, 13 Wyo. 94, 77 P. 901:

"That a father who takes his minor child from the custody of its mother, when the custody has not been placed in the mother by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, is not guilty of kidnapping, is settled by law. * * Not only is this proposition true when negatively expressed, but we think it may be positively stated that in no case, in the absence of an express provision of statute, can a parent be guilty of kidnapping his or her own minor child, unless the forcible taking is from the custody established by the decree of a competent court."

Respondent in reply argues that the sole question in the instant proceeding is whether there was reasonable or probable cause for the magistrate to believe that a crime had been committed and that petitioner was guilty thereof. Respondent argues that petitioner is neither the father nor the mother of the child who was taken and that the question of whether or not she was an agent of the father was a matter to be developed at the trial.

[2] After a careful study of the evidence introduced at the preliminary examination and the language of section 278 of the Penal Code, we do not believe that the record shows reasonable or probable cause for holding petitioner to answer. For the testimony leaves no room for an inference other than that the petitioner worked in concert with the father of the child; that the father, accompanied by petitioner, went to the house for the purpose of obtaining the child and that the father and petitioner left together with the child. Under section 197 of the Civil Code the father was equally entitled to the custody of the child, and in assisting in the taking of the child under the circumstances here present petitioner did not take the child from the custody of the parent having lawful charge of such child, and could not be held to have violated section 278 of the Penal Code.

We therefore conclude that there was no reasonable or probable cause for holding petitioner to answer for the offense charged and that a writ of prohibition should issue.

Let the writ issue.

MUSSELL, Justice.

This is an action for refund of county and city taxes paid by plaintiff under protest on three tugboats owned and operated by plaintiff. Recovery is sought for the sum of $13,836.92 in taxes assessed against the tug "San Diegan" and paid by plaintiff for the years 1955 and 1956; also for the sum of $17,397.31 in taxes assessed against the tug "Challenger" and paid by plaintiff for the years 1953, 1954, 1955 and 1956; and for the further sum of $11,467.95 assessed against the tug "Cuyamaca" and paid by plaintiff for the years 1953, 1954, 1955 and 1956. Plaintiff bases its right to recover said taxes on the ground that the three tugboats were exempt from city and county taxes under Article 13, section 4 of the Constitution of this state, which provides as follows:

"Exemptions; vessels; restriction.

All vessels of more than 50 tons burden registered at any port in this State and engaged in the transportation of freight or passengers shall be exempt from taxation except for state purposes * *".

The facts were stipulated at the trial and are embodied in two written stipulations. It appears therefrom that each of the three tugs, namely, the "San Diegan", the "Challenger" and the "Cuyamaca" were vessels of more than fifty tons burden; that each of said three vessels were registered in the Port of San Diego; that respondent Star & Crescent Boat Company was the owner of said three tugs and was also the owner of three oil barges bearing numbers 23, 24 and 25; that respondent had contracts in writing for the transportation of petroleum products with the following companies: General Petroleum Corporation, Richfield Oil Corporation, Shell Oil Company, Inc., Standard Oil Company of California, The Texas Company, Union Oil Company, Tide-water Oil Company, and the United States Navy; that petroleum products owned by the above named companies were transported in the three barges owned by respondent and towed from the Los Angeles area to the San Diego area by respondent's tugboats; and that in connection with the transportation of said petroleum products the Star & Crescent Boat Company has paid to the United States government, pursuant to section 4271 of the Internal Revenue Code, 26 U.S.C.A. § 4271, during the years 1953, 1954 and 1956, the sum of $86,400.19 for transportation taxes. It was further stipulated that approximately 95 per cent of the gross revenue earned by said tugs during the period when such taxes were assessed and levied was derived from towing barges carrying petroleum products belonging to others. It was also stipulated and agreed by the parties that the time spent by the individual tugs for the periods in question in towing these barges loaded with petroleum products under contracts of affreightment was as follows: "Cuyamaca" 95.83 per cent, "Challenger" 91.09 per cent, and "San Diego" 83.15 per cent.

The trial court concluded, inter alia, that said tugboats were engaged in the transportation of freight for hire during that percentage of time when they were engaged in the performance of affreightment contracts, and for said proportionate time were, and are, exempt from ad valorem property taxes; that said vessels were not engaged in the transportation of freight for hire for the balance of the time but for said period were engaged in the performance of coastwise towage and salvage contracts and in towing operations in San Diego Harbor, and for said proportionate times were not exempt from ad valorem property taxation. The trial court then prorated the exemption pursuant to the percentage of time spent by each tugboat under the affreightment contract to its total time spent in operation for the calendar years in question.

[1] The principal question for determination on this appeal is whether the said tugboats were "engaged in the transportation of freight" during the times involved so as to be exempt from taxation under the provisions of Article 13, section 4, of the Constitution of this state. Apparently the appellate courts of California have not passed upon the precise question involved.

In a superior court action in San Francisco brought by the Shipowners and Merchants Tugboat Company, a corporation, against the City and County of San Francisco, case numbered 373602, the tugboat owners sought to recover taxes alleged to have been collected in violation of section 4, Article 13, of the Constitution. According to the memorandum of opinion filed in that case, as set forth in respondent's brief, the tugs involved conducted towing operations and engaged in coastwise, car float and general towing on San Francisco Bay and tributaries. The court therein quoted from White v. The Mary Ann, 6 Cal. 462, at page 470, where the court said:

"* * * We think that the towing of a vessel out to sea by a steamer (tug) is the transportation of property, without resorting to any other than the necessary construction arising from the generic and common meaning assigned to the word 'transport'."

It was further stated in said memorandum that towing service is the employment of one vessel to expedite the voyage of another just as a locomotive is necessary to transport the freight carried in freight cars or a truck is necessary to transport the freight carried in a trailer; that they become an integral part of commerce as, of course, a barge or other floating vehicle without motive power could not move without the assist of a tug; that the authorities are uniform in holding that the services performed by tugboats constitute transportation and are uniform in holding that the transportation is of the freight or passengers as well as of the vessel or barges containing them; that it appears that the intent and purpose of the constitutional exemption "was to assist the shipping industry in this State" and a review of the proceedings in the legislature would confirm this conclusion; that therefore all activities of the tugboats were "engaged in transportation" within the meaning of the constitutional exemption; that it is immaterial whether particular tugboats may have done one type or another or whether they furnished part or in other cases all of the motive power; and that they are therefore entitled to the benefit of the constitutional exemption. It was ordered that judgment be entered for and on behalf of plaintiffs. This case was not appealed and it was stipulated herein that since 1949, based upon the opinion therein, the administrative construction placed by the assessor's office of the City and County of San Francisco upon the constitutional provision of Article 13, section 4, has been to declare tugboats of over 50 tons burden and properly registered as exempt from taxation under and by virtue of said provision. In this connection the parties herein further stipulated that the administrative construction placed upon this provision since 1934 by the assessors of San Diego county, based upon an opinion by the District Attorney, has been to declare said tugboats not exempt from taxation under said provision, and that for the past twenty years the administrative construction placed upon said provision by the County of Los Angeles has been to deny the exemption.

In section 209 of the Public Utilities Code "transportation of property" is defined as including every service in connection with or incidental to the transportation of property. In 49 U.S.C.A. section 902(h) the term "transportation" is said to include the use of any transportation facility (irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for such use), and section 902(g) of said code defines "transportation facility" as including any vessel, warehouse, wharf, pier, dock, yard, grounds, or any other instrumentality or equipment of any kind, used in or in connection with transportation by water subject to that chapter.

In Cornell Steamboat Co. v. United States, D.C., 53 F.Supp. 349, 353, the court stated that, nautically, to transport is "to haul a vessel by hawsers", and that a barge is both a "vessel" and "property." In Ohio River Sand Co. v. United States, D.C., 60 F.Supp. 563, 564, the court said:

"It seems clear that the towing of barges containing petroleum products constitutes transportation of property by water within the provisions of the statute. It is not necessary that the motive power applied to move the barges be in the barges themselves. The movement of barges by tugs is similar to the transportation of freight over highways in trailers attached to motor trucks. Transportation implies the taking up of persons or property at some point and putting them down at another. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U.S. 196, 203, 5 S.Ct. 826, 29 L.Ed. 158."

In Gulf Coast Towing Co. v. United States, 5 Cir., 196 F.2d 944, 946, plaintiff sued to recover alleged overpayment of federal transportation taxes and the court said:

"There can be no question that the compensation received by the towing company was that for the operation of a fully manned tugboat for towing barges, loaded and unloaded, used by the cement corporation in transporting raw materials used in its cement manufacturing business. Both the barges and the raw materials loaded thereon and towed by appellant's tug under the towage agreement were the 'property' of the cement corporation. Such towage was the transportation of property."

In Sacramento Nav. Co. v. Salz, 273 U.S. 326, 47 S.Ct. 368, 369, 71 L.Ed. 663, it is said that:

"To transport means to convey or carry from one place to another; and a transportation contract for the barge without the tug would have been as futile as a contract for the use of a freight car without a locomotive. In this view, by the terms of the contract of affreightment, in part expressed and in part necessarily resulting from that which was expressed, the transportation of the goods was called for, not by the barge, an inert thing, but by the barge and tug, constituting together the effective instrumentality to that end."

In the instant case the record shows that plaintiff was engaged in the business of transporting freight rather than of towage. Plaintiff entered into contracts of affreightment with General Petroleum Corporation, Richfield Oil Corporation, Shell Oil Company, Inc., Standard Oil Company of California, The Texas Company, and the Tidewater Oil Company. These contracts referred to plaintiff as the "carrier" and are each entitled "Transportation Agreement". They provide that the carrier undertakes to act as contract carrier of the products belonging to the oil companies. These companies agree to deliver to carrier's vessels at the oil companies' docks in San Pedro gasoline, fuel oil and other petroleum products. The oil companies agree to pay the carrier for the performance of such transportation in accordance with schedules set forth in the agreements. No distinction is made between the tug and the barge and the barges and tugs are owned by the plaintiff. The cargo carried is clearly freight (Civ.Code, sec. 2110), and it is obvious that plaintiff could not transport the fuel and other products in the barges without the use of the tugs. It is likewise clear that plaintiff's tugs were engaged in the transportation of freight within the meaning of Article 13, section 4, of the Constitution.

Defendants argue that the court erred in prorating the exemption. However, there is no provision in Article 13, section 4, of the Constitution for prorating the exemption and since we have concluded that the tugs involved were engaged in the transportation of freight, it follows that the exemption should have been allowed in its entirety.

In County of Los Angeles v. Craig, 38 Cal.App.2d 58, 100 P.2d 818, 821, in an action to recover personal property taxes on a vessel, the evidence showed that said vessel was designed for the transportation of freight and passengers; that it had been actively used for that purpose for many years and had never been used for any other purpose; and that it was laid up temporarily because of business conditions. The court there said:

"To hold that a vessel designed for the transportation of freight and passengers and used solely for that purpose is not 'engaged in the transportation of freight or passengers' within the meaning of said section while temporarily laid up for repairs or because of business conditions would lead to absurd results and would go far toward defeating the purpose of the exemption. It would mean that such vessel would be exempt from taxation only while being actively and continuously used for such transportation and would not be exempt during any period of temporary, enforced idleness. This could not have been the intention of the framers of the section or the intention of the people in adopting the same."

In Standard Oil Co. v. King County, 180 Wash. 631, 41 P.2d 156, it was held that to qualify as being engaged in "interstate commerce" so as to be exempt from county taxation, a vessel must be exclusively so engaged or at least primarily so engaged.

In the instant case it is apparent that the tugs of plaintiff boat company both as to revenue and as to time were primarily engaged in the transportation of petroleum products.

[2] Plaintiff has not appealed from the judgment herein and is bound by it and by the provision denying exemption as to approximately 10 per cent of the refund claimed. As is said in San Bernardino County v. Riverside County, 135 Cal. 618, 620, 67 P. 1047, 1048, "The right to accept the fruits of a judgment or order and the right to appeal therefrom are not concurrent, but are wholly inconsistent, and an election of either is a waiver and renunciation of the other." The judgment herein is therefore affirmed.

v.

Clarence S. COE, Defendant and Respondent.

Civ. 22963.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

Sept. 11, 1958.

Action for personal injuries sustained by guest passenger when automobile in which he was riding collided at an intersection with defendant's automobile. The Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Mildred L. Lillie, J., entered judgment for defendant and plaintiff appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Vallée, J., held that where defendant testified that after stopping his automobile at an intersection and observing automobile in which plaintiff was riding about 200 or 250 feet away he attempted to cross in front of such automobile, and that such automobile was traveling approximately 50 miles an hour, and did not appear to be slowing down, plaintiff was entitled to an instruction that while one has the right to expect the driver of an approaching vehicle to perform their duty under the law, such right does not exist when it is reasonably apparent to one in the exercise of ordinary care that another is not going to perform his duty, and that one is not justified in ignoring obvious danger although it is created by another's misconduct, and failure to give such instruction was prejudicial error, since under the testimony, jury could have found that it should have been apparent to defendant that driver of plaintiff's automobile was not going to stop at the intersection.

1. Appeal and Error ⇐928(2)

Where, in personal injury action, only specification of error was that court failed and refused to correctly instruct the jury, on appeal, evidence and reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom would be stated in the light most favorable to plaintiff.

329 P.2d—46

2. Appeal and Error ⇐928(1)

On appeal in a personal injury action, in determining whether instructions were correct, the District Court of Appeal was required to assume that the jury might have believed the evidence on which the cause of action of plaintiff was predicated, and that if correct instructions had been given on that subject jury might have rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff.

Automobiles ⇐246(9)

In action for personal injuries sustained by guest passenger in an intersectional automobile collision, where defendant testified that after stopping his automobile at intersection and observing automobile in which plaintiff was riding about 200 to 250 feet away he attempted to cross in front of such automobile, and that such automobile was traveling approximately 50 miles an hour, and did not appear to be slowing down, plaintiff was entitled to an instruction that while one has the right to expect the driver of an approaching vehicle to perform his duty under the law, such right does not exist when it is reasonably apparent to one in the exercise of ordinary care that another is not going to perform his duty, and that one is not justified in ignoring obvious danger although it is created by another's misconduct, and failure to give such instruction was prejudicial error since under the testimony jury could have found that it should have been apparent to defendant that driver of plaintiff's automobile was not going to stop at the intersection.

4. Appeal and Error 1062(3)

Where trial court erred in instructing the jury as a matter of law on a question that was one of fact on conflicting evidence, and a determination favorable to the losing party might have been made if the error had not been committed, such error was prejudicial.

5. Negligence ⇐93(8)

Negligence of driver of an automobile may not be imputed to a guest passenger.

VALLÉE, Justice.

Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment for defendant Clarence S. Coe entered on a jury verdict in an action for damages for personal injuries.

[1,2] The only specification of error is that the court failed and refused to correctly instruct the jury. Consequently the evidence and the reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom will be stated in the light most favorable to plaintiff. In determining whether the instructions are correct we must assume that the jury might have believed the evidence on which the cause of action of plaintiff was predicated, and that if correct instructions had been given on that subject the jury might have rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Clement v. State Reclamation Board, 35 Cal.2d 628, 643-644, 220 P.2d 897.

The accident, between two automobiles, happened shortly before midnight on November 11, 1955 at the intersection of Western Avenue and Palos Verdes Drive North in county territory of the County of Los Angeles.

Western Avenue is 60 feet in width and runs generally north-south. Palos Verdes Drive North is 30 feet in width and runs generally east-west. The intersection was a 4-way stop—there was a stop sign at each corner. The area was "open rural country." Defendant testified it was clear and dry in the area of the intersection at the time of the collision.

George Dietrich was driving his Buick north on Western in the lane next to the center line. Plaintiff was riding in the Buick as Dietrich's guest. She had worked all day with her corneal contact lenses in place, and as her eyes had begun to water and to be annoyed by the lenses she had removed them. As they approached the intersection and for at least a half mile before it was reached, she was sitting on the right-hand side of the car resting her eyes and she saw nothing of the events prior to the accident.

Defendant Coe testified: he was driving a Jaguar west on Palos Verdes; he lived about four miles from the intersection and "frequently" had driven by or through it; there was a stop sign at the intersection for westbound traffic with a limit line on the street about one foot east of the easterly edge of Western; he stopped "several feet behind the limit line"—to the east of it; he remained stopped about 10 to 20 seconds, during which time no traffic passed through the intersection in any direction; his view to the south (for northbound traffic) was unobstructed; he looked south and saw the only car approaching northbound; it was in the lane next to the double center line; it was about 200 or 250 feet away; he continued to watch the northbound car from 1 to 3 seconds; he "assumed that it was safe to proceed"; there was no other traffic about or around; when the Buick was about 200 or 250 feet away he put his car in gear and moved from 5 or 6 feet east of the easterly curb of Western into the intersection; he took his eyes off the Buick for an instant; at the time he did so it had traveled from where he first had seen it to within 150 or 100 feet or less of his car; the Buick did not stop; when his front wheels were about on the center line of Western his car was struck by the Buick; he heard the tires screeching shortly before the Buick hit; he was going between 5 and 15 miles an hour when his car was struck; the Buick was going 50 to 55 miles an hour when it struck his car; during the 1 to 3 seconds that he watched the Buick approach to within 150 or 100 feet or less of his car, it did not appear to be slowing down.

Defendant further testified: "Q. Now, at any time while you were in a stopped position did you make any observation to your left, in other words southerly on Western Avenue? A. Yes. Q. All right. Now, did you see anything when you made that observation? A. I saw a car coming. Q. Did you make any observation at that time regarding the speed of this vehicle? A. Approximately 50 miles an hour."

Plaintiff requested the court to give the first paragraph and either the second or third paragraph, but not both, and the fourth paragraph of this instruction:

"A person who, himself, is exercising ordinary care has a right to assume that others, too, will perform their duty under the law, and he has a further right to rely and act on that assumption. Thus it is not negligence for such a person to fail to anticipate an accident which can be occasioned only by a violation of law or duty by another.

"[However, an exception should be noted: the rights just defined do not exist when it is reasonably apparent to one, or in the exercise of ordinary care would be apparent to him, that another is not going to perform his duty.]

"[However, certain circumstances qualify the foregoing rules as follows: A person does not have the rights which they define when it is reasonably apparent to him, or in the exercise of ordinary care would be apparent to him, that another is not going to perform his duty.]

"[One is not justified in ignoring obvious danger although it is created by another's misconduct, nor is he ever excused from exercising ordinary care.]"<sup>1</sup>

The trial judge gave the first part of the instruction only and refused to give the second, third, and fourth paragraphs. Plaintiff asserts it was error not to give either the second or third paragraph and not to give the fourth paragraph.

The instruction, as requested by plaintiff, was given and approved in Stickel v. San Diego Elec. Ry. Co., 32 Cal.2d 157, 166, 195 P.2d 416. In Beseau v. George, 111 Cal.App.2d 807, at page 809, 245 P.2d 542, at page 544, this court stated:

"While one has the right to expect the driver of an approaching vehicle to obey the law, and is not necessarily negligent in failing to anticipate danger that would come only through violation of law, the requirements of due care do not permit him to be indifferent to the movements of such other vehicle. He must exercise ordinary care to observe whether the driver of the other vehicle is proceeding in violation of law, and he must conform his own conduct to standards of common prudence and caution."

In Carlson v. Shewalter, 110 Cal.App.2d 655, at page 658, 243 P.2d 549, at page 551, the court instructed the jury: "One lawfully using a public highway is entitled to rely on the presumption that others will not violate the law, and no negligence can be predicated on the failure to anticipate an unlawful movement in another on the highway." It was held (110 Cal.App.2d at page 658, 243 P.2d at page 551):

"The instruction should have included the qualification: 'One may not continue to assume that the law is being observed after knowing or having an opportunity, by the use of reasonable care, to know that it is not being observed.'"

In Wilson v. Los Angeles Trona Stages, 133 Cal.App.2d 756, 284 P.2d 951, the plaintiff was riding in the defendant's bus. A Buick coming toward the bus on the wrong side of the road collided head-on with the bus. The court gave this in-Court. BAJI told the trial judge to "use either the second or third paragraphs, not both."

1. This was BAJI No. 138. The request was by number, as permitted by rule 16a, Judicial Council Rules for the Superior struction (133 Cal.App.2d at page 760, 284 P.2d at page 954): "The driver of the bus in question, if exercising the care required of him under the law, had a right to assume and act upon the assumption that the drivers of other vehicles upon the highway would obey the law and would not in violation thereof interfere with the operation of the bus. Therefore, under such circumstances, it was not negligence on the part of the driver of the bus to fail to anticipate that some other driver might violate the law, if you should find such to have been the case at the time and place of this accident." The verdict was for the defendant bus company. Reversing, this court stated (133 Cal.App.2d at page 761, 284 P.2d at page 954):

"[T]he preliminary condition stated in the above-quoted instruction, namely, 'if exercising the care required of him [bus driver] under the law,' was not an adequate qualification of an instruction to the effect that a driver may assume that other drivers will obey the law. A reference to the original file of the case (in the county clerk's office) shows that a notation at the bottom of the instruction is 'See Form 138 - BAJI.' That form includes the substance of the instruction as given herein, and it also includes, as a second part thereof, the following statement: 'However, an exception should be noted: the rights just defined do not exist when it is reasonably apparent to one, or in the exercise of ordinary care would be apparent to him, that another is not going to perform his duty.' It is to be noted that the principle of law referred to in the second part of that form (either as the principle pertains to the use of ordinary care or utmost care) was omitted from the instruction as proposed by defendants. In Edlund v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 14 Cal.App.2d 673, at page 675, 58 P.2d 928, at page 929, wherein only ordinary care was required of the drivers, it was said: 'One may not continue to assume that the law is being observed after knowing or having an opportunity, by the use of reasonable care, to know that it is not being observed.' In Angier v. Bruck, 56 Cal. App.2d 55, at page 58, 131 P.2d 876, at page 878, wherein automobiles collided at an intersection, the jury was instructed at the request of plaintiff that if plaintiff "was at all times pertinent to this case driving plaintiff's automobile in a careful and prudent manner, and exercising that degree of care which is ordinarily exercised by cautious persons, then he had a right to assume that the defendant, James Platt, would drive his automobile in a lawful manner and would exercise for his own safety, the care and caution which an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under the same or similar circumstances." It was held therein that the instruction was erroneous in that it did not include the qualification that one may not continue to assume that the law is being observed after knowing or having an opportunity, by the use of reasonable care, to know that it is not being observed. In reversing the judgment for plaintiff, it was said therein, 56 Cal.App.2d at page 60, 131 P.2d at page 879: 'Plaintiff attempts to escape this result by pointing to the preliminary condition stated in the instruction, "if Raymond Angier [plaintiff] was at all times pertinent to this case driving plaintiff's automobile in a careful and prudent manner * * * then he had a right to assume" etc. This apparently, and as the jury must have understood it, refers to acts done before the making of the assumption referred to. It cannot serve the purpose of a plain statement of the qualification of the rule, which relates to conduct of the driver after he has made the assumption referred to in the instruction. * * * The qualification which was omitted is an essential part of the rule attempted to be stated. Defendant was entitled to have it enunciated in clear and positive language.”

[3, 4] The failure to qualify the instruction was, under the facts of this case, prejudicial error. There was evidence from which the jury might have found that defendant stopped at the limit line and after having observed the high speed of the Buick and noting its approximate distance and observing that it was not slowing down, he nevertheless put his own car in gear and proceeded into the intersection, taking his eyes off the rapidly approaching Buick when it was 150 or 100 or less feet from the intersection, and then continued forward into its path; and that in the exercise of ordinary care he could have avoided the collision either by not proceeding forward or by stopping his vehicle before reaching the lane in which the Buick was approaching. The jury could have found on ample evidence that in the exercise of ordinary care Coe was not entitled to assume that Dietrich would stop at the intersection. In other words, the jury could have found that it was reasonably apparent to Coe, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have been apparent to him, that Dietrich was not going to stop at the intersection and, if they so found, that he had no right to rely and act on the assumption that Dietrich would stop, and consequently that Coe was negligent and that his negligence was a proximate cause of the accident. The effect of the instruction as given without the qualification was to tell the jury Coe had the right to assume Dietrich was going to obey all duties imposed on him by law and that Coe had a right to rely and act on that assumption. If the jury had been specifically instructed as stated in paragraph two or three of the instruction, we cannot say their verdict would not have been for plaintiff under the evidence. The qualification was not covered in other instructions. “Where, as here, the error consisted in instructing the jury as a matter of law on a question that is one of fact on conflicting evidence, and a determination favorable to the losing party might have been made if the error had not been committed, that error is prejudicial.” Clement v. State Reclamation Board, 35 Cal.2d 628, 644, 220 P.2d 897, 906.

[5] There was no evidence that plaintiff was contributively negligent. The negligence of Dietrich is not imputed to plaintiff. Cary v. Wentzel, 39 Cal.2d 491, 495, 247 P.2d 341. If Coe was negligent and his negligence was a proximate cause of plaintiff’s injuries, it matters not how negligent Dietrich may have been.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Sept. 16, 1958.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 9, 1958.

Hearing Denied Nov. 12, 1958.

Prosecution for contributing to the delinquency of minor by selling him intoxicating liquor. The Superior Court, Mariposa County, Thomas Coakley and R. R. Sischo, JJ., entered judgment of conviction and defendant appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Peek, J., held that trial court did not err in sustaining objections to admission of evidence of names of persons who attended a party at which minor received money used to purchase liquor, on theory such evidence might have shown minor would have purchased liquor from persons other than defendant, since such evidence was wholly irrelevant on issue of whether or not defendant sold liquor to minor.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Criminal Law ⇨260(11)

Where in prosecution for contributing to the delinquency of a minor by selling him intoxicating liquor it was stipulated that case would be submitted for decision upon a transcript of evidence taken at the preliminary hearing and written argument of counsel, District Court of Appeal would not reweigh the evidence on appeal even though final decision was made by a judge who did not see or hear the witnesses. West's Ann.Welfare & Inst.Code, § 702.

Evidence sustained conviction for contributing to the delinquency of a minor by selling him intoxicating liquor. West's Ann.Welfare & Inst.Code, § 702.

In criminal prosecution, where court denied a request for admission of certain evidence, but court indicated it would consider the matter if it later appeared that such evidence should be admitted in order to do justice to defendant, but no further request was made, in the absence of a showing of prejudice, no prejudice would be presumed to have occurred from such refusal even if it constituted error.

4. Criminal Law ⇨338(1)

In prosecution for contributing to the delinquency of a minor by selling him intoxicating liquor trial court did not err in excluding evidence of names of persons who attended a party at which minor received money used to purchase liquor on theory such evidence might have shown minor would have purchased liquor from persons other than defendant, since such evidence was wholly irrelevant on issue of whether or not defendant sold liquor to minor. West's Ann.Welfare & Inst.Code, § 702.

5. Criminal Law ⇨338(1)

In prosecution for contributing to the delinquency of a minor by selling him liquor, court did not err in denying admission of affidavits apparently offered for purpose of showing reason why district attorney filed suit, and did not err in denying admission of an affidavit of counsel for defendant relating a conversation with the district attorney for purpose of showing possible prejudice in the county against defendant, since district attorney's reasons for initiating the proceeding were wholly irrelevant, and only possible relevancy of affidavit of defendant's counsel would have been on a motion for change of venue, which motion was not made. In prosecution for contributing to the delinquency of a minor by selling him intoxicating liquor, motion to the District Court of Appeal, for leave to produce additional evidence, would be denied where such additional evidence would be merely cumulative and could in no respect be conclusive of the fact that defendant had not made the sale to a minor as alleged. T. N. Petersen, Merced, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., by Doris H. Maier and William O. Minor, Deputies Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PEEK, Justice.

By information defendant was charged with a violation of section 702 of the Welfare and Institutions Code in that he sold intoxicating liquor to a minor, thereby tending to cause the minor to lead an idle, dissolute, lewd and immoral life. The case was submitted on the record of the preliminary hearing supplemented by written argument of counsel. From the judgment of conviction which was thereafter entered, defendant appeals contending (1) that the evidence was insufficient to support the judgment, and (2) that the court erred in excluding certain testimony and exhibits.

The record shows that on the evening of December 24, 1956, James, the minor, attended a party at a friend's home at which several persons between the ages of 16 and 20 were present. It was decided that some liquor should be obtained, and a collection was taken up for that purpose. James, with two other minors, drove to the Chateau Laisne, a bar and restaurant near Mariposa, which was owned and operated by the defendant. James purchased a fifth of vodka, two pints of bourbon and some beer. No request was made by the defendant for any identification, nor did James make any statement relative to his age. After the sale the boys returned to the party where the liquor was consumed. At the conclusion of the preliminary hearing, which was before Judge Thomas Coakley of the Superior Court of Mariposa County, it was stipulated that the case would be submitted for decision upon the transcript of the evidence taken at the preliminary hearing and the written argument of counsel. Subsequently Judge Coakley disqualified himself, and the cause was submitted to Judge R. R. Sischo of Merced County.

It is defendant's first contention that since the final decision in the case was made by a judge who did not see or hear the witnesses but had only the written record before him, this court should therefore reweigh the evidence on appeal.

[1,2] Here it should be noted that defendant was not compelled to submit the case for determination upon the evidence produced at the preliminary examination. Had he desired the judge to see the witnesses personally and hear the testimony he had every right to a court trial. To allow him now to attack the conclusion of the court on the very basis upon which he allowed it to be submitted would be to go far afield from the established rules of appellate practice. The rule so frequently quoted from People v. Newland, 15 Cal.2d 678, 104 P.2d 778, is equally as applicable to this proceeding as it would be to one after a conventional hearing before a court or jury. In other words, the limited scope of review has been consistently followed in cases such as the present. See

People v. Miller, 145 Cal.App.2d 473, 302 P.2d 603; People v. Smallfield, 131 Cal. App.2d 324, 280 P.2d 497; People v. Silva, 119 Cal.2d 421, 259 P.2d 74. Whether or not the act of defendant in selling James liquor tended to cause him to become an idle, dissolute, lewd or immoral person was essentially a question for the trier of fact. People v. Deibert, 117 Cal.App.2d 410, 416, 256 P.2d 355. Applying the rule set forth in the Deibert case to the facts presented herein, the finding that such acts on the part of the defendant did so affect the minor was reasonable and fully justified under the evidence presented.

It is further contended by defendant that a cash register tape which was introduced by him into evidence was an uncontradicted and unimpeached original business entry and hence as such must be accepted as true. This particular bit of evidence showed that on the day in question a total of only $10.95 in off-sale liquor was sold. Therefore defendant argues no liquor was sold to the minor in question, since the total price of the liquors bought by him was $12.35. Th record was admitted into evidence solely as proof of the facts shown thereon; that is that it showed $10.95 in sales, not that which it did not show. The trier of fact could reasonably infer that the sale to James did not appear on the tape by reason of mistake, accident or design. See Egan v. Bishop, 8 Cal.App.2d 119, 123, 47 P.2d 500. Furthermore this evidence was directly contradicted by the testimony of James that he purchased the liquor from the defendant.

[3] Finally defendant assigns as error three rulings of the trial court sustaining objections to the admission of certain evidence offered by him. The first relates to his request that certain prosecution witnesses be required to show their wallets and the contents thereof to the court. In denying the request the court indicated that he would consider the matter if it later appeared that such examination should be had in justice to the defendant. However no further request was made, and in the absence of a showing of prejudice no prejudice will be presumed. See People v. Carmen, 43 Cal.2d 342, 347, 273 P.2d 521.

[4] It is next contended that the court erred in refusing the admission into evidence of the names of all of the other persons who attended the party on the evening in question, and that the court further erred in refusing to allow testimony as to whether James had ever purchased liquor from any other person. Defendant, by such evidence, apparently desired to show that other persons at the party had relatives in the liquor business, and hence it was more likely that James would have purchased the liquor from them than from himself. Certainly such evidence was wholly irrelevant in this proceeding since the sole question was whether or not defendant had sold liquor to James on this particular occasion.

[5] It is further contended that the court also erred in denying admission into evidence of an affidavit by the secretary of defendant's counsel which was apparently offered for the purpose of showing the reason why the district attorney filed suit in the present proceeding. The second was an affidavit of counsel himself concerning a conversation with the district attorney for the purpose of showing possible prejudice in the county against the defendant. What may have been the district attorney's reason for initiating the proceeding was wholly irrelevant; and secondly, the only possible relevancy of the affidavit of counsel would have been on a motion for change of venue, but no such motion was made and obviously no error may be predicated thereon.

[6] Subsequent to the filing of briefs, defendant petitioned this court for an order to take additional evidence upon the grounds that the evidence sought to be adduced would tend to prove that two witnesses were lying; that Chateau Laisne was closed at the time of the alleged sale to James; and that defendant did not make the purported sale.

Even assuming the propriety of such action by this court (see People v. Cowan, 38 Cal.App.2d 144, 153, 100 P.2d 1079), the evidence sought to be introduced would be merely cumulative and could in no respect be conclusive of the fact that the defendant had not made the sale to James as alleged.

The motion for leave to produce additional evidence is denied. The judgment is affirmed.

Martin & Martin, San Diego, for appellant.

Gray, Cary, Ames & Frye, San Diego, for respondents Sperry.

MUSSELL, Justice.

This is an action for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff in an automobile accident which occurred on the San Quintin highway, approximately 44 kilometers south of Tiajuana, Baja California, Republic of Mexico.

At the time of the collision on July 3, 1955, defendant John C. Sperry, with the permission and consent of defendant John

M. Sperry, was driving a Mercury automobile northerly on said highway when the Mercury collided with a Chevrolet automobile being driven in a southerly direction on said highway by defendant Edward Thornton. Plaintiff Rudolph Victor was an occupant of the Thornton vehicle and was severely injured in the collision. Plaintiff and the drivers of both cars were and now are residents and citizens of the State of California. The accident was the result of the negligence (and of the equivalent of negligence under Mexican law) of the drivers of both cars involved in the accident.

Article 1910 of the Civil Code of 1928 for the Federal District and Territories of Mexico, as amended, which had been adopted by the State of Baja California del Norte and which was in effect at the time of the accident, provided as follows: "A person who, acting illicitly or contrary to good customs, causes damages to another, is obligated to repair it, unless it is shown that the damage was produced as a consequence of the guilt or inexcusable negligence of the victim." Neither said code nor the general law of said state or of said Republic distinguished between guests and passengers in motor vehicles nor did they impose any restrictions upon the right of a guest to recover damages from the negligent operator of a motor vehicle in which he was riding.

Prior to the accident plaintiff had been employed as a house mover and his weekly wage was $99. He had not returned to work at the time of the trial and will not be able to engage in the same occupation or any occupation requiring a substantial amount of physical activity.

The trial court found (and it is not disputed) that as a result of the accident plaintiff's spinal cord was damaged. He suffered a paralysis of the left upper and lower extremities and the disability in his left upper extremity is permanent and total. The disability in his lower extremity is permanent and partial. He is and will continue to be unable to walk without a limp or for protracted periods. The court further found that plaintiff suffered the following actual damages as a result of the accident:

|                                    |              |
|------------------------------------|--------------|
| Medical and hospital expenses      | $2,962.05   |
| Loss of earnings                   | 7,500.00     |
| Impairment of earning capacity     | 15,000.00    |
| Pain, suffering and mental anguish | 15,000       |
|                                    | <hr/>        |
|                                    | $40,462.05. |

At the time of the accident the Mexican law in effect imposed restrictions on the recovery of damages for personal injuries regardless of their nature or extent. Under the Mexican law in effect at the time a victim of the negligent conduct of another could recover his medical and hospital expenses. For a temporary total disability he could recover only 75 per cent of his lost wages for a period not to exceed one year. Wages in excess of 25 pesos, or $2 per day, could not be taken into account in computing the amount allowed. If he suffered a permanent and total disability, he could recover lost earnings for only 918 days and, even though he earned more than 25 pesos per day, only that amount could be taken into account in computing the amount of the recovery. Where the disability was permanent but not total, the recovery was scaled down. For a permanent disability of an upper extremity the victim could recover only from 50 to 70 per cent of $2 per day for 918 days, the exact percentage depending upon age, the importance of the disability, and the extent to which the disability prevented the victim from engaging in his occupation. If the injured extremity was the "least useful", the indemnity was reduced by 15 per cent. In addition, "moral damages" up to a maximum of one-third of the other recoverable damages might, in the discretion of the court, be awarded. "Moral damages" are defined as "damages suffered by a person in his honor, reputation, personal tranquility or spiritual integrity of his life, and as damages which are not of a physical nature and not capable of exact monetary evaluation." The trial court concluded that enforcement of these restrictions on the recovery of damages is not contrary to the public policy of this State or to abstract justice or injurious to the welfare of the people of this State and that plaintiff was not entitled to recover his actual damages in the amount of $40,462.05. Judgment was thereupon rendered against defendants John C. Sperry and Edward Thornton in the amount of $6,135.96. The recovery was computed as follows:

|-----------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------|
| Medical and hospital expenses                                         | $2,962.05  |
| Temporary total disability(75% of $2.00 for 365 days)            | 547.50      |
| Permanent partial disability(70% of $2.00 for 918 days less 15%) | 1,092.42    |
|                                                                       | <hr/>       |
| Sub-Total                                                             | $4,601.97  |
| Moral damages                                                         | 1,533.99    |
|                                                                       | <hr/>       |
| Total                                                                 | $6,135.96. |

Under Article 1913 of the Civil Code of 1928 for the Mexican Federal District and Territories, if a person has the use of mechanisms or instruments which are dangerous per se, by the speed they develop, or otherwise, he is obligated to answer for the damages he causes, even though he does not act illicitly, unless the damage is caused by the guilt or inexcusable negligence of the victim. The Mexican courts hold that an automobile is a dangerous mechanism or instrument within the meaning of this section and that a person injured by a motor vehicle is entitled to recover damages without regard to fault or negligence from both the owner and driver of the automobile. However, if liability exists only under Article 1913 "moral damages" are not recoverable. Since liability under Article 1910 was found to exist on the part of the drivers of both automobiles, it became immaterial whether liability under Article 1913 was found to exist as to them. Plaintiff, however, sought a judgment against John M. Sperry, owner of the Chevrolet automobile, for $4,601.97, under Article 1913. The trial court concluded that this article is contrary to the public policy of this State, is in substantial conflict with the law of this State, and should not be enforced. Judgment was entered in favor of defendant John M. Sperry.

Rudolph Victor appeals from the judgment (a) Insofar as it fails to award damages in excess of $6,135.96 as against defendants John C. Sperry and Edward Thornton; and (b) Insofar as it fails to award any damages against defendant John M. Sperry. The appeal is taken on the judgment roll and appellant does not dispute the correctness of the court's factual findings. He is in disagreement only with its conclusions as to the enforceability of the Mexican law. The court's knowledge of the Mexican law was acquired under section 1875, subdivision 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended, effective September 11, 1957. Letters from Dr. William B. Stern, Los Angeles County Foreign Law Librarian, and a Mexican law firm, were received in evidence and were made a part of the clerk's transcript on appeal.

The questions to be determined on this appeal are (1) Whether the limitations imposed by the Mexican law on the recovery of damages by plaintiff are enforceable by the courts of California; and (2) Whether the limited liability without fault created by Article 1913 of the Civil Code of 1928 for the Mexican Federal District and Territories, as amended, is contrary to the public policy of this State or to abstract justice or injurious to the welfare of the people of this State.

[1] In 11 American Jurisprudence, Conflict of Laws, section 185, page 497, it is said that generally the character and measure of damages recoverable in an action for tort are governed by the law of the state in which the cause of action arises, and not by the law of the forum. And in 25 C.J.S. Damages § 4, page 462, it is said that the measure and elements of damage are, according to the general rule, regarded as controlled, in actions of tort, by the law of the place in which the act occasioning the injury is committed, while in actions of contract, the law of the place of the contract is to be resorted to, since such matters pertain to the substance of the right and not to the remedy. In Restatement, Conflict of Laws, section 412, pages 493 and 494, it is stated that the right to damages in compensation or punishment for tort is to be distinguished from the right of access to the courts and from the procedure to obtain the damages; that the creation of the right to have damages necessarily involves the measurement of that right insofar as the law can measure it; that while the actual finding of the amount of damages is a function of the jury or other fact finding body at the forum, the law that creates the right determines what items of loss are to be included in the damages; and that since the right is created by the law of the place of wrong, it is measured by that law. In 11 California Jurisprudence 2d, Conflict of Laws, section 99, page 205, it is said that the California cases are in substantial accord with the general rules declared by the Restatement that the measure of damages for a tort is determined by the place of the wrong, and for a breach of contract, by the law of the place of performance. In 13 California Law Review 318 it is said that a rule permitting the law of the forum to govern the measure of damages would afford the plaintiff an opportunity to increase substantive rights by choosing the jurisdiction allowing a maximum recovery.

In Loranger v. Nadeau, 215 Cal. 362, 366, 10 P.2d 63, 65, 84 A.L.R. 1264, it was held that:

"It is the settled law in the United States that an action in tort is governed by the law of the jurisdiction where the tort was committed, and, as it is a transitory action, it may be maintained in any jurisdiction where the defendant may be found. It is the general rule in tort actions that the court will, if it has jurisdiction of the necessary parties, and can do substantial justice between them in accordance with its own forms of procedure, enforce the foreign law if it is not contrary to the public policy of the forum, to abstract justice, or pure morals, or injurious to the welfare of the people of the state of the forum."

In Grant v. McAuliffe, 41 Cal.2d 859, 862, 264 P.2d 944, 946, 42 A.L.R.2d 1162, the court said:

"In actions on torts occurring abroad, the courts of this state determine the substantive matters inherent in the cause of action by adopting as their own the law of the place where the tortious acts occurred, unless it is contrary to the public policy of this state. [Citation.] '[N]o court can enforce any law but that of its own sovereign, and, when a suitor comes to a jurisdiction foreign to the place of the tort, he can only invoke an obligation recognized by that sovereign. A foreign sovereign under civilized law imposes an obligation of its own as nearly homologous as possible to that arising in the place where the tort occurs.'"

In Zinn v. Ex-Cell-O Corp., 148 Cal.App. 2d 56, 78, 306 P.2d 1017, the court held that on the question of damages generally in a tort action California has followed the Restatement, Conflict of Laws, section 412: "The measure of damages for a tort is determined by the law of the place of wrong." Citing Klaffki v. Kaufman, 52 Cal.App. 48, 198 P. 36.

In Slater v. Mexican National R. Co., 194 U.S. 120, 24 S.Ct. 581, 583, 48 L.Ed. 1000, Mr. Justice Holmes, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"It seems to us unjust to allow a plaintiff to come here absolutely depending on the foreign law for the foundation of his case, and yet to deny the defendant the benefit of whatever limitations on his liability that law would impose. In Northern P. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U.S. 190, 199, 14 S.Ct. 978, 38 L.Ed. 958, 961, an action was brought in the district of Minnesota for a death caused in Montana, and it was held that the damages were to be assessed in accordance with the Montana statute. Therefore we may lay on one side as quite inadmissible the notion that the law of the place of the act may be resorted to so far as to show that the act was a tort, and then may be abandoned, leaving the consequences to be determined according to the accident of the place where the defendant may happen to be caught."

[2, 3] In the instant case, since the accident occurred in Mexico, plaintiff's cause of action arose there and the character and measure of his damages are governed by the laws of Mexico. The measure of damages is inseparably connected to the cause of action and cannot be severed therefrom. The limitation upon the amount of damages imposed by the laws of Mexico is not contrary to the public policy of the State of California or injurious to the welfare of the people thereof.

[4] The trial court herein held that the application of Article 1913 of the Civil Code of 1928 for the Federal District and Territories of Mexico, which provides for liability without fault, was in opposition to the public policy of the State of California and refused to enforce that article against John M. Sperry, owner of one of the automobiles involved in the collision. We find no reversible error in this refusal.

In Hudson v. Von Hamm, 85 Cal.App. 323, 329, 331, 259 P. 374, 377, plaintiff, a resident of California, was employed as a governess by the defendant, who was a resident of the Territory of Hawaii. Plaintiff was taken to Hawaii, where she was injured by one of defendant's children. The action was filed in California under the Hawaiian statute which permitted recovery against a parent for a tort committed by his child. There is no such right of action in California. The court there said:

"It is the rule in a majority of the states that, when the cause of action depends upon a foreign statute, as it does in the instant case, there must be a statute in the forum similar to the one relied upon, in order to confer jurisdiction upon the courts of the forum. 5 R.C.L. 1040, sec. 131. In 12

C.J. 438, § 14, the author says: 'The doctrine of comity must yield to the positive law of the land. Hence the foreign law must give way when in conflict with the statutes of the forum, or the settled current of its judicial decisions.' * * *

"While there may appear to be some confusion of authorities due to a natural difficulty in construing laws or statutes, and in applying the doctrine of the law of comity, the decisions of the courts of America seem to be in harmony to the effect that, when the positive law of the forum, represented by its Constitution, statutes, or current decisions is in substantial conflict with the law of the foreign state, country, or territory, upon the subject-matter in controversy, the courts of the forum will decline to accept jurisdiction without violation of the doctrine of the comity of nations."

In McManus v. Red Salmon Canning Co., 37 Cal.App. 133, 136-137, 173 P. 1112, 1114, a California corporation hired one John McManus as a seaman and also to do shore work for it on a voyage to Alaska. McManus was killed in Alaska due to negligence of the corporation and an action was brought in California by the administrator of his estate pursuant to Alaska law which allowed the administrator to recover for the estate for a wrongful death. The court held that the Alaska law was contrary to the policy of the laws of the State of California and that:

"It is settled law that an action for wrongful death, like other actions on tort, is governed by the law of the jurisdiction where the tort was committed, and, as it is a transitory action, it may be maintained in any jurisdiction where the defendant is found (Ryan v. North Alaska Salmon Co., 153 Cal. 438, 95 P. 862), unless the court where the suit is brought, in enforcing the remedy, would be acting in conflict with the express provisions or the general policy of the law of its own jurisdiction."

In Thome v. Macken, 58 Cal.App.2d 76, 136 P.2d 116, plaintiff brought suit in California for an alienation of affection which occurred in Oregon, where such an action is allowed. A demurrer was sustained without leave to amend and this ruling was affirmed on appeal. The court held that the Oregon law was contrary to the public policy of California as established by section 43.5 of the Civil Code, which provides that alienation of affection is not actionable in this state.

Since no right of action exists in California for damages for liability without fault under the circumstances set forth herein and in Article 1913 of the Civil Code of 1928 for the Mexican Federal District and Territories, the trial court herein properly concluded that this article should not be enforced as against John M. Sperry as owner of one of the automobiles involved.

Judgment affirmed.

Martinez, were charged in count one of an information with criminal conspiracy to violate section 11500 of the Health and Safety Code, in violation of section 182 of the Penal Code. Joseph Sanchez, Vest Barragan and John Doe were named in said count as unindicted co-conspirators. Appellant Barragan was charged in counts two, three, four and five of violation of section 11500 of the Health and Safety Code, to wit, individual and separate acts of selling, furnishing and giving away of a narcotic, to wit, marijuana, each act a felony. A jury found appellant Barragan guilty as charged in counts one through five and appellant Galindo guilty as charged in count one. The jury failed to reach a verdict as to Martinez and a new trial date was set as to him. Appellants' motions for a new trial were denied. Galindo was given probation for five years under certain conditions and Barragan was sentenced to imprisonment in the State's prison. Barragan and Galindo appeal from the "judgments" and from the order denying their motion for a new trial, contending that the trial court erred in the decision of questions of law arising during the trial, and in restricting the cross-examination of appellants.

On May 2, 1957, Ernest Halcon, a special deputy sheriff working as an undercover agent, met one Joseph Sanchez in San Diego and purchased 16 hand-rolled marijuana cigarettes from one Henderson, in the presence of Sanchez. On May 26th Sanchez took Halcon to appellant Barragan's home but Barragan was not there. However, on June 11th Halcon found Barragan at home and introduced himself as Ron Rico. Barragan told Halcon he had heard about him from Sanchez and asked if Halcon was in San Diego for the same purpose as before. When Halcon stated that he was, Barragan said that he "wasn't holding at this time." Barragan then took Halcon to another area in San Diego where Barragan said "he knew of another connection living there." Barragan did not obtain any narcotics at this place and told Halcon to contact him later.

On June 15th Halcon went to Barragan's home and asked him if he was "holding" and Barragan replied "that a fellow just picked up what he had ordered from him and he was clean." However, Barragan told Halcon that he could let him have a "roach" and handed it to Halcon, saying, "It is only good for two or three tokes." Barragan told Halcon he was clean (out of possession) because he did not have any money and asked Halcon for a loan of $2. Halcon gave Barragan the money and it was agreed that Barragan would deduct it from the price of a "tin" that he would get for Halcon later.

On June 24th Halcon and Barragan went to a body shop in San Diego operated by defendant Martinez. Martinez and Barragan went to a Cadillac belonging to Martinez and parked near the shop. Barragan returned with a hand-rolled cigarette which he handed to Halcon, saying, "I scored a joint from the fellow in the Cad." Halcon asked appellant if he was the connection for his friend in the "Cad." and Barragan said, "Yes. I pick up for him and his business partner."

On July 4th Barragan told Halcon he had two tins that Halcon could buy but that they would have to go to his partner's home in San Diego; that his partner had just gotten out of the paratroopers and that "they (appellants Barragan and Galindo) were back in business." Halcon and Barragan then went to an address in San Diego where they met appellant Galindo and in his presence Barragan produced two brown paper packages and said to Halcon, "Here's the stuff. It is real good. I have just got rid of fifteen of them before I saw you." Halcon gave Barragan $20. for the two packages, which were later proven to contain marijuana. On July 20th Halcon went to Galindo's residence and in a conversation with him, Galindo said, "I have just got out of the service and it will take me two or three weeks to get back in the swing of things and really make some money." On July 10th Barragan and Halcon went to 803 Beardsley Street in San Diego where Barragan obtained 10 marijuana cigarettes which he sold to Halcon for $3.

On July 24th a deputy sheriff arrested Galindo and, upon searching his home, found a marijuana cigarette in a coat hanging in his closet. On July 24th appellant Barragan was interviewed in the county jail by a deputy sheriff and stated to the deputy that he was in jail because of narcotics, and said, "I sold marijuana to some people." When the officer asked which people, Barragan replied, "People that were the wrong people, I guess."

Appellants do not urge insufficiency of the evidence as a ground of appeal and concede that if the evidence was believed by the jury, it will as a matter of law support the verdicts. They claim, however, that the trial court committed error in restricting the cross-examination of Halcon, the undercover agent. Halcon was asked on cross-examination by counsel for appellants if he had a conversation with Sanchez on the morning of May 2 in the presence of Henderson. An objection was made by the prosecution and sustained by the court on the ground that it was beyond the scope of direct examination and was immaterial. The court then remarked that he did not think it was material as to how Halcon got his contacts. The following then took place:

"Mr. Whelan: I know, your Honor, but if this evidence was material at all then if it is admissible against the two chaps who weren't even there I think we are entitled to inquire into what did happen and who Sanchez is and what this is all about.

"The Court: What you want to find out is who else is involved as undercover agents, and I am not going to permit that.

"Mr. Whelan: I am not concerned with that at all except as it has any bearing on this case.

"The Court: I don't think it has any bearing on it.

"Mr. Whelan: Very well."

[1-3] Appellants argue that the court's rulings sustaining the objection to the question was error and cite People v. Alvarez, 154 Cal.App.2d 694, 316 P.2d 1006, in support of their contention. That case is authority for the proposition that in a prosecution for the sale of heroin it is prejudicial error to sustain the prosecution's objection to the disclosure of the identity of its informer who actively participated in the sale charged by delivering the purchase price to a defendant. However, in the instant case Joseph Sanchez was named in the information as one of the unindicted co-conspirators and his identity was well known by appellants. The trial court evidently concluded that the substance of his conversation between Halcon and Sanchez would be immaterial since Halcon testified as to what took place and appellants were permitted to find out how Halcon's meeting with Sanchez was arranged and what transpired at that meeting. It is the duty of the trial judge to restrict the cross-examination of witnesses to reasonable limitations. People v. Spreckels, 125 Cal.App.2d 507, 514, 270 P.2d 513. The scope of the cross-examination is within the sound discretion of the trial judge and his rulings will not be disturbed on appeal in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion. People v. Apodaca, 132 Cal.App.2d 340, 341, 282 P.2d 182. It does not appear that appellants herein were prejudiced by the criticized ruling and no clear abuse of discretion was shown.

[4, 5] Appellants contend that the court erred in restricting the cross-examination of Halcon as to the characteristics of marijuana. In this connection the trial court stated he did not think that Halcon was qualified to identify the substance and assumed that the prosecution would call a qualified chemist to testify as to the characteristics of marijuana and to testify as to the presence or absence of marijuana in the exhibits in evidence. In his direct testimony Halcon was only allowed to state what the substance appeared to be. Wayne A. Burgess, a criminalist, was, in fact, called as a witness, qualified, and stated his opinion as to the substances involved. Appellants were given ample opportunity to cross-examine him as to the contents of the various exhibits. The question of whether Halcon was qualified to testify as to the characteristics of marijuana was a matter resting largely in the discretion of the trial court and since no clear abuse of discretion was shown, his ruling cannot be disturbed on appeal. People v. Ravenscroft, 90 Cal.App.2d 543, 203 P.2d 109. Furthermore, appellant Barragan readily admitted that the various items which he procured and delivered to Halcon were marijuana.

[6] Counsel for appellants states in his brief that "the venture of the trial court towards halting a proper cross-examination of a prosecution witness is not just occasional" and refers to a colloquy between the court and counsel which took place in another unrelated criminal case. The question of whether the court erred in restricting the cross-examination of Halcon in the instant case must be determined on the facts shown by the evidence and cannot be determined by what occurred in another action.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., E. Clarke Savoy, Dist. Atty., George Roth, Deputy Dist. Atty., Fresno, for appellant.

MUSSELL, Justice.

[1] Defendant William G. Bernstein was charged with contributing to the delinquency of minors in an information filed in the Superior Court of Fresno County. Thereafter, he filed a motion in said court to set aside the information on the ground that he had been held to answer without reasonable or probable cause. The People have appealed from the order granting this motion.

The testimony adduced at the preliminary examination is set forth in the reporter's transcript and is in substance as follows: Michael Enns, aged eight years, and his sister, Sandra, aged six years, lived with their mother, Beverly Enns, in a two bedroom house in Fresno. One bedroom was occupied by the children and the other by the mother, who had obtained a divorce from her husband, the father of the children. Michael testified that the defendant, Dr. Bernstein, came to the home "pretty often"; that "sometimes he comes in the day and sometimes he comes in the night and morning"; that once the doctor came at night and he saw him there the next morning; that on more than one occasion the doctor took a shower in the home and that on one occasion he saw the doctor go to the shower in his underclothes, coming from his mother's bedroom to the shower room; that his mother was in the bedroom or kitchen at that time, dressed in a robe and pajamas; that he has seen the doctor and his mother in her bedroom quite a few times; that one afternoon, when he was returning from play, his mother's bedroom door was partly open and he saw his mother and the doctor lying on the bed, and that his mother "had a headache".

Cameron Enns, the divorced husband of Mrs. Enns and father of the children, testified that he saw a Porsche car, which he believed to be the defendant's, parked in front of Mrs. Enns' home at 1:30 a. m. on February 21, 1958, and again on March 4, 1958, at 10 p. m.; that he saw the same car there six or eight times in the past year.

Officer Perry Foster testified that he saw defendant Bernstein's car close to the front of the house on March 4, 1958, and checked the registration out through the police department.

The principal question here involved is whether there was reasonable or probable cause to hold the defendant to answer upon a charge of contributing to the delinquency of Michael Enns.

Section 702 of the Welfare and Institutions Code provides, in part, that "Any person who commits any act or omits the performance of any duty, which act or omission causes or tends to cause or encourage any person under the age of 21 years to come within the provisions of any of the subdivisions of Section 700 or which act or omission contributes thereto, or any person who, by any act or omission, or by threats, commands or persuasion, induces or endeavors to induce any person or ward of the juvenile court under the age of 21 years to fail or refuse to conform to a lawful order of the juvenile court, or to do or to perform any act or to follow any course of conduct or to so live as would cause or manifestly tend to cause any such person to become or to remain a person within the provisions of any of the subdivisions of

Section 700, is guilty of a misdemeanor

Among the persons under 21 years of age enumerated in section 700 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, subsection (k) as being within the jurisdiction of the juvenile court is any person who is leading, or from any cause is in danger of leading, an idle, dissolute, lewd or immoral life.

[2-4] On a motion to dismiss the information under Penal Code, section 995, neither the trial court nor this court is authorized to weigh the evidence and determine the conflicts, and our sole duty is to determine whether there was sufficient evidence presented to the committing magistrate which would establish defendant's guilt. People v. Cornette, 158 Cal.App.2d 724, 322 P.2d 1001, and cases cited. The court may not substitute its judgment as to the weight of the evidence for that of the magistrate conducting the preliminary examination and will not inquire into the sufficiency of the evidence if there is some evidence in support of the information. People v. Flanders, 140 Cal.App.2d 765, 768, 296 P.2d 13; People v. Bradley, 152 Cal.App.2d 527, 535, 314 P.2d 108. The purpose of the statute involved is to make criminal the commission of any act tending to cause minors to become dependent or delinquent. People v. Williams, 152 Cal. App.2d 641, 644, 313 P.2d 878; People v. Miller, 145 Cal.App.2d 473, 477, 302 P.2d 603, 607. In the latter case it is said that:

"It is not required that the effect of the act complained of must have an absolutely certain and unmistakable tendency to cause the minor to lead an idle, dissolute, lewd or immoral life, and in determining whether the act in question would reasonably so affect the minor, the jury may apply the teachings of human experience."

In People v. Deibert, 117 Cal.App.2d 410, 419, 256 P.2d 355, 360, the court said:

"* * * the relatively comprehensive word 'immoral' is one which conveys concrete impressions to the ordinary person. It is in constant use in popular parlance and is found in every dictionary. When used in a legal sense in relation to statutes involving an exercise of the police power to promote the general welfare, it has an accepted definition of something that is inimical to good order and contra bonos mores."

and 117 Cal.App.2d at pages 415-416, 256 P.2d at page 358:

"By the provisions of section 702, Welfare and Institutions Code, any act or omission which 'tends to cause or encourage' a minor to become a delinquent is made criminal. A case is therefore established when the evidence proves acts or omissions on the part of the defendants which tend or cause or encourage the minors to lead an idle, dissolute, lewd or immoral life."

In Bompensiero v. Superior Court, 44 Cal.2d 178, 183-184, 281 P.2d 250, 254, the court said:

"Probable cause is shown if a man of ordinary caution or prudence would be led to believe and conscientiously entertain a strong suspicion of the guilt of the accused. People v. Nagle, 25 Cal.2d 216, 222, 153 P.2d 344. An indictment will not be set aside or a prosecution thereon prohibited if there is some rational ground for assuming the possibility that an offense has been committed and the accused is guilty of it. Lorenson v. Superior Court, 35 Cal.2d 49, 56, 59, 216 P.2d 859; cf. Greenberg v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. 2d 319, 322, 121 P.2d 713."

The evidence herein, considered in the light of the rules and principles herein set forth, impels us to conclude that there was reasonable and probable cause to hold the defendant to answer, and that the trial court erred in setting aside the information.

[5] Respondent argues that there is no evidence establishing that Mrs. Enns and the doctor lived together as husband and wife, as charged in the information. However, the evidence, in our opinion, was sufficient to hold the defendant to answer to the offense of contributing to the delinquency of a minor and violation of section 702 of the Welfare and Institutions Code. Under the provisions of Penal Code, section 1009, the amendment of an information is permitted without leave of court at any time before the defendant pleads or a demurrer to the original pleading is sustained. Under said section the court in which an action is pending may order or permit an amendment of an information for any defect or insufficiency, at any stage of the proceeding, or if the defect in the information be one that cannot be remedied by amendment, the court may order a new information to be filed.

The order setting aside the information herein is reversed.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., Raymond M. Momboisse, Deputy Atty. Gen., Thomas C. Lynch, Dist. Atty., Philip Hanley, Deputy Dist. Atty., San Francisco, for respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

The appellant, Herman Hollander, was convicted by a jury of three violations of section 476a of the Penal Code, that is, of issuing fictitious checks. He appeals from the judgment of conviction.

The evidence shows that on October 2, 1957, the appellant purchased various articles from a department store in San Francisco. He offered, in payment for these articles, three checks drawn on the Valley National Bank of Phoenix, Arizona. At various times that day the department store cashier cashed three checks for appellant, one for $27, one for $84 and one for $73. The department store employees became suspicious and the matter was referred to the police. Upon being questioned, appellant admitted to the officers that he had drawn the checks and that he had no account in the bank on which the checks were drawn. His explanation was that, several years prior to 1957, he had an account in the Phoenix bank and had some of its checks in his possession, and that he needed some articles of clothing and passed the checks to secure them. His only defense was that at some indefinite time in the future he intended to make the checks good.

At the trial defendant did not testify. The prosecution, after producing the evidence above summarized, introduced protests and notices of protest on all three checks. These documents show that a notary public in the State of Arizona presented the checks to the Valley National Bank in Phoenix for payment, and that payment was refused on the ground that the maker of the checks had no account in the bank. Appellant objected to the introduction of these notices of protest on the ground that they were not properly authenticated. The objections were overruled.

On this evidence the jury found appellant guilty on all three counts. The sole contention made on appeal is that the protests were erroneously admitted into evidence because not properly authenticated. Each notice of protest bears the notary's seal, but appellant urges that this was not sufficient authentication.

The point is without merit. Section 476a (c) of the Penal Code provides that a notice of protest "shall be admissible as proof of presentation, nonpayment and protest and shall be presumptive evidence of knowledge of insufficiency of funds" in the bank on which the protested check is drawn. Section 8208 of the Government Code provides that:

"The protest of a notary public, under his hand and official seal, of a bill of exchange or promissory note for nonacceptance or nonpayment, specifying:

"(a) The time and place of presentment.

"(b) The fact that presentment was made and the manner thereof.

"(c) The cause or reason for protesting the bill.

"(d) The demand made and the answer given, if any, or the fact that the drawee or acceptor could not be found, is prima facie evidence of the facts recited therein."

Appellant urges, however, that the notices of protest here admitted into evidence over his objections were not admissible because not properly authenticated as required by section 1940 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the section relating to the method of proving a private writing. Appellant also urges that this deficiency of proof cannot be supplied by the judicial notice provisions of section 1875 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He points out that under that section California courts take judicial notice of the seals of all courts of this state and of the United States, and of the official signatures and seals of the principal officers of the government, legislative, executive and judicial, of this state and of the United States. Thus, by failing to so provide, the courts of this state may not take judicial notice of the seals of out-of-state courts or of the seals of office of the legislative, executive or judicial officers of states other than California. It is, therefore, argued that the courts of this state cannot, logically, take judicial notice of the authenticity of the seal of an out-of-state notary.

[1] The difficulty with this argument is that the Legislature has provided to the contrary. Subdivision 7 of section 1875 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the courts of this state take judicial notice of "The seals of courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and of notaries public." Unlike the subdivisions of the section relating to seals of courts and of the actions of principal legislative, executive, and judicial officers, subdivision 7 is not limited to this state and to the United States. Subdivision 7 is a general provision relating to all notaries public without limitation. Appellant urges that it is highly illogical to so interpret the section, because, under such an interpretation, the seal of an out-of-state notary is given greater dignity than the seal or acts of out-of-state legislatures, governors or courts. At first blush this does appear to be illogical. But subdivision 7 has been in our Code since 1872. It is a codification of a basic common law concept. In VII Wigmore on Evidence (3rd ed.), § 2165, the rule, and the reason for it, is stated as follows: "Other than a foreign seal of State * * *, the only foreign official seal presumed at common law to be genuine, by universal concession, was that of a notary. The notary's hearsay certificate was at common law not admissible except for the single purpose of evidencing the fact of demand and non-payment (protest) of a foreign bill of exchange * * *; but, so far as it was thus receivable, the purporting notary's seal sufficiently evidenced its genuineness. The reason for the exceptional recognition of this officer's seal was undoubtedly the necessity for prompt action in fixing the liabilities accruing on commercial paper, and the consequent impossibility of securing further certification of the document under the seal of State; this consideration sufficing to override the risk of forgery: This rule seems never to have been disputed, and its universal concession has caused the precedents to be few in number. The only question seems to have been as to the form of the seal; and this was properly held to depend upon the law of the place of purporting execution." See, also, cases collected 20 Am.Jur. p. 100, § 80; 31 C.J.S. Evidence § 25, p. 539.

[2, 3] As Wigmore points out, the rule is of long standing and has been so seldom disputed in either civil or criminal cases that there are few precedents. We have, however, at least one case where the court has held that out-of-state protests, similar to those here involved, are admissible in a criminal case. In People v. Bullock, 123 Cal.App. 299, 11 P.2d 441, on appeal it was contended that such out-of-state protests were not properly authenticated. The court stated (123 Cal.App. at page 303, 11 P.2d at page 442): "The defendant objects that the notices of protest were not in proper form. This court has examined the notices of protest introduced at the trial and made exhibits therein. The protests are in all instances in a form that complies both with the law of the state wherein they were made and executed, and also with the law of this state. Civ.Code, § 3233 et seq. They were all properly authenticated by the signature of the notary public who executed them, and in all cases, the notary public has attached to them his seal of office. Our courts are required to take judicial notice of the seals of notaries public. Code Civ. Proc., § 1875, subd. 7. The instruments introduced in evidence were the original documents and not copies. No statute requiring any further authentication of these instruments other than the signature and seal of the notary has been cited to the court or found by this court. The proof of instruments in this manner is not new or novel. Civ.Code, § 1182."

Appellant contends that this quotation was a mere dictum, because the court also held that, since the question of authentication had not been raised in the trial court, it could not be raised for the first time on appeal. We do not find it necessary to determine whether the judicial notice point was a dictum or constituted an alternative ground of the decision. Assuming the holding to be dicta, it is dicta no longer. It is a sound dictum, and should be followed. It is in accord with a basic common law rule codified in this state in subdivision 7 of section 1875 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Thus the protests and notices of protest were properly admitted. Their authenticity was established by the signature and seal of the Arizona notary public. The courts of California take judicial notice of that seal. No further authentication was required.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Defendant convicted of second degree robbery could not complain that he was prejudiced by the verdict on ground that threat by gun was inducing cause and that crime therefore would be first degree robbery. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 211.

8. Criminal Law ☞1171(2)

In prosecution for rape and robbery, prosecutor's statement, that he expected to prove defendant's consciousness of guilt by two named witnesses, was not prejudicial, although prosecutor did not later call such witnesses for that purpose, in view of fact that it did not affirmatively appear that there was any bad faith on part of prosecutor in making statement or that jury was not adequately instructed that statements of counsel were not to be considered as evidence. West's Ann.Pen. Code, §§ 211, 261, subd. 4.

Hugh Wesley Goodwin, Fresno, for appellant.

Edmund G. Brown, Atty. Gen., John M. Huntington, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Presiding Justice.

Defendant-appellant was charged with and convicted by a jury of the offense of rape, a violation of section 261, subdivision 4 of the Penal Code, and robbery, second degree, violation of section 211 of the Penal Code, on October 19, 1957.

The prosecutrix, aged 22, about 5ft. 6 in. tall, weighing about 140 pounds, was living with her husband in Lemoore. On October 19, 1957, she left in her car with her four children, ranging in age from 2 to 5 years, to visit her mother near Riverdale. On her return home that evening about 8:45, her car ran out of gasoline. After waiting alongside the road for some time appellant and his 12-year-old brother-in-law drove up and offered to push her car to a service station. After some effort he said he could not negotiate it and he invited the prosecutrix and her children to ride with him to the station. They got in the back seat of his car. Appellant drove off the highway and up a more or less isolated dirt road, stopped, got out, opened the door to the back seat and invited the prosecutrix to see a rear tire which he said was flat. He then put his hands on her shoulders and told her to put the baby down from her arms or in the front seat. She testified she became "scared" and said "No" over and over, and refused; that he said the boy in the front seat had a gun and she turned and saw the boy standing on the other side of the car facing toward the children in the back seat; that she could not see his hands to determine whether he had a gun; that because of what appellant said she opened the front door and placed the baby down on the front seat; that appellant steered her around in front of the car with his arm around her and she did not resist; that appellant then started talking about "gangs * * * Duke's Gang of Los Angeles", and said he was a member of it; that there were "guys all around there" and he told her to be quiet and not cry so loud and that she would be lucky if the "gang don't get you"; that appellant walked her down the road and in back of some trees; that she was crying all this time and had her hands over her face; that appellant told her to remove her clothing which she did, partially; that appellant brought a blanket, put it on the ground, and accomplished an act of sexual intercourse; and that all of that time he kept telling her about "gangs throwing people in the river" and if she didn't do as he said they would never go home. She said she thought she heard twigs crackling near-by and she believed appellant when he said not to cry aloud or protest and she believed the 12-year-old boy had a gun; that she consented to two such acts on this occasion because she was afraid; that appellant had warned her not to tell because someone had her automobile license number and would follow her home and that if she turned appellant in, someone would "get them" while appellant was in jail. She said she walked back to the car "sniffing"; that appellant told her to sit in the front seat with him and that she saw a gun on the floor of the car when she got in and appellant made reference to it; that appellant then drove to Hanford and his car ran out of gasoline; that appellant made her walk with him for a distance but a car came by and he told her to run back to his car; that he also returned shortly and obtained the gun from the front seat and handed it to the boy who put it in the back by the window; that appellant then left again and she made no effort to get away because she was "scared"; that she felt she could not leave her children there alone; that appellant came back and stopped a passing car; that the operator offered to take him to town for gasoline but after noticing a woman and children in the car he asked who they were and appellant said it was his wife; that the operator refused to leave them there, pushed their car into town, and appellant left and went to the oil station. This driver testified at the trial and described appellant. The prosecutrix further testified that all the time appellant was gone the boy had the gun in the back seat up by the rear window; that appellant's threats had "scared her" sufficiently that she made no effort to get away to report him; that after obtaining a can of gasoline for her car appellant proceeded back to it, placed some gasoline in it and directed her to drive his car and follow him while he was driving her car; that he showed her a gun in his possession from the glove compartment of his car and said the "gang" had issued it to him; that she followed him with the children to a dead-end road and appellant told her she was never going home and ordered her to leave the children with the boy in her car and then ordered her to undress in his car and again accomplished an act of sexual intercourse; that one of the children came over to his car crying and she asked to be left alone so she could go home in her car; that she got in it; that her wallet was on the front seat and appellant asked her to hand it to him; that he went through it and took the $7.00 contained therein; that she did not protest because he had already made so many threats toward her; that she wanted her driver's license back so he threw the wallet to her without the money, and that she then left for home, arriving at about 1:30 a. m.; that she put the children to bed and took a shower and then she went to bed and started crying because of her fear of telling her sleeping husband of the occurrences; that he awakened and inquired the cause of her crying and she revealed the above-mentioned facts to him; that she feared appellant had the license number of her car and if put in jail his "gangs" would call on them.

The law-enforcement officers were called and on October 24th appellant was apprehended and questioned. He stated that on October 19 he was home all afternoon and evening and had not taken his car out. Later, he stated he was home until dark and had been drinking wine; that he then left in his car with the boy, Christopher; that the gun was already in the car; that "Chris" had it for a while and later put it over the back seat; that he was going to kill pigeons; that en route he saw the prosecutrix stalled in her car and out of gasoline; that he put her and the children in his car and stopped near a bridge and told her he had a flat tire; that he did not have sexual intercourse with her because she refused; that no threats were made to her about "gangs" and he never mentioned anything about a gun; that they drove to a gasoline station, bought some gasoline for each car and she gave him $2.00 for this purpose; that they drove back to her car, placed the gasoline in it; that she gave him $5.00 and left for home; and that he did not have sexual intercourse with her at all.

On another occasion, with a shorthand reporter present, he changed his story and said he did have sexual intercourse with her twice there and once later, as described by the prosecutrix, but claimed she consented to these acts; that he told her he probably would not have money enough to get home so she handed him her wallet and told him to take the $7 contained in it, said he could have it, and that he gave the bill-fold back to her and left.

On this appeal appellant claims: (1) that the testimony of the prosecutrix was inherently improbable and advances his reasons why the evidence falls short of that required to show that since the prosecutrix did not resist, she must have been prevented by threats of great and immediate bodily harm, accompanied by apparent power of execution, citing Penal Code, section 261, subdivision 4; and People v. Patterman, 103 Cal.App.2d 322, 229 P.2d 444.

[1-3] A threat may be expressed by acts or conduct as well as by words. People v. Harris, 108 Cal.App.2d 84, 89, 238 P.2d 158. Submission through fear is not consent. People v. Cassandras, 83 Cal. App.2d 272, 279, 188 P.2d 546. A mere recitation of the testimony of the prosecutrix meets the requirements prescribed by Penal Code section 261, subdivision 4. While the testimony of the prosecutrix, when considered in connection with appellant's story, may well have been argued to the jury in support of his contention that there was not sufficient reasonable resistance offered by the prosecutrix, the jury's conclusion on this subject is final and is supported by the evidence. It cannot be said that her testimony was inherently improbable. People v. Simpson, 43 Cal.2d 553, 563, 275 P.2d 31; People v. Showers, 90 Cal.App.2d 248, 253, 202 P.2d 814; People v. Ogden, 41 Cal.App.2d 447, 455, 107 P.2d 50; People v. Harris, supra.

[4, 5] Appellant next argues that the prosecutrix merely handed her money to him without force or fear on his part, and accordingly the robbery charge cannot be supported. It is not necessary that the robbery be accomplished by means of both force and fear. People v. Borra, 123 Cal. App. 482, 484, 11 P.2d 403; People v. Calliham, 81 Cal.App.2d 928, 185 P.2d 342; Penal Code, Section 211. There was sufficient evidence that the appellant accomplished the acts of sexual intercourse and took the money from the prosecutrix by means of fear. People v. Enochs, 113 Cal. App.2d 231, 233, 247 P.2d 929.

[6, 7] The argument that appellant could not be convicted of second degree robbery where the threat by the gun was the inducing cause, because it would be robbery of the first degree, is untenable. The threats made were not only by the use of a gun but there were other threats which could well have placed her in fear to the extent that she parted with her money. At any rate, appellant could not complain that he was prejudiced by the verdict. People v. Hudson, 92 Cal.App. 593, 595, 268 P. 687; People v. James, 20 Cal.App.2d 88, 90, 66 P.2d 461.

[8] Lastly, appellant claims the prosecutor committed prejudicial misconduct in stating he expected to prove defendant's consciousness of guilt by two named witnesses, i. e., that appellant attempted to escape from jail during his incarceration prior to trial, and made several statements during the day of his intention so to do, particularly when he did not later call such witnesses for this purpose. Appellant objected to the statement at the time. At the outset, counsel for the people announced he was merely stating what he thought his evidence would be and that he fairly believed it was admissible to show consciousness of guilt under People v. Arnold, 199 Cal. 471, 497, 250 P. 168. The court, during the arguments, remarked that it thought the jury understood "by this time" that statements of counsel are not to be taken as evidence and that the evidence will come from the witnesses when admitted by the court. The reason for not calling the witnesses is not indicated. It does not affirmatively appear that there was any bad faith on the part of the prosecutor in making the statement or that the jury was not adequately instructed in respect to the statement of counsel not being considered as evidence in the case. We are convinced that no prejudicial error resulted. People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 9, 78 P. 235; People v. Gordon, 71 Cal.App.2d 606, 631, 163 P.2d 110; People v. Watson, 46 Cal. 2d 818, 836, 299 P.2d 243.

PEOPLE of the State of California,
Plaintiff and Respondent,

v.

John William CARR and Michael Triandofilos, Defendants and Appellants.

Cr. 6198.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Sept. 17, 1958.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 14, 1958.

Hearing Denied Nov. 13, 1958.

Defendants were convicted of first degree robbery and from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and order denying motion for new trial, Joseph M. Maltby, J., the defendants appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Lillie, J., held that, where the case was close on the facts, remarks of the prosecutor in his opening statement coupled with his comments on the evidence in closing argument were so prejudicial as to deprive the defendants of a fair trial.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for new trial.

Fourt, P. J., dissented.

1. Robbery  $\Rightarrow$ 24(1)

Mere possession of stolen property is not sufficient to sustain a robbery conviction, but is only a circumstance tending to prove guilt. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 211.

2. Robbery  $\Rightarrow$ 26

In prosecution for robbery, evidence of identity of the defendant who had in his possession some of the stolen property as perpetrator of the offense was sufficient for the jury. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 211.

3. Criminal Law  $\Rightarrow$ 317

In determining the sufficiency of evidence to sustain conviction for robbery, failure of both defendants to testify at the trial could be considered by the jury with other evidence. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 211.

4. Robbery  $\Rightarrow$ 24(1)

In prosecution for first degree robbery, evidence sustained conviction as against defendant in whose automobile some of the stolen property was found in view of his purchase and possession of a pistol with which the victim was allegedly beaten, and in view of the defendant's close association with his codefendant who was identified as one of the victim's assailants. West's Ann.Pen.Code, § 211.

5. Criminal Law  $\Rightarrow$ 703

The opening statement of the prosecutor will furnish ground for an assignment of prejudicial misconduct only in exceptional cases, such as lack of good faith or a deliberate attempt to misstate the evidence.

6. Criminal Law  $\Rightarrow$ 703

Purpose of the opening statement of the prosecutor is to outline the state's evidence against one accused of crime and to inform the jury what the people intend to prove, and generally the failure to make such proof during trial does not indicate prejudice, particularly in the absence of a showing of bad faith.

7. Criminal Law  $\Rightarrow$ 703, 1171(2)

In robbery prosecution, prosecutor's opening statement as to what the evidence would show with respect to stolen property found in the car of the defendant was prejudicial.

Cal.Rep. 329-330 P.2d-31

8. Criminal Law  $\Rightarrow$ 703, 1171(2)

In robbery prosecution, statement of prosecutor in opening statement that defendant had offered to plead guilty to something less than robbery was prejudicial where the defendant asked only that if defendants pleaded guilty would they get any lesser sentence, since such was not an offer to plead.

9. Criminal Law  $\Rightarrow$ 720(6)

The prosecutor may place any fair interpretation upon the facts and may make any reasonable inferences drawn from the evidence.

10. Criminal Law  $\Rightarrow$ 719(1)

In robbery prosecution, where there was a lack of evidence to support prior arrests and suspected participation in other robberies and defendants denied to the police that they were involved in the instant robbery, statements of the prosecutor that the defendants when apprehended while driving an automobile were out working at their trade, looking for somebody to rob, was error.

11. Criminal Law  $\Rightarrow$ 719(1)

A statement of facts not in evidence by the prosecutor in his argument to the jury constitutes misconduct.

12. Criminal Law  $\Rightarrow$ 700

The district attorney as representative of the people must refrain from making inflammatory statements and is bound by somewhat higher degree of fairness than is the ordinary practitioner in a court of law.

13. Criminal Law  $\Rightarrow$ 1171(1)

Determination of whether misconduct of the prosecutor has prejudiced substantial rights of defendant rests largely upon the circumstances and appellate court may reverse a conviction when it is apparent from all the facts that there has been a miscarriage of justice, and strength of proof of guilt is an important factor in determining whether the misconduct has prejudiced a defendant.

14. Criminal Law  $\Rightarrow$ 1171(1)

Where the case is so closely balanced and guilt has not been so strongly established as to render it improbable that the harmful effect of the prosecutor's misconduct may have turned the scales against the accused, such misconduct warrants a reversal.

15. Criminal Law §720(1)

A prosecutor is limited to a fair comment in his argument to the jury and where such a limitation is exceeded in a close case, the comments may be prejudicial.

16. Criminal Law §1171(2, 3)

In robbery prosecution, where the case was close on the facts, remarks of the prosecutor in his opening statement coupled with his comments on the evidence in closing argument were so prejudicial as to deprive the defendants of a fair trial.

LILLIE, Justice.

Defendants were charged by information with a violation of section 211 of the Penal Code and convicted by a jury of first degree robbery. Their motions for new trial were denied and both were sentenced to the state prison. From the judgment of conviction and order denying motion for new trial both defendants appeal.

The defendants offered no evidence at the trial. The following facts are taken from the People's case. On October 8, 1957, at approximately 2 a. m. Robert W. McKenzie, while walking alone on the beach, was accosted and robbed by two men. Neither spoke to him. Although he saw no weapon on either man as he fell in the sand he was struck repeatedly about the head with a heavy object. He was rendered unconscious. When he came to he discovered 80 cents in change, his keys and his wallet containing a campfire permit, badge, identification card, credit cards, insurance card and driver's license were missing. He called police who searched the area and found nothing. McKenzie suffered two lacerations on the side of the head, multiple bruises and abrasions on the face, a cut lip, two broken teeth and a fractured rib.

On the same morning, one and one-half hours later, police stopped a slow-moving car owned by defendant Triandofilos in which he was riding and which defendant Carr was driving. The rear license plate was partially obscured by mud and dirt. Upon being asked to produce his driver's license Carr walked back to the trunk compartment, opened it with a key, and searched in a small bag wherein officers later found McKenzie's campfire permit (Exhibit 2) and his keys (Exhibit 3). Both defendants were arrested and when the car was searched police found two loaded guns, a p.38 and a .45 automatic pistol, only one of which was offered into evidence. Defendants claimed they had been burglary victims and that for their protection Triandofilos had purchased the guns in another state.

A week later in the Culver City police station McKenzie identified Carr from a 15-prisoner lineup as one of his assailants. He could not identify the second man and at no time has claimed defendant Triandofilos was the other involved.

Both defendants told police they had left New York together several weeks before and had been together since. Carr explained they had been driving around waiting for morning so they could see a man about getting work. He claimed he had found McKenzie's campfire permit and keys in a service station restroom shortly before his arrest, had tossed them into his bag in the trunk of the car and told Triandofilos, who had been asleep in the car, nothing about them. Triandofilos, who told police he had never been in trouble before, denied knowing anything about the two items. Both defendants denied to the police they had robbed and beaten McKenzie.

At the trial McKenzie identified Carr as one of the men whom he "believed" had attacked him and upon further query by the prosecuting attorney as to whether it was his best recollection that defendant Carr was one of the two McKenzie responded, "Yes, it is." Asked on cross-examination what led him to believe Carr was the man he answered, "I saw him with the light behind him and he was silhouetted against the light. He was a man of stocky build and at the time he had light blond or light brown hair * * *" McKenzie admitted he was unable to see their features and could give no further description of either man. Dr. Rayola who examined the victim's wounds testified that they were caused by an instrument similar to the .45 automatic pistol. Martin Klein, forensic chemist, examined the .45 automatic and found traces of blood on the rear portion of the "sleeve" of the weapon but because the quantity was so small could not determine its age or even whether it was human blood. No traces of hair were found on the weapon.

Defendants did not testify at the trial and no evidence was offered on their behalf.

Appellants contend first that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the conviction and, second, that the deputy district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct.

The rule relating to an appeal court's review of the evidence is well stated in the case of People v. Osslo, 50 Cal.2d 75, 323 P.2d 397, and People v. Daugherty, 40 Cal. 2d 876, 256 P.2d 911. Unquestionably the evidence against defendants is largely circumstantial but it is with this principle of appellate review in mind that we examine the main circumstances relied upon by the prosecution to connect defendants with the perpetration of the robbery.

[1,2] When arrested Carr had in his possession two items belonging to McKenzie, a campfire permit and some keys. This fact, appellants claim, without other suspicious or incriminatory circumstances is insufficient to sustain the conviction. Such evidence of course is admissible, tending to show the identity of the perpetrator of an offense, but mere possession of stolen property alone is not sufficient to sustain a conviction. It is only a circumstance tending to prove guilt. However we find in this record the "slight corroborative evidence of other inculpatory circumstances" necessary to sustain the conviction. People v. Wisenfeld, 36 Cal.2d 758, 763, 227 P.2d 833, 836; People v. Holland, 82 Cal.App.2d 310, 312, 186 P.2d 58; People v. Leary, 28 Cal. 2d 727, 735, 172 P.2d 34. We refer to the identification of Carr as one of the assailants and defendants' possession of the .45 automatic. The jury was not bound to, and did not, accept Carr's explanation about finding the stolen items even though it could have reasonably inferred that had he robbed McKenzie he probably would have kept the more valuable part of the loot—the driver's license and identification cards.

As to the identity of those who beat and robbed him McKenzie's description was vague. He described only one, as of stocky build with light hair. However a week later in a police lineup he identified Carr and again at the trial pointed to him as one whom "I believe attacked me." On further examination he affirmed that to his best recollection Carr was one of the men.

It is true that McKenzie's opportunity to observe the two men was not only limited but under most difficult conditions and that other evidence in the record might well have convinced the jury that McKenzie's identification of Carr, under the circumstances, was not worthy of belief. However we might feel about the weakness of Carr's identification, the jury in evaluating and weighing the evidence had a right to, and did, accept McKenzie's testimony. The evidence that it was dark at the time of the robbery; that the victim had been drinking, was nearsighted and wore glasses which had been knocked off his face; that when he fell to the ground he put his hands over his head and at no time saw the features of the two men or heard their voices; and that McKenzie was under great fear and stress and received head blows severe enough to render him unconscious, only served to create a question of fact for the jury. The resolution of the conflicting evidence is for the trier of fact. People v. Huizenga, 34 Cal.2d 669, 213 P.2d 710; People v. Ross, 120 Cal.App.2d 882, 262 P.2d 343; People v. Osslo, 50 Cal.2d 75, 323 P.2d 397; People v. Daugherty, 40 Cal. 2d 876, 256 P.2d 911.

Much the same may be said concerning the inference that the .45 automatic could have been the assault weapon. Appellants contend such an inference was unreasonable.

Possession of the gun by defendants, one of whom was identified by the victim and who had in his possession some of the victim's property, reasonably supports the inference that it was utilized in causing the injuries described by the victim as having been inflicted "with some heavy object," and by Dr. Rayola as possibly having been caused "by a very hardy instrument" and "by such kind of instrument." (.45 automatic.)

[3,4] As for defendant Triandofilos no one identified him or described him as being involved in the robbery. Although two items of stolen property were found in his automobile they were in the immediate possession of Carr who claimed he found them. Triandofilos not only denied any knowledge of the stolen items but denied to police any participation in the crime. Any inference that Triandofilos participated in the robbery must rest on the presence of some of the stolen property in his automobile, his purchase and possession of the .45 automatic and upon his close association with Carr who was identified as one of the assailants. Of some importance in considering the sufficiency of the evidence is the failure of both defendants to testify at the trial, which the jury could consider with the other evidence. People v. Ashley, 42 Cal.2d 246, 267 P.2d 271; People v. Adamson, 27 Cal.2d 478, 165 P.2d 3; People v. Chapman, 156 Cal.App.2d 151, 319 P.2d 8.

Circumstantial as the People's case may be, in assuming the existence of every fact which the jury could have reasonably deduced from the evidence we conclude that it was legally sufficient to support the verdict against both defendants and appellate interference with the determination of the jury is not justified.

Of greater significance however is appellants' claim that the misconduct of the deputy district attorney was so prejudicial as to have precluded them from having a fair trial. It is because of this contention we have set out in detail the close questions of fact presented to the jury relating particularly to the identity of Carr and the participation of Triandofilos who was convicted mainly "by association." The following specifications of misconduct of the prosecuting attorney present a substantial basis for attacking the verdict.

In his opening statement the deputy district attorney, referring to the arrest of defendants, told the jury "Upon further search of the car, the officers found Mr. McKenzie's personal effects that had been in his wallet, photograph identification, a camp fire permit issued to him; all of his identification as to where he worked, and all that had been in his wallet were in the trunk of the car; his keys * * *" (Emphasis added.) The record discloses that out of the change, keys, wallet, campfire permit, badge, employment identification card, credit cards, insurance card and driver's license taken from the victim, only the keys and the campfire permit were found in defendants' car. Although apparently most of the victim's property was recovered, the record is silent as to when, where and by whom. That such overstatement of what the evidence would show was prejudicial to defendants is clear from the reasonable inferences the jury might well have taken from it. Considering the state of the evidence and particularly the fact that although two loaded guns were found in defendants' car only one was produced and offered in evidence by the prosecuting attorney, the jury could have fairly concluded that all of the victim's property was found in the car; but only two items were produced and placed in evidence. Those not offered in evidence, the credit cards, identification cards, badge and driver's license are all items of particular value to one bent on larceny. It was an entirely reasonable inference that defendants actually had these items and intended to use them in what the deputy district attorney later told the jury they were doing that night—"working at their trade and looking for somebody to rob." Taking into consideration defendants' outright denials to police that they were in any way involved in the robbery, Carr's not unreasonable explanation as to how he came by the two stolen items, the circumstances surrounding the identification of Carr, and that the campfire permit and keys were the only part of the stolen items found in the car, the jury otherwise could well have believed that the defendants did not rob McKenzie because had they done so they most likely would have kept the most valuable portion of the loot which could no more incriminate them than the permit bearing the victim's name and would have better served for false identification.

[5-7] It is well settled that the opening statement of the deputy district attorney will furnish ground for an assignment of prejudicial misconduct only in exceptional cases—some involve lack of good faith or a deliberate attempt to misstate the evidence (People v. Lucas, 160 Cal.App.2d 305, 324 P.2d 933; People v. Alexander, 41 Cal. App.2d 275, 106 P.2d 450, 916; People v. Berryman, 6 Cal.2d 331, 57 P.2d 136; People v. Emme, 120 Cal.App. 9, 7 P.2d 183), and some disclose such flagrantly improper conduct as to work a legal prejudice to the defendant. People v. Arnold, 199 Cal. 471, 250 P. 168. The purpose of the opening statement of the prosecuting attorney is to outline the state's evidence against the one accused of crime and to inform the jury what the people intend to prove. Generally the failure to make such proof during the trial does not indicate prejudice, particularly in the absence of showing of bad faith. However it is the substance and implication of a statement or the effect of an act which really define what the law recognizes as prejudicial misconduct. People v. Planagan, 65 Cal.App.2d 371, 150 P.2d 927. Whereas in the case at bar the unwarranted statement might not alone have prejudiced the defendants, the cumulative effect on the jury of this and other unjustified comments of the deputy district attorney justifies a contrary conclusion particularly in view of the state of the evidence.

As to the prosecuting attorney's good faith in including all of the stolen property, in view of the importance of the circumstance of possession of some of it, and that without it he in all probability could not have made a case against defendants, the deputy district attorney must have known in advance that his witnesses, Officers Bennett, Good and Perkins, would testify that only the two items were found in defendants' car. Of interest in this connection is the case of People v. Bentley, 131 Cal.App. 2d 687, at page 690, 281 P.2d 1, at page 3, in which the court stated: "The district attorney knew, or should have known, the testimony the officer was going to give * * * Every prosecutor who offers a witness to testify to conversations with an accused should know what the witness will relate if given a free hand." Although appellant does not contend that the deputy district attorney was guilty of a deliberate misrepresentation of the evidence it is obvious in view of the weaknesses of the People's case that the prosecutor was willing to, and did, take advantage of every opportunity to influence the jury against defendants whether it was created by carelessness or deliberation on his part. To say that the deputy district attorney's comment to the jury at the outset of his opening statement that what he was about to tell them was not evidence but only what he intended to prove; and the court's instruction to the jury that any statement of counsel concerning the facts must not be regarded as evidence, cured the effect of overstatements and misstatements of the evidence by the prosecuting attorney, is to completely ignore their practical and lasting effect on a jury, and the inability of laymen to completely reject and erase from their minds damaging statements they have heard.

[8] This is not the only comment made by the deputy district attorney in his opening statement and later unsupported by the evidence. He continued, "In the course of this conversation, Mr. Triandofilos asked the police officers in Long Beach if there was any chance to reduce this charge and permit them to plead to something less than robbery upon which they were booked." Defendants' motions for mistrial were denied. At the close of the People's case the prosecuting attorney, out of the hearing of the jury, offered to prove that "The two defendants were together at the jail elevator, Mr. Triandofilos said to Mr. Lambert and Mr. Ragsdale, 'If we plead guilty can we get any lesser sentence?'" The trial court's ruling is not clear, but it did not permit the statement to be received in evidence.

It is true that an offer on the part of a defendant to plead guilty to the offense charged, or to a lesser offense, is admissible against him as constituting an implied admission of guilt. However there is here only the query, "If we plead guilty can we get any lesser sentence?" We fail to see wherein there is an offer to plead. It is at most an inquiry about what defendants could expect if they decided to enter a plea. The prosecuting attorney's offer of proof fails to come up to the "offer to plead" admissible against a defendant and the trial court's refusal to permit the evidence to go before the jury was undoubtedly proper. The deputy district attorney exceeded permissible bounds in informing the jury that Mr. Triandofilos had asked police officers if they would permit them to plead guilty to a lesser offense. His assertion to the jury finds no support either in the evidence or his offer of proof.

During his closing argument the deputy district attorney told the jury " * * * these men were driving very slowly down Washington Boulevard in a westerly direction with a gun on the floor under each one of them, and I say they were out working at their trade and looking for somebody to rob," to which objection was made and overruled.

[9-11] The prosecuting attorney may place any fair interpretation upon the facts and may make any reasonable inference fairly drawn from the evidence. People v. Eggers, 30 Cal.2d 676, 185 P.2d 1. However, in view of the lack of any evidence to support prior arrests, suspected participation in other robberies or any kind of trouble with the law and their denials to police that they were in any way involved in the McKenzie robbery, the deputy district attorney's use of the phrase "working at their trade" was entirely unwarranted. The word "trade" connotes an occupation or regular means of livelihood and is defined in Websters New International Dictionary, second edition (unabridged) at page 2683: "The business one practices or the work in which one engages regularly; one's calling; occupation; gainful employment; means of livelihood." Likewise the prosecuting attorney's use of the phrase, "I say" might well have led the jury to conclude he personally had information that defendants had previously engaged in robbery, made their living robbing people and were professionals. It is almost too well settled for citation of authority that "statements of facts not in evidence by the prosecuting attorney in his argument to the jury constitute misconduct." People v. Kirkes, 39 Cal.2d 719, 724, 249 P.2d 1, 4. Several cases of interest here are People v. Shaffer, 150 Cal.App.2d 287, 309 P.2d 475, in which the court held the deputy district attorney's implication that defendant was in the business of selling narcotics was prejudicial misconduct because there was no evidence to justify it; and People v. Vienne, 142 Cal.App.2d 172, 297 P.2d 1027, 1028, in which the prosecuting attorney told the jury, "Now if you want to put these professional gunmen away, you and other juries like you are going to have to do it." Said the court at page 174 of 142 Cal.App. 2d, at page 1028 of 297 P.2d: "There was no evidence which would indicate that the defendant in this case was a professional gunman, and the remark of the deputy was unwarranted."

[12] While it is easy to understand counsel becoming excited in the course of the trial and while it is natural and necessary that counsel for the people as well as counsel for the defendant shall have the mind of an advocate, still the district attorney as a representative of the people is bound to refrain from making inflammatory statements and is bound by a somewhat higher duty of fairness than is the ordinary practitioner in a court of law. People v. Wilkes, 44 Cal.2d 679, 284 P.2d 481.

[13-16] The determination of whether misconduct of the prosecuting attorney has prejudiced substantial rights of a defendant rests largely upon the circumstances of each case and an appellate court may, and indeed it is its duty, to reverse a conviction when it is apparent from all the facts that there has been a miscarriage of justice. People v. Kirkes, 39 Cal.2d 719, 249 P.2d 1. Strength of the proof of guilt is an important factor to consider in determining whether misconduct has prejudiced a defendant (People v. Byrnes, 84 Cal.App.2d 64, 190 P.2d 286; People v. Lucas, 160 Cal. App.2d 305, 324 P.2d 933), and where the case is so closely balanced and guilt has not been so strongly established as to render it improbable that the harmful effect of the misconduct may have turned the scales against the accused, such misconduct has consistently been deemed ground for reversal. People v. Shaffer, 150 Cal.App.2d 287, at page 296, 309 P.2d 475, at page 480; People v. Ford, 89 Cal.App.2d 467, 200 P.2d 867; People v. Beal, 116 Cal.App.2d 475, 254 P.2d 100. A prosecutor is limited to fair comment in his argument to a jury and when such limitation is exceeded in a close case, the comments may be prejudicial. People v. Johnson, 153 Cal.App.2d 564, 314 P.2d 751. The evidence at bar is not so strong in its support of the verdict that it does not appear reasonable to believe that the misconduct of the deputy district attorney contributed materially to the jury's determination of guilt. This was a close case on facts. The remarks of the prosecuting attorney in his opening statement, coupled with his comment on the evidence in his closing argument, viewed in their entirety and cumulative effect in relation to the state of the evidence, convince us that the misconduct of the deputy district attorney was so prejudicial as to result in depriving defendants of a fair trial.

Judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are and each is reversed as to each defendant and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WHITE, P. J., concurs.

FOURT, Justice.

I dissent:

The appellants have made two main contentions: first, that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the convictions, and secondly, that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct.

The statement of facts as set forth in the majority opinion, while sufficient, does not include many matters which are important. However, I will not extend the factual statement further for the reason that the majority has correctly ruled and come to the conclusion that there was, in any event, sufficient evidence to find the appellants guilty.

Considering the claimed misconduct of the district attorney in his opening statement. There seemingly is no claim or contention that there was any bad faith upon the part of the deputy district attorney in this connection. In fact, at the time of the argument on the motion for a new trial, which was made upon the grounds of the misconduct of the district attorney, counsel for the defendants said: "In making this remark, I refer in no way or mean to suggest that the District Attorney was acting in any way in bad faith," and again in the same argument counsel stated, "Again, I want to make it perfectly clear to the Court, the District Attorney, and the record, that I am not attempting to imply that he was acting in bad faith."

The deputy district attorney told the jury, at the very start of his opening statement, the following:

"* * * Ladies and Gentlemen of the jury: Most of you have had experience in criminal cases, so it may be redundant to say this to you. What I may say by way of an opening statement is not evidence in the case. The evidence must come from the lips of the witnesses or physical objects which are introduced in evidence, and not from the statements of either one of the lawyers.

"If you will keep that in mind, I will attempt to trace briefly and Cronologically the events as we expect and intend to prove them."

Likewise, the court instructed the jury to the following effect: "As to any statement made by counsel in your presence concerning the facts in the case, you must not regard such a statement as evidence; * * *."

The first statement made by the deputy district attorney which is questioned is as follows:

"Upon further search of the car, the officers found Mr. McKenzie's personal effects that had been in his wallet, photograph identification, a camp fire permit issued to him; all of his identification as to where he worked, and all that had been in his wallet were in the trunk of the car; his keys, and then the officers communicated with the various other authorities, including the Long Beach Police Department, and later the two defendants were taken from the Culver City custody and brought to Long Beach."

The testimony disclosed that the keys, the nail clip and the camp fire permit were found with the defendants. The camp fire permit cited upon its face the name of the victim and his home address. The Long Beach police had, after the original investigation, picked up some other items which had been in the possession of the victim, some of which, namely, an "I.D. card and driver's license," had been seen by the victim in the possession of the inspector of the police department, but the victim did not "know what is all in there."

There is no showing whatsoever in this case, nor can there be any, that the statement that "all" of the property of McKenzie was found in the possession of the defendants was made in bad faith, or with the view of distorting the People's case. In People v. Lucas, 160 Cal.App.2d 305, at page 308, 324 P.2d 933, at page 934, it was said: "The opening statement did say that 'the pictures will show' that the final shot was fired into decedent's head while he lay on the floor. In fact this was not established, but was disproved by evidence produced by defendant. However, there is no showing that the erroneous statement by the prosecutor was made in bad faith. In the absence of a positive showing of a deliberate attempt to misstate the case, such a remark cannot constitute prejudicial misconduct. People v. Alexander, 41 Cal.App. 2d 275, 282, 106 P.2d 450, 916. Appellate courts recognize that such an overstatement reacts against the party making it, and thus often is not prejudicial to the opposing party. People v. Berryman, 6 Cal.2d 331, 336, 57 P.2d 136, and cases there cited. In the case at bar, defense counsel made effective use of the overstatement in his argument, quoting the opening statement and pointing out to the jury the respects in which the proof fell short of sustaining its assertions." Also, see People v. Alexander, 41 Cal.App.2d 275, at pages 282-283, 106 P.2d 450, 916, at page 454, where it is said:

"In the absence of a positive showing of a deliberate attempt to misstate the case, such remark cannot constitute prejudicial misconduct. (Citing cases.) Also no objection was made to this remark nor was the alleged misconduct called to the attention of the court or jury at the close of the prosecution's case. We cannot assume that a public official deliberately injected false accusations in his opening statement. In the absence of any showing we must assume it was that officer's honest belief that he would introduce such evidence. It may have been that the witnesses were not available or that owing to the development of the trial such evidence might by him have been deemed unnecessary and immaterial."

In my opinion the statement complained of had no effect whatsoever upon the final outcome of the case.

The next statement made by the deputy district attorney and complained of by the appellants is as follows:

"In the course of this conversation, Mr. Triandofilos asked the police officers in Long Beach if there was any chance to reduce this charge and permit them to plead to something less than robbery upon which they were booked. Mr. McKenzie will identify, not completely, Mr. Carr, and will not be able to identify Mr. Triandofilos."

At the conclusion of the testimony of a police inspector (cross-examination by appellants' counsel), the following occurred:

"Mr. Cullum (Deputy Public Defender): Nothing further. Might we have our recess at this time and we will discuss a legal matter with the Court?

“(The following proceedings had at the bench out of the hearing of the jury:)

"The Court: My inclination would be not to admit testimony of the defendant offering to plead guilty to a lesser offense. I can think of many reasons why a defendant would.

"Mr. Cochran (Deputy District Attorney): Let me refresh the recollection of the Court to the proposed testimony: The two defendants were together at the jail elevator. Mr. Triandofilos said to Mr. Lambert and Ragsdale, 'If we plead guilty can we get any lesser sentence?' That is a little different than the Court's contention. If there is any question about the importance of it I am sure there are cases in Fricke which the Court may have read, but are not in your mind.

"The Court: They are not in my mind. If you will obtain them and we will discuss them after the recess outside of the presence of the jury.

“(In open court.)

"Mr. Cullum: Before we commence, may counsel approach the bench?

"The Court: Yes.

“(Discussion at the bench.)

"Mr. Cochran: People rest.

"Mr. Collum: The defense rests.

"The Court: Proceed with the argument."

It is obvious to me that the judge indicated to the deputy district attorney that he would not permit the receipt of evidence of any conversation to the effect that defendant Triandofilos had asked the officers if there was any chance to reduce the charge and permit them to plead to some lesser offense.

In my opinion, if there was evidence which could have been presented to demonstrate that the defendant Triandofilos did ask the officers, in effect, if they could plead guilty to a lesser charge, such was admissible. It was appropriately stated in People v. Cooper, 81 Cal.App.2d 110, at pages 117-118, 183 P.2d 67, at page 71:

"Other material evidence was the implied admission of guilt of the charges herein when he offered to plead guilty to petty theft. In People v. Carroll, 92 Cal. 568, 28 P. 600, an officer testified that the defendants, who were arrested upon a charge of robbery, asked him if he would allow them to plead guilty to petty theft. On appeal therein it was contended that the conversation with the officer was not admissible, upon the ground that the defendants were not acting voluntarily. The court held therein that the conversation was voluntary and was properly admitted. In People v. Boyd, 67 Cal.App. 292, 227 P. 783, the defendant was charged with grand theft and obtaining money under false pretenses. When that case was called for trial, after several continuances had been had, defendant therein offered to plead guilty to obtaining money under false pretenses if the case would be continued to another date. That case was tried, and evidence therein as to the offer to so plead was received over the objection of the defendant, and defendant was convicted of obtaining money under false pretenses. On appeal therein the District Court of Appeal held that such objection should have been sustained, but the Supreme Court in denying a petition for a hearing disapproved that part of the opinion and held that the trial court was right in overruling the objection and receiving the evidence as to the offer to plead guilty to one of the offenses charged. The Supreme Court said therein at pages 302 and 303 of 67 Cal.App., at page 786 of 227 P.: "The action of the defendant in that regard was an admission on his part of the truth of the charge that he obtained money under false pretenses, which, with the other evidence, was properly left to the consideration of the jury. * * * Such admission was not, of course, conclusive evidence against the defendant. It was competent evidence merely, its weight and sufficiency being proper subjects for consideration by the jury. * * * The defendant's own admission, voluntarily made, was clearly competent evidence against him."

From the colloquy at the bench and out of the presence and hearing of the jury, it may be gathered that apparently Triandofilos did not, in fact, ask if a lesser charge could be filed, but rather asked in effect, "if we plead guilty can we get any lesser sentence?" Depending upon the circumstances under which the statement was made, it may or may not have been an admission. In any event, we are not concerned about that particular matter here because the testimony was never presented to the jury, and from the record before us, such presentation was not because of any bad faith upon the part of the prosecutor, but rather because of an indication of the court that the testimony would not be admitted in any event. There is not the slightest showing by the appellants that the statement made by the deputy district attorney had any adverse effect whatsoever as to their status.

Now turning to the statements made by the deputy district attorney in the final argument. The statement in question is as follows:

"Another thing that Mr. Cullum did not mention was the fact that these men were driving very slowly down Washington Boulevard in a westerly direction with a gun on the floor under each one of them, and I say they were out working at their trade and looking for somebody to rob.

"Mr. Cullum: I feel there is no evidence to support this statement of Mr. Cochran's. Objected to as an improper statement.

"The Court: I took it as an inference that the District Attorney was drawing. There is no evidence except what we have heard in the courtroom except that there was their trade. It is up to the jury to draw whatever inference they wish.

"Mr. Cochran: I am presenting an inference they may draw. They were not very affluent. Here was a piece of hose, an old coffee can, a rough funnel, what were those there for: The rubber hose smelled of gasoline.

"Mr. Cullum: I apologize to Mr. Cochran for the purpose of interrupting his argument: The purpose of closing argument is to answer points in the argument raised by me and he is going into points not gone into by me or in his opening argument.

"Mr. Cochran: I am answering Mr. Cullum on the reasonableness.

"The Court: The objection is overruled.

"The Cochran: Those are things you have a right to take into consideration. They have not been of any assistance to this jury by taking the stand and explaining any of the circumstances placed against them if they did not have some very compelling reason that kept them off of the witness stand, you are deprived of having an opportunity to see either of them under oath on the witness stand or to see them cross-examined."

The majority opinion indicates that "* * *" in view of the lack of any evidence to support prior arrests, suspected participation in other robberies or any kind of trouble with the law and their denials to police that they were in any way involved in the McKenzie robbery," the statement was unwarranted. I am not aware of any rule to the effect that the prosecution must show prior arrests or suspected participation and other robberies, or some other conflict with the law, before the district attorney can draw a proper inference in an argument before a jury. I am at a further loss to understand how the prosecution could have introduced evidence of prior arrests under the circumstances of this case, unless the defendants took the witness stand and testified in their own behalf, and that they refused to do.

In this particular case there is nothing in the record which would indicate that the defendants were timid and shy and therefore thought that they might not be good witnesses in their own behalf. In my view, if they were wholly innocent they had every good reason to take the witness stand and to tell the jury just what the facts of the matter were and what they had been doing. From what was said by their own counsel, I am inclined to the belief that each of them had some previous record and they did not care to testify, and then be impeached by a showing which could have been made. In this connection, their own attorney apparently advised them not to testify, and apparently so stated to the jury. He said at the conclusion of the trial, "There may be some doubt as to the eligibility of one of these defendants, some doubt of his eligibility for probation." Both defendants, in fact, asked the court to impose sentence at once, without any application for probation or pre-sentence report. At the time of sentence counsel for the defendants said: "In my opinion, the defendant Triandofilos is not eligible for probation," and "In review of the facts in this case, and my knowledge of the previous record of the defendant Carr, would lead me to believe that the Court probably would not grant probation in the case * * *." Later on, in the same proceeding the court questioned the defendants as to their desire to be sentenced forthwith, and Triandofilos himself stated that he was ineligible for probation, and Carr stated in effect that because of his background he wanted to be sentenced then and there. As I view it, the defendants preferred not to explain to the judge how and why they happened to be along the streets, driving an automobile in the early morning hours with a license number substantially covered to the end that it could not be read, and with two fully loaded automatic pistols immediately at hand; nor did they care to explain how the blood got onto the slide of the .45 automatic which was in their immediate possession; nor did they care to explain to the jury how they happened into the possession of certain items which had been forcibly taken from the possession of the victim.

The prosecution has a wide field of discretion in a closing argument. As stated in People v. Eggers, 30 Cal.2d 676, at page 693, 185 P.2d 1, at page 10: "It is the province of a district attorney to state to a jury the various conclusions that he draws from the evidence, and to make it clear to the jury what conclusions in his opinion should be drawn from the evidence introduced, so long as he keeps within the scope of conclusions which may properly be drawn." People v. McKenzie, 12 Cal.App.2d 614, 615, 616, 55 P.2d 1200. "The right of counsel to discuss the merits of a case, both as to the law and facts, is very wide, and he has the right to state fully his views as to what the evidence shows, and as to the conclusions to be fairly drawn therefrom. The adverse party cannot complain if the reasoning be faulty and the deductions illogical, as such matters are ultimately for the consideration of the jury." People v. Sieber, 201 Cal. 341, 355-356, 257 P. 64, 70. In the argument before the jury, any reasonable inference may be drawn from the evidence, and it is a matter within the discretion of the trial court to determine whether counsel stays within the permissible range of discussion. People v. Hoyt, 20 Cal.2d 306, 318, 125 P.2d 29. Assuming that, giving effect to these rules, counsel 'illogically deduced' that a finding of torture could be inferred from the evidence, at least in the absence of objection, it does not amount to misconduct which has prejudiced defendant's rights."

I have read the entire opening statement, the opening argument and the closing argument, and in my view there was nothing said which was prejudicial error, nor which brought about a miscarriage of justice. There was evidence from which the judge and jury believed that the defendants had robbed McKenzie, and that they were later found roaming the streets in an automobile, the rear license number of which was obscured, and that the defendants were armed with loaded guns in their immediate possession (one of which had blood upon it); that the defendants were unemployed and had no stationary place of abode, and had very little money in their immediate possession. I am of the opinion that for the district attorney to state what he did state, and to infer that the defendants were plying their trade, was not prejudicial error. The defendants never explained to the jury what their business or occupation was, and by their course of conduct any proper inference could be drawn and argued to the jury. Robbery, in my opinion, was not an unreasonable inference under the circumstances.

Lastly, the appellants complain of the prosecutor referring to their poverty, or that they had a small amount of money. The appellants themselves have answered that contention by admitting that they made no objection to the introduction of such evidence as to what property they had in their possession, and further that they made no objection to the comment upon their financial standing by the deputy district attorney. Such an objection cannot be made for the first time upon appeal. People v. Lindsey, 90 Cal.App.2d 558, 567, 203 P.2d 572; People v. Sellas, 114 Cal.App. 367, 378, 300 P. 150; People v. Agajanian, 97 Cal.App.2d 399, 405, 218 P.2d 114. However, in my opinion, if there had been an objection, it would not have been well taken and should have been overruled.

As I view it, the appellants in this case were properly convicted of robbery. The evidence was ample and sufficient. There was no error. However, assuming that there was error, it was not prejudicial nor sufficient to warrant a reversal. I would affirm the judgment.

Civ. 9335.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Sept. 23, 1958.

Hearing Granted Nov. 19, 1958.

Proceeding for writ of mandate to compel the Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board to reverse its decision and to reinstate the decision of the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control which had denied an application for an on-sale beer license for a small restaurant. From a judgment of the Superior Court, Sacramento County, Gordon A. Fleury, J., the applicant for the license appealed. The District Court of Appeal, Warne, J. pro tem., held, inter alia, that evidence sustained the department's findings that premises were in a residential area, that there were inadequate off-the-highway parking facilities and that issuance of license would be contrary to public welfare and morals and justified the denial of the application.

Judgment affirmed.

WARNE, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment affirming the decision of the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control and reversing the decision of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board.

Appellant applied for an on-sale beer license for a small restaurant which she owned and operated. Approval of the application was recommended by an investigating officer of the department. However, protests were filed by residents in the vicinity and, after a hearing thereon, an officer of the department found that the premises were in a residential area; that there were inadequate off-the-highway parking facilities and that issuance of the license would be contrary to the public welfare and morals. His recommendation that the protest be sustained and the application denied was adopted by the department. Upon appeal from the decision, the Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board, hereinafter referred to as the Appeals Board, found that the findings of fact were not supported by substantial evidence in the light of the whole record, and the decision of the department was reversed. The department petitioned for a writ of mandate to compel the Appeals Board to reverse its decision and reinstate that of the department. As the interested party, appellant appeared and answered in the mandamus proceedings, wherein the trial court found that the reversal of the decision of the department by the Appeals Board on the ground that it was not supported by substantial evidence was erroneous, arbitrary and capricious and constituted a prejudicial abuse of discretion, and judgment was entered accordingly. This appeal followed.

[1,2] Appellant first contends that the trial court erred in looking to the department's decision to determine if it was supported by substantial evidence, since it was the decision of the Appeals Board that was under attack. There is no merit in this contention. The rule of law applicable to the review of the decisions of the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control is stated in Brice v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 153 Cal.App.2d 315, 320, 314 P.2d 807, 810, as follows:

"* * * That agency is a constitutional agency that has succeeded to some of the powers of the State Board of Equalization in alcoholic beverage control matters. In other words, on the mandamus proceeding, the trial court was not permitted to exercise an independent judgment on the facts, as it may do in reviewing the findings of legislatively created state-wide administrative agencies, but was required to give to the factual determinations of the appellant the same deference that an appellate court must give to the findings of a trial court. Thus, the trial court was simply called upon to determine whether the findings of the Board were supported by substantial evidence."

[3] There is nothing in Section 23084 of the Business and Professions Code or in Article XX, Section 22, of the California Constitution which warrants departure from that rule, nor is there any reason why the rule should not control the Appeals Board on appeal to that body. Thus, the Appeals Board was simply called upon to determine whether the findings of the department were supported by substantial evidence in the light of the whole record. It was not permitted to exercise an independent judgment on the facts as contended for by appellant.

More serious questions are presented upon the issues as to (a) whether there is substantial evidence in the record to support the findings that the area is residential in nature and does not afford adequate off-the-road parking facilities, and (b) if so, whether the denial of an on-sale beer license constituted an arbitrary abuse of the discretion vested by the California Constitution in the department.

Before discussing the facts, a brief reference should be made to the rules of law which we feel are applicable to a determination of the question.

[4, 5] It is well established that the decisions of the department are final, except that they are subject to review for excess of jurisdiction, error of law, abuse of discretion and insufficiency of evidence. Covert v. State Board of Equalization, 29 Cal.2d 125, 173 P.2d 545. It was held in Schaub's, Inc., v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 153 Cal.App.2d 858, 864, 315 P.2d 459, that when the jurisdiction of the department to grant or refuse a transfer of a license (in this case the granting of a license) depends upon the establishment of an ultimate fact (in the instant case that it would be contrary to the public welfare and morals by reason of appellant's premises being in a residential district, and that off-the-highway parking facilities would be inadequate) the reviewing court may examine the evidence upon which the findings of the department to that effect are based, and if the findings of the department are contrary to the evidence, read as a whole, or are without meritorious support in the evidence, they, like those of a trial court, may be set aside and the decision based thereon may be set aside.

[6] Tested by these rules, we feel that the findings are supported by substantial evidence in the light of the whole record and that the decision of the department must be upheld.

The record discloses the following facts: Appellant's premises and restaurant are located on the westerly side of a 1200-foot segment of the old Auburn highway about  $\frac{3}{4}$  mile south of the city limits of Grass Valley. The distance between the two roads varies up to 150 feet and the old road joins the new highway at each end. There are nine residences within the immediate area and there are children of school age living in some of the homes. Seven of the homes are situated east of the old road, ranging in distance from about 100 to 300 feet from the appellant's restaurant. The other two are immediately to the north of appellant's premises. One resident conducts a sand and gravel business from his home, using 7 or 8 trucks in such business, which trucks he parks on his premises. Apparently, however, he does not store sand and gravel on the premises. Another operates a chimney sweep and septic tank service from his home, using a "pick-up truck". The property 50 feet to the north of appellant's restaurant is occupied by auto wreckers and is maintained as a junk yard, where cars are dismantled as late as 9 or 10 o'clock at night during the summer months. Another junk yard is maintained some 400 feet northwesterly of appellant's premises. In the immediate area is what one witness described as a sheet-iron garage which is used as a welding and maintenance shop by the occupant for the maintenance of trucks which he uses in logging or lumber operations. Chickens and rabbits have been raised for sale by one of the occupants within the immediate vicinity and although the premises were not being used for that purpose at the time of the hearing before the hearing officer the two barns which were used in the business are still on the premises. There is also testimony that 12 to 15 cars may "conservatively" be parked on appellant's property between the road and the restaurant. The above facts are taken from the "Report on Application for License" and the transcript of the testimony taken before the hearing officer for the department.

At the conclusion of the hearing the parties entered into the following stipulation:

"The Hearing Officer: I take it there is no objection to the hearing officer viewing the neighborhood and making observations.

"Mr. tum Suden: No.

"Mr. Todd: We would appreciate [it] if you would.

"The Hearing Officer: It will be submitted then."

After viewing the neighborhood and observing the existing conditions, the hearing officer made the following findings of fact, presumably based upon his observations: "The applicant's premises are in a residential neighborhood." "The circumstances show that ordinary noises incidental to even orderly operation of the applicant's premises will result in substantial annoyance to the occupants of the homes on the easterly side of the road * * *. Parking space for automobiles is provided between the front of applicant's building and the road. The applicant estimates that 15 cars could be parked in the area, but inspection * * * made pursuant to stipulation revealed that it would not be practicable to park that many cars. The parking area would be inadequate to accommodate sufficient cars for any substantial amount of patronage. The parking of cars along the road would create a traffic hazard."

Under the findings in this matter we cannot say that the department's conclusion and determination that the granting of the license would be "contrary to the public welfare and morals" are not amply supported. Especially is this so when we consider the finding made by the hearing officer based upon his observations. While what he saw and observed is not carried into the transcript except as reflected in the findings, his inspection was made pursuant to the stipulation of the parties and we must assume that he saw what he reported. The record supports the finding that the area is residential, at least primarily so. The fact that there are two junk yards within the area, a garage building used as a private welding and maintenance shop by one of the residents and that the occupants of two of the homes have used their respective homes to carry on their businesses does not negative the finding that the area is residential.

[7] While there is no inhibition in the Constitution, or in the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act, or in the rules adopted by the department against the granting of an on-sale beer license in a residential area, nevertheless when the facts, as in the instant case, show that the applicant's premises are not a proper place to have a license by reason of circumstances such as noises incident to even the ordinary operation of the business, annoyance to occupants of the homes within the area, the insufficiency of parking area and the creation of a traffic hazard in case cars are parked along the road contiguous to applicant's premises, the department unquestionably has the inherent power under the statute to deny an application for a license.

The judgment is affirmed.

In prosecution for furnishing marijuana to minors, where information alleged that offense was committed on or about certain date and proof was in accordance with allegation as to time, place and parties present, accused's claim of alibi was impeached by his contradictory statements and his admission of felony convictions, corroborating witnesses were his close relations, and jury was fully instructed Theo. G. Krumm, San Bernardino, for appellant.

GRIFFIN, Presiding Justice.

Defendant-appellant was charged in two counts of an information with furnishing a narcotic (marijuana) to a minor, Joy Quarles (aged 19) on or about December 26, 1955, and on or about the same day with furnishing such a narcotic to one Davida Finley (aged 16). He was also charged with two prior convictions of a felony (murder and possession of narcotics) which he admitted. He pleaded not guilty to the charges. The jury found him guilty as alleged.

On his appeal from the judgment and order denying a new trial he claims that since his basic defense was an alibi as to his association with these minors on December 26, 1955, and the time fixed by their testimony as to the commission of said defenses, it was prejudicial error to give an instruction to the effect that:

"When, as in each count alleged in the Information, it is charged that a crime was committed on or about a certain date, if the jury finds that the particular crime charged was committed by the defendant, the proof need not show that they were committed at the time so alleged." Citing People v. Morris, 3 Cal.App. 1, 84 P. 463; and People v. Waits, 18 Cal.App.2d 20, 62 P.2d 1054.

No claim is made that the evidence is not sufficient to support the convictions. A brief résumé of the girls' testimony is that on December 26, 1955, at about 6:30 p. m. (Davida's birthday) they went around to several homes with one Bob Long and engaged in conversation generally about Christmas festivities. At the Alwardt home they had an alcoholic drink and appellant Frank Velarde came there and was introduced to the girls by Bob. After a brief conversation appellant and Bob went to the kitchen and Bob then invited Davida there and asked her if she wanted to "go smoke some marijuana" and she agreed; that Joy then joined them and at about 8:30 p. m. the four of them drove to appellant's home in a 1949 or 1950 maroon-colored convertible white top Ford, which appellant said belonged to his brother; that when they arrived there appellant left and talked to a man (Velarde's father) and then returned and said he "got two joints (marijuana cigarettes) \* \* \* from the old man. I have my one stashed"; that they then rolled up the windows in the car to keep the smoke in and then drove away; that appellant handed one cigarette to Bob, who was driving, which he and Joy smoked and appellant and Davida, riding in the back seat, shared the other. The girls said the cigarettes were greenish-brown, about  $2\frac{3}{4}$  inches in length, and when lighted had a sweet odor which they had smelled before on prior occasions when they had smoked marijuana cigarettes. They related in detail how they smoked them with appellant on this occasion and said both Bob and appellant had made a "cocktail" out of their respective cigarettes. Davida said after smoking the cigarette she felt a "numbness around my head \* \* \* and uncontrolled laughter". Joy said her "head was light and maybe felt a little larger than it is" and she was laughing at things that made no sense. Based on these sensations they testified from their previous sensations and knowledge of the content of these other cigarettes, that they were of the opinion they were marijuana cigarettes. They testified that after smoking them they went to the mountains and after their return appellant stated he could make another buy in Colton; that they drove there and appellant left and returned, bringing what looked like marijuana cigarettes wrapped in wax paper; that Bob was offered one but he refused and they drove the girls to their home. Both girls were positive that the foregoing took place on December 26, 1955, at the time indicated.

On February 4, 1956, officers arrested appellant on this charge at his home. He there admitted that at times he did drive his brother's maroon Ford convertible car but denied knowing Davida and Joy. While there, Joy called appellant on the telephone and he then admitted he did know her and Davida and that he and Bob did take the girls driving at night, but claimed they never gave them marijuana.

Appellant testified that on December 26, at about 7:30 p. m. he and his brother visited the Longs and that he then went home; that shortly before 10 p. m. he went to the depot and boarded a bus for Los Angeles. He denied having his brother's car on December 26, denied seeing Bob on that day, obtaining marijuana from his father, or making any statements to the officer that he had known Davida or Joy or that he had ever taken them anywhere. Appellant's relatives claim that he and the girls did not visit their homes on December 26, as indicated by the girls. Bob, who was in the courtroom while the girls testified, did not take the witness stand to refute their stories.

It should be here noted that the prosecution's witnesses testified that the only offense occurred on December 26, 1955, at the time indicated, and no other such offense by appellant was indicated connecting appellant with it. Accordingly, appellant was completely informed by them of the time and place, and the information so alleged.

In the Waits case, supra, relied upon by appellant, the instruction was to the effect that it was wholly immaterial on what day or night the offense was committed * * * provided it was committed within three years. (Italics ours). People v. Morris, supra, was to the same effect except it related to the entire day. The instant instruction is to the effect that where the information charges the commission of the crime on or about a certain date, it is not necessary that the proof show that it occurred on the date alleged. It must be conceded that if the information charged that this occurrence took place on December 26, and all of the testimony and evidence showed it took place on December 27, this would not preclude a conviction under the information, and it would be a proper instruction under the statute of limitations. These cases were under consideration in People v. Notz, 73 Cal.App.2d 439, 166 P.2d 607, under an instruction given in about the same form as the one here under consideration. It was there held not to be prejudicial error where the court elsewhere instructed the jury that the burden of proving defendant's presence at the time and place of the alleged offense devolved upon the prosecution, and that it was sufficient to justify an acquittal if the evidence raised a reasonable doubt of defendant's presence at the time and place of such offense. Substantially the same instructions were here given and the jury was fully and completely instructed on the law relating to the alibi defense. The record unerringly points to appellant's guilt and his claim of alibi was impeached not only by his contradictory statements but by his admission of felony convictions. The corroborating witnesses were his close relatives. The exact date was alleged in the information and the proof was in accordance with the allegation as to time, place and parties present.

We conclude that appellant was not prejudiced by the giving of the instruction under consideration and no miscarriage of justice resulted. People v. Watson, 46 Cal. 2d 818, 836, 299 P.2d 243; People v. Meacham, 84 Cal.App.2d 193, 204, 190 P.2d 262.

Mandamus proceeding by board of trustees of high school to review order of Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control granting off-sale liquor license. The Superior Court, Yolo County, Ben R. Downey, Brand, Seymour & Rohwer, Sacramento, for appellant Raley.

VAN DYKE, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Superior Court for Yolo County, decreeing that a writ of mandate should issue against the appellant department and the appellant board, directing them to reverse their determination that a general off-sale liquor license should issue to Thomas P. Raley, the real party in interest. The basic question presented on this appeal is whether or not the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control prejudicially abused its administrative discretion in granting the license.

The department made the following findings of fact: The proposed premises consist of a supermarket located in a neighborhood shopping center at the southeast corner of College Street and Granada Drive in the South Land Park area near the southerly outskirts of Woodland. The premises in question constitute one of a chain of eight Raley food markets, seven of which are located in Sacramento County, and all, or most of them, are licensed for off-sale general alcoholic beverages. There are presently no alcoholic beverage licenses in force in the vicinity of the premises. The applicant's store building is situated in the southerly part of the shopping center, and there is an adjacent main parking area immediately to the north of the applicant's building which is shared with patrons of a drive-in restaurant located at the corner of College Street and Granada Drive and with patrons of other retail stores in the shopping center. Immediately to the south of, and adjacent to, the proposed premises is another parking area reserved for the exclusive use of the applicant's customers. The main entrance to the applicant's store faces College Street, while a secondary entrance faces the general parking area to the north of the building. The nearest school to the proposed premises is the Woodland Union High School, located to the north of the premises and occupying land on both sides of College Street. The distance from the nearest point of the premises and the nearest point of the school property is approximately 365 feet. The evidence shows that the school board has under consideration the enlargement of the high school campus, which, although it occupies large areas of land on both sides of College Street lying to the north of the proposed premises, appears to be too small for present or proposed enlarged school activities. The distance from the proposed premises to the nearest point on school property could, by the additional school facilities proposed, be reduced to approximately 300 feet. Present enrollment of Woodland Union High School is approximately 1,000 students, which include age groups ranging from 13 to 19. The 19-year-old group would constitute but a small fraction of the enrollment. A considerable number of students frequent the area near the proposed premises by reason of their patronage of the drive-in restaurant and their purchases of ice cream and candy bars at applicant's store. Complaints of the neighboring residents have been directed toward the practice of these students discarding papers such as candy wrappers and other debris around the shopping center during the noon lunch period, after school hours and during evening when sports events are held at the school. There is insufficient evidence to show that the package sale of alcoholic beverages by applicant would aggravate this litter problem or that consumption in public of alcoholic beverages in the vicinity is, or would be of such proportions as to add appreciably to the litter. The evidence shows that by far the greatest number of sales of alcoholic beverages sold at other markets of similar type, operated by applicant, are made in conjunction with purchase of grocery items for consumption at the purchasers' homes. The applicant does not propose to sell alcoholic beverages from open shelves or refrigerators accessible to patrons on a self-service basis as is usual in his other and in most food stores of this kind, but he has submitted a revised floor plan whereby refrigerated beer, wines and so-called hard liquors will be sold only at a separate department located at the front of the store in the southwest corner and outside the check stands. Persons desiring to purchase alcoholic beverages will only be able to procure them at this portion of the store, which will be in charge of a clerk at all times that the liquor department is open for business. The proposed arrangement should effectively minimize the possibility of theft of alcoholic beverages by high school students or others, and will safeguard against inadvertent sale of alcoholic beverages to minors by clerks at the food-checking stands at times when they are busy with customers purchasing large lots of groceries. A children's public playground will, at some time in the future, occupy a park area proposed to be constructed across College Street and opposite the proposed premises. The evidence does not show what portion of this proposed public park will be used for playground purposes such as swings and other play equipment. The width of College Street intervening between the proposed premises and the proposed park area is approximately 60 feet from curb to curb. A municipal swimming pool, which is patronized by increasing numbers of adults, students and other children to the extent of a total of 43,548 persons in 1955, is located to the northwest and across College Street from the premises in question, at a distance of about 400 feet airline measured from the nearest portion of the applicant's store building to the nearest point of the swimming pool enclosure. This pool is surrounded by a high wall and, with the exception of the upper portions of bleacher seats located against the south wall of the pool enclosure, the view of the proposed premises from the pool area is effectively blocked. The American Lutheran Church, with a total membership of about 530 persons, and holding the usual services on Sundays and meetings on most week nights is located on the west side of College Street and across the street from the proposed premises at a distance of about 171 feet from the nearest point of the applicant's building to the nearest corner of the church property. An additional distance of about 25 feet to the nearest church entrance makes the distance about 196 feet. It is proposed to construct a Y.M.C.A. building in about two to three years on the lot adjacent to and south of the church across the street from the proposed premises, at a distance of about 150 feet from the premises, measured by direct line between the respective buildings. There is no substantial evidence to show that the granting of a license for the off-sale of packaged alcoholic beverages would, under the method of operation proposed, constitute an undue moral hazard to the students of the high school, the church activities of the persons attending the church, or juveniles using the facilities of the proposed playground or the proposed Y.M.C.A. The premises in question are located on Lot 16 of Block 4 in the tract known as South Land Park. By a "Declaration of Restrictions" signed by Anton Paulsen, his wife, and others, the then owners of the South Land Park Tract executed August 31, 1946, and which was recorded on September 7, 1946, certain restrictions were imposed on this tract, providing that all lots, with the exception of Lot 16 of Block 4 on which the shopping center and the proposed premises are located shall be restricted to residential use. As to Lot 16 of Block 4 it is provided that said lot is "restricted to retail commercial purposes provided that no liquor or beverages shall be sold on said premises containing more than one-half of one per cent alcohol by volume." There is no evidence to show that issuance of the license in question would violate any valid zoning ordinance. It is stipulated, and it is found to be true, that the proposed premises are located in a shopping center, which, in turn, is located in a general residential area. A search of the record discloses substantial support for the findings of fact.

The conclusions of the department from the foregoing findings were as follows: Issuance of the license would not be contrary to public welfare and morals for the reason that although the proposed premises are located within the immediate vicinity of (1) a portion of the high school grounds, (2) a proposed children's public playground, (3) a church and (4) a proposed Y.M.C.A., an off-sale license would not expose the persons or juveniles involved to any undue moral hazard. Issuance of the license would violate a deed restriction, which appears to be valid and enforceable as to all parties in privity therewith, but public welfare and morals would not, in view of the findings on all other issues herein, be adversely affected by the issuance of an off-sale general license to this applicant and premises. The proposed premises are located in a residential area, but issuance of the license would not be contrary to public welfare and morals.

[1,2] The scope of review of a decision of the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, like that of the review of a decision of any administrative body given quasi-judicial powers by the Constitution, is well established. The Constitution declares that the department "shall have the exclusive power to license the manufacture, importation and sale of alcoholic beverages in this State, * * *. The department shall have the power, in its discretion, to deny, suspend or revoke any specific alcoholic beverages license if it shall determine for good cause that the granting or continuance of such license would be contrary to public welfare or morals * * *." Const. art. 20, § 22. In reviewing the decision of such an administrative body, the reviewing court is limited to the determination of whether or not the decision is supported by substantial evidence and the court may not substitute its view for that of the administrative body, nor reweigh conflicting evidence. Dethlefsen v. State Board of Equalization, 145 Cal.App.2d 561, 563, 303 P.2d 7; Molina v. Munro, 145 Cal.App.2d 601, 302 P.2d 818. The reviewing court, in its consideration of the evidence in support of the decision, must resolve conflicts, and indulge legitimate and reasonable inferences, in favor of that decision. Thompson v. City of Long Beach, 41 Cal.2d 235, 241, 259 P.2d 649; Oxman v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 153 Cal.App.2d 740, 744, 315 P.2d 484; Marcucci v. Board of Equalization, 138 Cal.App.2d 605, 292 P.2d 264. There can be nothing in the nature of a trial de novo in the reviewing court.

[3] Tested by the foregoing rules, there is substantial evidence in the record which supports the decision of the department and, therefore, its decision must be upheld and the judgment appealed from must be reversed.

Witnesses for the protestants testified that if liquors were sold in Raley's market, minors would find a way of getting it, either by pilfering it from the store or inducing adults to purchase it, take it out of the store and give it to the minors; that this would happen generally when students were attending various athletic games and contests during evenings such as football and basketball games; that the pilfering and illegal obtaining through intervention of adults would be increased by the propinquity of the market to the school grounds; that handy access to the liquor supply would increase use of intoxicants by adult attendants at the games; that minors would obtain liquor more readily at that market than they would at other markets through misrepresentation of their ages and having obtained it would permit its use by themselves and other students. Representatives of the nearby church testified that they opposed granting the license on the same grounds urged by the school authorities, but admitted that so far as the church congregation was concerned they did not expect any bad effects upon their membership. Representatives of the Y.M.C.A., which proposed to build in the future a building in the general vicinity of the market, testified that their membership would be more apt to indulge in the use of alcoholic beverages than if the same were not so handy to their headquarters. Many of these witnesses claiming to be well versed with juvenile problems, particularly those encouraged by the use of alcoholic beverages, gave it as their opinion that transfer of the license would adversely affect public welfare and morals, thus testifying directly to the very issue to be passed on by the board.

[4] Assuming the admissibility of such opinion evidence, we think it apparent that the evidence given by protestants' witnesses did not, as a matter of law, prove that the granting of the transfer of the license by the board would be contrary to public welfare or morals.

[5] The ultimate question whether or not under all the circumstances the granting of the off-sale license would adversely affect public welfare and morals was on this record peculiarly an issue for departmental resolution. It is lawful to sell, possess and use intoxicating liquor in this state. Surely the board, which passes on the issuance of thousands of licenses under all conceivable conditions, can better determine the effect upon public welfare and morals of the granting of a license than can those who are not constantly so engaged. Undoubtedly, the protestants were completely and conscientiously serious in their objections and their witnesses were honestly apprehensive, as they said they were, that public welfare and morals would be adversely affected if Raley's application were granted, but the question was for resolution by the board and it cannot be said from this record that the board in anywise abused its discretion in granting the license.

[6] With respect to the contentions of respondent that the license could not be validly issued during the existence of a valid covenant against the sale of intoxicating liquors, the research of counsel and of the court has disclosed little authority, and apparently the question is novel in California. The Constitution, which vests in the department the exclusive power to license the sale of intoxicating liquor, makes the power subordinate to laws enacted by the legislature. The legislature, by Section 23790 of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act, Business and Professions Code, has provided that retail licenses shall not be issued for any premises located in territory where the exercise of the rights conferred would be contrary to a valid zoning ordinance of any county or city unless the premises had been used in the exercise of such rights at a time prior to the effective date of the zoning ordinance. We find no other legislative enactment restricting the licensing power of the board. Restrictive covenants are private contracts as opposed to public zoning ordinances. In Barnegat City Beach Ass'n v. Busby, 44 N. J.L. 627, the court said:

"* * * The question of jurisdiction is not affected by the existence of covenants and conditions against open bars for the sale of intoxicating drinks, contained in the deeds for lands in this locality. However binding this may be upon the parties to such instruments, they are in no wise obligatory upon the court in the exercise of its statutory discretion to grant licenses for the public convenience, nor can such provisions render licenses granted invalid."

Apparently a contrary position has been taken by the courts in Pennsylvania. See Appeal of Cheris, Liquor License, 127 Pa. Super. 355, 193 A. 162.

In this case the board received in evidence a certified copy of a deed imposing the restriction. From the record it appears that the board considered the covenant to be valid and, further considering the covenant as one of the facts before it, specifically determined that its existence did not justify the board in a holding that its violation would be a matter affecting public welfare and morals. We think this conclusion of the board to have been warranted by the record before it. Apparently the board concluded that the covenant presented no insurmountable barrier to the granting of the license and left the parties to the covenant to resort to the courts if so advised. On this record this was a justifiable and proper disposition of the issue.

For the reasons given, the judgment appealed from is reversed.

Civ. 22731.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Sept. 19, 1958.

Hearing Denied Nov. 12, 1958.

Action to set aside deed. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Fred Miller, J., rendered judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appealed. The District Court of Appeal, White, P. J., held that evidence would sustain finding that deceased grantor had lacked mental capacity to make valid deed.

Affirmed.

1. Mortgages ⇨38(2)

To sustain claim that deed absolute on its face was in reality a mortgage or trust deed, testimony would have to be clear, convincing and conclusive.

2. Mortgages ⇨39

It was for trial court to determine what weight was to be accorded to oral declarations of deceased grantee relied upon to support claim that deed absolute on its face was in reality a mortgage or trust deed.

3. Mortgages ⇨38(1)

Evidence sustained finding that deed absolute on its face was an unconditional deed and not a mortgage or trust deed, as contended.

4. Deeds ⇨78

Presence or absence of mental capacity to make deed is matter which must necessarily depend upon peculiar circumstances of particular case.

5. Appeal and Error ⇨989, 1010(2)

Power of an appellate tribunal begins and ends with determination of whether there is in record substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which supports judgment rendered; and unless it is made clearly to appear that upon no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support conclusion reached in court below, that conclusion may not be set aside on ground of insufficiency of evidence.

6. Appeal and Error ⇨931(3)

Reviewing court must assume in favor of judgment existence of every fact which trier of facts could have reasonably deduced from evidence.

7. Appeal and Error ⇨996

In suit to set aside deed, if circumstances reasonably justified judgment of duly constituted arbiter of facts, opinion of reviewing court that those circumstances might also reasonably be reconciled with contrary conclusion would not warrant interference with determination of trial court.

8. Deeds ⇨211(1)

In suit to set aside deed, evidence would sustain finding that deceased grantor had lacked mental capacity to make valid deed.

9. Deeds ⇨211(3, 4)

In suit to set aside deed on grounds of fraud, undue influence, lack of capacity, and lack of consideration, evidence would sustain finding that confidential relationship had existed between deceased grantor and the grantees.
